

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS REPORTS

ANNOTATED

NEW SERIES.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (Division No. 1.)

DANIEL F. BLAKE, Trustee, etc., of Thomas J. Meadows & Company, Bankrupt, Respt.,

v.

SUSIE L. MEADOWS, Appt.

Bankruptcy — trustee's title — out- standing equities.

1. A trustee in bankruptcy takes title to the bankrupt's property which has been conveyed in fraud of creditors, and contrary to the terms of the bankruptcy act, subject to outstanding equities not lost by estoppel or fraud, to which the title was subject in the hands of the bankrupt.

Same — trust for wife — enforcement.

2. The conveyance by a bankrupt to his wife of real estate which he had purchased with her funds, but held in his own name, cannot be interfered with by the bankruptcy trustee, in the absence of anything to estop her from claiming the benefit of the trust.

Same — estoppel — failure to enforce trust.

3. The mere failure of a woman immediately to enforce the promise of her husband to convey to her real estate which he has purchased with her funds, and the title to which he has taken, without authority, in his own name, does not, in the absence of fraud, estop her from relying on a deed in execution of the promise, made after he became bankrupt, although he was in business, and credit was given him, without her knowledge, on the faith of the property.

Same — creditors with notice — rights.

4. Persons with knowledge that a man purchased real estate with his wife's funds, and took the title thereto in his own name, cannot raise an estoppel against her right to claim the property as against their claims arising out of credit extended to him.

I. Introduction.

Earlier cases on the subject of this note than those collected here will be found in a note to Breeze v. Brooks, 22 L.R.A. 257, on "Estoppel of landowner by allowing record title to remain in another." For rights of one leaving his chattels in another's possession, to claim title as against the latter's vendees or creditors, see note to Davis v. First Nat. Bank, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 760. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

This note is not intended to cover cases in which there is some positive act or representation on the part of the real owner of the property, intended to mislead a creditor or of the apparent owner, nor will it include cases turning upon the interpretation of special statutes governing the subject. The question discussed here is whether the owner who lets the title to his real property stand in the name of another thereby so places it in the power of the holder of the legal title to deceive the latter's creditors, that the owner will not be allowed to assert his rights as against their claims. The rights of bona fide purchasers and mortgagees are not considered.

In Ludwig v. Highley, 5 Pa. 132, the facts that the debtor was the ostensible owner of the premises by the sufferance of the real owner, and that the debtor was thereby placed in a position to deceive the world, and thus to acquire a false credit, were held not to affect the rights of the owner. The court said: "The principle which forbids the divorce of the real ownership and the actual possession of personal chattels has never been extended to

5. Reliance upon ownership of a certain parcel of land, sufficient to overturn a deed by the debtor to a third person, is not shown by the fact that the creditor had before him commercial reports showing that the debtor was "said" to own, or "credited" with owning, the land, or that he has good farm or town property of a certain value, without any particular reference to the land in question.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clay County in plaintiff's favor, as trustee in bankruptcy, in an action brought to set aside a deed of certain real estate, alleged to be voidable as a preference under the bankruptcy act. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wash Adams, for appellant:

When the husband used the money of defendant, his wife, which had come to her by inheritance from her father, and was her separate property, in the purchase of the farm in controversy, a trust thereby resulted in her favor, and the land, in equity, belonged to her.

corporeal hereditaments. That principle rests on the impolicy of permitting collusive transfers of the legal ownership, which would put the property beyond the reach of the debtor's creditors, rather than on the ground that a false credit is given by a retention of possession. But this species of legal fraud, which may vitiate a real transaction, is in its operation, strictly confined to the case of a sale or pledge of chattels. For obvious reasons, it would produce the most mischievous consequences to apply it to the possession of lands. The most usual mode by which real property is enjoyed is by permitting others to occupy it, and it has never been thought, in the absence of actual fraud, that, so far as third persons are concerned, it makes any difference whether the occupancy be by virtue of a demise for years, or under an absolute conveyance, coupled with a secret, bona fide trust. To hold otherwise would be materially to interfere with, in a great variety of cases, this species of equitable estate, which our laws distinctly recognizes. Our books furnish numerous instances in which the possession of trust property remained in the trustee, and yet, until now, it has never been claimed that such possession subjected the land to the burden of his debts. In the case of personal chattels, possession is said to be the only indicia of ownership to a stranger, but this cannot be said of hereditaments. In short, the reasoning applicable to one species of property is wholly inapplicable to the other, and cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex. To introduce a new rule of property, without some stringent reason calling for it, would be utterly unjustifiable."

But it has often been held that the true owner may be estopped by letting his title stand in the name of another. In Trenton Bkg. Co. v. Duncan, 86 N. Y. 230, the court said: "The authorities establish the doctrine that the owner of land may, by an act in pais, preclude himself from asserting his legal title. But it is obvious that the doctrine should be carefully and sparingly applied, and only on the disclosure of clear and satisfactory grounds of justice and equity. It is opposed to the letter of the statute of frauds, and it would greatly tend to the insecurity of titles, if they were allowed to be affected by parol evidence of light or doubtful character. To authorize the finding of an estoppel in pais against the legal owner of land, there must be shown, we think, either actual fraud, or fault or negligence equivalent to fraud, on his part . . . as to render it just that, as between him and the party acting upon his suggestion, he should bear the loss. Moreover, the party setting up the estoppel must be free from the imputation of laches, in acting upon the belief of ownership by one who has no right."

For the application of the doctrine of estoppel, there must generally be some intended deception in the conduct or declarations of the party to be estopped, or such gross negligence on his part as amounts to constructive fraud, by which another has been misled to his injury. Where the estoppel relates to the title of real property, it is essential to the application of the doctrine that the party claiming to have been influenced by the conduct or declarations of another was himself not only destitute of knowledge of the true state of the title, but also of any convenient and available means of acquiring such knowledge. Where the condition of the title is known to both parties, or both have the same means of ascertaining the truth, there is no estoppel. Brant v. Virginia Coal & I. Co. 93 U. S. 327, 23 L. ed. 927.

In Gillean v. Witherspoon (Tex. Civ. App.) 121 S. W. 909, it is said that it has been repeatedly held in Texas that to estop a married woman from asserting her rights to land, it is essential that she should be guilty of some positive fraud, or else of some concealment or suppression which in law would be equivalent thereto.

To estop a married woman from asserting her right to land, she must have been guilty of some positive act of fraud, or of an act of concealment or suppression which, in the law, would be equivalent thereto, which act, representation, or concealment was intended

The land being, in equity, her property, the conveyance to defendant was not a fraud upon his creditors, but was valid and lawful.

The trustee in bankruptcy takes just to cause another to alter his position or condition, and which has actually had such effect. Matador Land & Cattle Co. v. Cooper, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 99, 87 S. W. 235.

But the doctrine that there must be actual fraud is not borne out by the authorities. In Galbraith v. Lunsford, 87 Tenn. 89, 1 L.R.A. 522, 9 S. W. 365, the court said: "It is true that there is a theory which makes the essence of equitable estoppel to consist of fraud, but this theory is not sustained by principle or authority. There are many well-settled cases of estoppel, familiar to courts of equity, which do not rest upon fraud, and instances are admitted, even by the courts which maintain this theory, which cannot be said to involve any element of fraud unless by a complete perversion of language and misuse of terms. The confusion to be found in some of the books on this subject is due doubtless to the fact that the fraud referred to has its origin in the effort afterward to set up rights contrary to the conduct of the party, although, at the time of the act constituting the estoppel, there was the most perfect good faith. The term, as used in such cases, is, as Mr. Pomeroy expresses it, virtually synonymous with 'unconscientious' or 'inequitable.' It is in this sense that it may be said that it is a fraud, or fraudulent, to attempt to repudiate the conduct which has induced the other party to act, and upon which the estoppel is predicated; but it is entirely another thing to say that the conduct itself,—the acts, words, or silence of the party,—constituting the estoppel, must be an actual fraud, done with the then intention of deceiving. It may therefore be safely said that although fraud may be, and often is, an ingredient in the conduct of the party estopped, it is not an essential element if the word is used in its commonly accepted sense; and the use of the term is unnecessary, and often improper, unless applied to the effort of the party estopped to repudiate his conduct, and to assert a right or claim in contravention thereof."

in order to estop her from asserting her equitable title to real estate in her husband's name, as against his creditors. Hopkins v. Joyce, 78 Wis. 443, 47 N. W. 722. The court said that, having voluntarily put it in the power of her husband to obtain credit, and he having obtained it thereby, it would be a fraud upon those who dealt with him on the faith of his apparent ownership to permit her to assert her alleged equitable interest in the property.

II. Title in another with acquiescence of owner.

a. In general.

If the equitable owner has actual or constructive notice that the title to the property stands in the name of another, and that it is liable to lead to the extension of credit to the apparent owner, and steps are not promptly taken to disclose the real title, it is generally held that the true owner will be estopped to assert his rights as against one actually deceived by the appearance of ownership.

Where the controversy is between the husband and the judgment creditor, it is a material circumstance whether the wife has permitted the husband to hold himself out as the owner of the property, and thereby gain credit on the strength of such ownership, and by permitting her husband to hold the title to property, knowing that he is engaged in mercantile business, and in the constant purchase of goods to carry on that business, she consents that he may obtain credit on the strength of his apparent ownership, as it appears of record. Hauk v. Van Ingen, 196 Ill. 20, 63 N. E. 705, affirming 97 Ill. App. 642.

A woman who has allowed the title to real estate to stand of record in the name of her husband for over twenty years cannot assert title thereto as against a creditor whose right accrued while the title—of which fact she had either actual or constructive notice—stood in her husband. Steel v. Fitzhenry, 78 Ill. App. 400.

with the wife's money, and afterwards sold and other property purchased, and that was repeated several times for a period of ten years, the business being transacted in the name of the husband, and the purchases being made by him in his name, it was held that the wife was estopped from asserting title as against those advancing credit on the faith of such ownership. Hockett v. Bailey, 86 Ill. 74.

If a woman permits her husband to take her money and invest it in land in his own name, and to deal with it as his own, and he obtains credit upon the strength of his apparent ownership of it up to a time when he fails in business, she will not be allowed then to claim it against his creditors, having permitted him to represent it to be his own, and upon the apparent ownership of which he has obtained his credit and standing in business. A woman, by permitting her husband and son to operate a sawmill in their own names, which she must have known formed the basis of credit extended by those who dealt with them, will be estopped from claiming title as against creditors who extended credit on the faith thereof. Roberts v. Bodman-Pettit Lumber Co. 84 Ark. 227, 105 S. W. 258.

If a wife's money is paid for land, and the deed is made to her husband, and the husband asserts that the land is his, and by her direction he returns it for taxes as his own, and he so represents it to a creditor in order to obtain credit, which is given him on the faith of such statement, and without notice of the wife's right, the land is subject to the debt, notwithstanding the wife's equitable right therein, and notwithstanding the fact that she afterwards procures the first deed to be canceled, and a deed to be made to her by the vendor. Where a wife knew that title to land bought with her money was taken in her husband's name, and allowed it so to stand for over two years, it was held that it was liable for his debts. Keady v. White, 168 Ill. 76, 48 N. E. 314.
30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Real estate having been permitted to stand for a period of fifteen years in the husband's name, during which time he erected a dwelling house and other valuable improvements upon it with his own means, holding possession and dealing with the land as his own, and contracting debts on the faith of such ownership, it was held that a conveyance of the property to the wife would not be allowed to stand against the claims of the husband's creditors. Miller v. Payne, 4 Ill. App. 112.

Where a wife advanced various sums of money to her husband from time to time, for a period of twenty years, permitting him to use the money in his business operations, and to buy land, and certain land was purchased by him in his own name, and was so held by him for a period of six or seven years, under an understanding that he would protect her by putting the land in her name when it was paid for, it was held that she could not set up her claim to the land to defeat a creditor who had trusted him on the faith of the property which he held with his wife's knowledge and consent. Maddox v. Epler, 48 Ill. App. 265.

Where a woman for nearly two years suffered a deed of her property to remain on the public records in her husband's name, and allowed him to receive credit on the faith of his ownership of the land, it was held that she would not be allowed to assert title as against creditors of her husband who relied fully upon his title in extending credit, without knowledge of her rights. Lamm, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Thomas J. Meadows, merchant in the village of Lawson, Ray county, Missouri, doing business under the name and style of Meadows & Company, on May 10, 1905, was adjudged a bankrupt by the district court of the United States for the western division of the western district of Missouri. On due steps taken, Daniel F. Blake was husband, joining also with him in the execution of mortgages upon the same as his land, and allowing innocent persons to become his creditors on the faith that he was the owner of the land, she cannot assert title as against such creditors. Pierce v. Hower, 142 Ind. 626, 42 N. E. 223.

In Lyman v. Cessford, 15 Iowa, 233, it was said, obiter, that if it had appeared in the case that the recorded title of the land sought to be reached by creditors was in the husband at the time of the contracting of the debt, and that the creditors, actually or constructively, gave credit to the husband on the faith of that fact, the court would be inclined to hold that they were entitled to the rights of a prior creditor as against a voluntary unrecorded conveyance, and especially so if it should appear that the wife fraudulently or negligently withheld the deed from record.

Where it appeared that the wife wanted her husband to give her a deed to her land, but that she could not make him do it; that she knew within a short time after the conveyance was made to him that the title was in his name, and that the record showed he was the equitable as well as the legal owner; that she also knew he was of a speculative turn of mind, and was engaged in operations on the board of trade; that he did not acknowledge the trust she claimed, and she nevertheless stood idly by, knowing well that creditors might be deceived, and would give credit to her husband on the strength of his apparent financial ability; that she did not bring suit or do anything to notify persons dealing with her husband of her claims, and allowed him to become involved to such an extent that he was forced to suspend; and that she, at the last moment, when everything seemed to be slipping away from them, accepted a conveyance, knowing that suits had been commenced against her husband, which, in a few days, would ripen into judgments, and absorb the land.— it was held that she could not assert title to the property as against her husband's creditors, her acquiescence and laches, as well as her implied consent to the ostensible ownership of the 30 L.R.A. appointed trustee of the bankrupt estate, and took upon himself the burden of administering the trust. Presently said Blake lodged his bill in equity in the Clay circuit court, charging (among other things) that Meadows in March, 1898, by a deed duly executed by the then owners, became seised in fee of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the S. $\frac{3}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, section 35, township 54, range 30, in Clay county; that he took possession under his deed, and thenceforth represented himself, with the knowledge and consent of defendant, as the owner; that subsequently he became indebted to divers persons in sundry sums, proved and allowed against his estate in bankruptcy; that in February, 1905, intending thereby to hinder and defraud his creditors, he, by a land, estopping her from claiming title. Iseminger v. Criswell, 98 Iowa, 382, 67 N. W. 289.

A wife, having for twenty years allowed her land to stand in her husband's name, to be held by him in secret trust for her benefit, the husband occupying the premises, and treating them in all respects as his own, credit being extended to him in reliance upon such ownership. it was held that she must be presumed to have known that, in the ordinary course of business, he would be likely to obtain credit by reason of his ostensible ownership, and that, having consented that the land stand in his name, she ought not to be heard to say, as against those extending credit in reliance on the security, that she, rather than he, owned the property. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Perkins, 135 Iowa, 64, 110 N. W. 15.

In Rieschick v. Klingelhoefer, 91 Mo. App. 430, it was held that property paid for and improved by daughters, in their mother's name, was liable for the satisfaction of those debts of the apparent owner, contracted on the faith of the apparent ownership.

Although real estate may have been purchased with the money of the wife, the intention being to have the title in her name, if, after the title is taken in the name of her husband, she permits it so to remain for several years, knowing that her husband is engaged in mercantile business, she will be estopped from asserting title as against creditors extending credit on the faith of such ownership. Roy v. McPherson, 11 Neb. 197, 7 N. W. 873.

In Laing v. Evans, 64 Neb. 454, 90 N. W. 246, it was held that a wife who, in 1881, procured her husband to buy land for her in his own name, and left the contract in his name until 1896, when the property was paid for and the deed made to her, and who had, in the meantime, permitted the husband to lease the land, take notes for rent in his own name, and manage it as his own, was estopped to claim as against a creditor who had, with knowledge of such management, but with no actual knowledge of the deed put of record, conveyed said farm to his wife, the defendant, Susie L., said deed reciting a consideration of $8,000; that the deed was without any consideration in fact, but on the pretended consideration that Susie L. had paid the purchase price at the time of the conveyance to Thomas J. in 1898, and that the conveyance to her was an execution of a pretended trust arising on such payment of the original purchase money; that such pretended consideration should not avail as legal or valid, because Susie L. at the time had no intention of claiming the land as her own, or claiming any indebtedness due her by Thomas J. by reason of her furnishing such purchase money; that if she furnished the purchase money, it was not paid upon a purchase of the land in her own behalf or for her use and benefit, but in order to have the land conveyed to Thomas J. as his own, and to enable him to obtain and have credit in carrying on business; further, that such pretended consideration should not prevail as a valid or legal one, for the reason that the title was allowed to remain in Thomas J. of record from April, 1898, to the 9th day of February, 1905, with the knowledge and acquiescence of defendant, during which time Thomas J., with her consent, held possession of the land, controlled and dealt with it as his own, held himself out as the owner, and was recognized as the owner while engaged in business as a merchant, which required him to incur liability and to obtain and have credit on the faith of contract, loaned the husband money in 1894, on the faith of his ownership of the land.

If a wife vests her property in her husband, and permits him to appear to the world to be the owner thereof, and he contracts debts in the course of business, while he is apparently such owner, she is estopped to deny, as against the creditors, that he is the owner. Mertens v. Schlemme, 68 N. J. Eq. 544, 59 Atl. 808.

Where a woman voluntarily permits her husband to retain the apparent title to her property, and to deal with it as his own for twenty-eight years, she is estopped from afterwards asserting her claim as against creditors of the husband, who have dealt with him upon the faith of his apparent ownership. Sears v. Davis, 40 Or. 236, 66 Pac. 913.

Where a mother conveyed property to her son for the purpose of avoiding confiscation during the Rebellion, it was held that, by making the conveyance valid and effective on its face, and permitting the same to be registered, she thereby held her son out to the world as the owner of the property, enabling him to obtain credit on the strength thereof, and that she would be estopped to deny his title, to the prejudice of persons so extending credit. Susong v. Williams, 1 Heisk. 625.

But in Bicocchi v. Casey-Swasey Co. 91 Tex. 259, 66 Am. St. Rep. 875, 42 S. W. 963, the court was of the opinion that the question of estoppel was not really involved in the last-mentioned case, and that the whole case was disposed of on the question of its being a voluntary conveyance.

After title to land has remained in the owner's husband for a period of seven years or more, and by proper diligence she might have ascertained that fact, it was held that she would not be permitted to maintain title as against one who extended credit to the husband on the faith of his apparent ownership, and who had obtained a lien, especially where, after ascertaining the existence of the title in her husband, and securing a deed of the property from him, she had failed to record the deed for nearly a year, during which time the rights of her husband's creditors had matured. Smith v. Willard, 174 Ill. 538, 66 Am. St. Rep. 313, 51 N. E. 835.

One who negligently allows the legal title to go to another, with the apparent power to convey and mortgage the land, will not be allowed to assert title as against one who innocently loans money on the strength of the apparent ownership, the rule of equity which controls being that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud of a third person, he who trusts the third person, and places the means in his hands to commit the wrong, must bear the loss. Lawrence v. Guaranty Invest. Co. 51 Kan. 222, 32 Pac. 816.

Where a husband knows of and acquiesces in the holding of property claimed by and in the name of his wife, he cannot assert his interest, to the prejudice of her judgment creditors. Stewart v. Mix, 30 La. Ann. 1036.

In Greer v. Mitchell, 42 W. Va. 494, 26 S. E. 302, the owner of land, having himself conveyed it to another, and allowed it to remain in the latter's name for years, was held estopped from asserting title as against third persons extending credit on the faith of the apparent ownership.

b. Constructive notice.

In Crouse v. Morse, 49 Iowa, 387, the doctrine that when property is intrusted to an agent, which he uses and controls as his own, and while so in his possession it is seized on execution for his debts, the owner is estopped from claiming the property, was held not to apply to a case in which real estate of the wife was deeded to her husband by mistake, and was reconveyed to her before the creditors of the husband who became such on the strength of the latter's apparent title, had obtained judgment and a lien upon the property. Day, J., dissenting, however, said that if it had been shown that a deed was upon record, conveying the property to her husband, and that she had permitted it to remain there, proclaiming a falsehood to the world, there could be no question that she would be estopped to inhis financial ability to discharge his obligations as they matured; that defendant well knew all this; that Thomas J. was thereby enabled to and did obtain credit upon the faith and belief of his ownership of said lands, and that the claims and demands allowed against his estate in bankruptcy were contracted and credit therefor extended on the faith and belief he was such owner; that the conveyance to Susie L. left him without sufficient assets to pay such debts, and the effect of it was to render him insolvent; and that, the premises considered, the deed is fraudulent and void as to such creditors, and void as to the plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy. Wherefore, etc.

After sundry intermediate steps and incidents, not material here, issue was joined by answer charging, among other things, that defendant's maiden name was Cummins; that she was the only child of Madison B. and Emma J. Cummins; that Madison B. died in February, 1898, Thomas J. Meadows becoming his administrator; that on the 6th of April, 1898, defendant and her said mother, acting through Thomas J. as their agent, purchased the land in controversy; that all of the purchase money (except $2,500) was on deposit in the Commercial Bank of Lawson, in the names of defendant and her said mother, respectively, came from the estate of Madison B., and had been paid over to them by Thomas J. as administrator; that the purchase price of the land (except said $2,500) was sist upon the truth against a person misled to his prejudice by the falsehood. The difficulty in applying the doctrine of estoppel grew out of the fact that she did not know that the property was deeded to her husband, but the husband was general agent of his wife, and the agent knew that the deed was made to him by mistake when it was procured from the recorder's office. That it was his duty to communicate that fact to his principal, and that, for his neglect or omission to do so, the party who reposed confidence in him, and intrusted him with the powers and duties of an agent, should suffer rather than an innocent third person. The knowledge of the agent was the knowledge of the principal. There was nothing peculiar in the doctrine of estoppel, which required that the conduct creating the estoppel must be that individually of the party sought to be affected by it. "It would, indeed, be a strange doctrine," he continued, "if a party could entirely surrender the active control and management of his property to an agent, remain personally ignorant of everything respecting it, and then escape, solely upon the ground of ignorance, all application of the doctrine of estoppel."

But the weakness of this position was pointed out in Huot v. Reeder Bros. Shoe Co. 140 Mich. 162, 103 N. W. 569, in which it was held that knowledge of the husband, acting as agent of his wife, that he had taken title to her real estate in his own name, is not the knowledge of the wife, so as to estop her from asserting title thereafter, since the doctrine which imputes to the principal the knowledge possessed by his agent does not apply where the agent, though nominally acting as such, is in reality acting in his own or another's interest, and adversely to that of his principal.

III. Title in another without acquiescence, laches, or fraud of owner.

It is usually held that the mere fact that property stands in the name of another is not sufficient to estop the owner from setting up his title as against the creditors of the apparent owner. Nor will mere knowledge of the fact that title is in another, if there is no intention to deceive, and no acquiescence amounting to laches on the part of the owner, stand in the way of his title. It is often difficult, however, to draw the line at the point where failure to act after knowledge becomes negligent or fraudulent as to creditors of the holder of the legal title.

In Bennett v. Strait, 63 Iowa, 620, 19 N. W. 806, it was held that a wife would not be estopped from asserting equitable title to her land as against creditors of her husband merely because title was taken in the name of the husband, and while thus held the debts were contracted. The court said that the law of estoppel has no application from the mere fact of the husband's holding the title when the debt was contracted.

That money was loaned on the faith of the apparent ownership of land of the wife, held in the husband's name, will not prevent the wife from asserting title as against the creditor, where she did not know that her husband was engaged in any hazardous business, or in any business transacted, in whole or in part, on credit, since the wife, by permitting the husband to hold the title to her land by recorded deed in his own name, will not, without other act or representation on her part, be estopped to deny the title as against a creditor who, without her knowledge, gave credit to the husband upon the faith of his ownership as it appeared of record. De Berry v. Wheeler, 128 Mo. 85, 49 Am. St. Rep. 538, 30 S. W. 338. The court said it must be conceded that the wife, by permitting record title to the land to remain in her husband, represented to the public that her husband was the owner of it. Yet in this alone no one could be defrauded. The fraud and consequent estoppel would only exist when she knew, or, from all the circumstances, ought to have known, that others, relying upon what she permitted to record to tell them, were dealing or might deal with the husband in such a manner as to cause them to alter their previous condition, to their injury.

paid by checks drawn by said Thomas J. against the said accounts of defendant and her mother, said checks being signed respectively by the names of defendant and her mother by said Thomas J.; that said $2,500 was borrowed for defendant and her mother from one J. H. Roney, and was subsequently paid out of moneys belonging to defendant and her mother, derived from their separate estates; that defendant and her mother were wholly unfamiliar with legal blanks, documents, forms of conveyances, of the manner of executing deeds or mortgages, and business generally; that, without the knowledge or consent of defendant or her mother, said Thomas J. took title to the land in his own name, and that defendant's mother died in December, 1900, intestate, without knowledge of the fact that Thomas J., in violation of his trust, had taken title in his own name, she at all times supposing that title to be in herself and Susie L., her only heir; that this defendant did not learn for a long time that the title had been taken in the name of Thomas J., and, as soon as she found it out, demanded of him that he put the title in her name and that of her mother, where it belonged; that frequently, before and after her mother's death, she requested that the deed be corrected and the title placed in the names of the rightful owners; that Thomas J. at all times expressed a willingness and promised to comply with such request, but failed to do so until he executed a deed to defendant in

The fact that a town site corporation temporarily placed the title of land in the name of a natural person, in order to have certain corrections made on the plats, was held not to prevent it from asserting its title as against a creditor of such person, induced to make a loan to him upon the faith of his apparent ownership of the property, there being no evidence that there was any fraudulent intent on the part of the company to permit the title of the property to remain in him. Hickox v. Eastman, 21 S. D. 591, 114 N. W. 706.

A wife who furnished one half of the money with which to purchase land, under an agreement with her husband, who furnished the other half, that the deed was to be made out to them jointly, was held not estopped from asserting, as against the husband's creditors, her title to such land, which, without her knowledge, had been put in the name of her husband, who became a bankrupt, there being nothing to show any act whatever on her part to induce persons to give credit to her husband as the sole owner of the land. Garner v. Findley, 110 Fed. 123.

A conveyance in good faith to a wife, of land equal in value to money advanced for the purchase thereof, the title to which was first taken in the husband's name, will stand as against the claim of a creditor of the husband, who obtained judgment thereon after such conveyance, it not appearing that the wife had ever said or done anything to mislead the creditor, or warrant him in believing that she treated the property as her husband's exclusive property, and it not being shown that she permitted him to use it as such. Bell v. Stewart, 98 Ga. 669, 27 S. E. 153.

Where the debtor had nothing but the naked legal title to land, the owner remaining in possession, and it did not appear that there was any fraud or concealment, or that the debtor's deed was of record, even, or that the owner had knowledge of the credit extended to the debtor, it was held that the fact that goods were sold to the debtor on the faith of his ownership would not estop the owner from asserting title. Hays v. Reger, 102 Ind. 524, 1 N. E. 380. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where land was conveyed to a daughter of the purchaser, it was held that the latter would not be estopped from asserting title as against a creditor of the daughter, extending credit on the strength of the apparent ownership, where it was not shown that the purchaser knew anything of the dealings between the daughter and the creditor, or knew that he had obtained a judgment against the daughter, until after the land had been conveyed to the purchaser by the daughter. Moore v. Scruggs, 131 Iowa, 692, 117 Am. St. Rep. 437, 109 N. W. 205.

Where the wife's land is conveyed to the husband by mistake, the wife is not estopped to claim it as against a subsequent creditor of the husband, where she has done nothing to mislead the creditor. Huot v. Reeder Bros. Shoe Co. 140 Mich. 162, 103 N. W. 569.

The wife will not be estopped from asserting her title to her land as against her husband's creditors unless her conduct has been such as to lead them to believe that the husband was the actual owner of the property, and to extend credit to him on that ground. Cleghorn v. Obernalte, 53 Neb. 687, 74 N. W. 62.

In Moulton v. Haley, 57 N. H. 184, where land was purchased with the wife's money, and the deed was, without her knowledge, taken in the name of her husband, it was held that she could not be estopped by what was done without her consent and against her will.

That the wife permitted her husband to have title to her land in his own name will not estop her from asserting title as against her husband's creditors, where she believed that her husband had purchased the property in her name, and did not learn until some time afterwards that it was not in her name, there being no element of participation on the part of the wife in the fraud of the husband. Mayer v. Kane, 69 N. J. Eq. 733, 61 Atl. 374.

Where a wife did not know that title to her property had been taken in the name of her husband, and she did not discover

February, 1905; that Thomas J. paid none of the consideration for the purchase of the land; that the conveyance to defendant in February, 1905, was only doing what in law, equity, and good conscience he ought to do, for that he held the title in trust for defendant and her mother, and, after her mother's death, for this defendant alone; that said conveyance was and is no fraud upon the creditors of Thomas J., nor was it made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding anyone, but, to the contrary, was made solely for the purpose of executing the trust resulting as aforesaid; that Thomas J. did not engage in a business necessary for him to incur debts with the knowledge or consent of defendant or her mother, nor hold out to the world their consent, or acknowledge the land as his property, nor was he extended credit upon the faith of such ownership; that defendant had good cause to believe and did believe that Thomas J. was free from debt and in a prosperous financial condition, and that defendant at no time knew or had reason to believe that he was in debt or had incurred liability, or that anyone was extending him credit upon faith of apparent ownership of said land, and that while the mother lived, she and defendant, and, since the mother's death, this defendant, at all times claimed to be the absolute owners of said property, received the rents, paid the taxes, and exercised the usual and ordinary rights, dominion, and control over the property in-this fact until after credit was extended to him on the strength of the apparent ownership, it was held that she was not estopped from asserting her title. Woolsey v. Henn, 85 App. Div. 331, 83 N. Y. Supp. 394.

A married woman in joint possession of land with her husband was held not bound to record her deed, under pain of losing the land if seized by the husband's creditors, though they had no actual or constructive notice of the title at the time they gave credit, or filed judgments against the occupant. Feig v. Meyers, 102 Pa. 10.

The wife is not estopped from setting up her title to land as against the creditors of her husband, because of the fact that she joined with him in a deed of one half of the tract standing in his name. Hay v. Martin, 2 Monaghan (Pa.) 526, 14 Atl. 333.

Nor will the fact that the husband had made declarations to the effect that he owned the land, the fact that he had erected improvements on it, and the fact that he had leased it and paid the taxes and insurance in his own name, prevent her from asserting title. Ibid.

The fact that a fraudulent grantee of property represented it to be his own, and obtained credit on the faith of the ownership, will not estop the fraudulent grantor, after a reconveyance of the property to him, from asserting his title. Bicocchi v. Casey-Swasey Co. 91 Tex. 259, 66 Am. St. Rep. 875, 42 S. W. 963.

Where property was paid for by the wife's father, and intended to be conveyed to her, the title to which, however, being, by collusion between the husband and the grantor, put in the husband's name, it was held that the fact that the wife did not promptly assert her rights therein did not estop her as against creditors of her husband, it not appearing distinctly that she knew how the legal title stood, or exactly what her father's intentions were until after his death, and where she was under the disabilities of coverture, and asserted her title long before it was assailed. Steagall v. Steagall, 90 Va. 73, 17 S. E. 756.

A wife, in the absence of bad faith, was held not estopped from claiming property, the record title to which was in her husband at the time he contracted the debts sought to be fastened upon the land. Kemp v. Folsom, 14 Wash. 16, 43 Pac. 1100. The court thought it would be too harsh a rule to announce that, under any circumstances, the wife should be estopped from claiming her interest in realty which had been held in the name of the husband, as against the creditors of the husband, for credit obtained during the time such land was so held, notwithstanding the fact that the intimate relations existing between husband and wife render the perpetration of a fraud upon creditors in this sort of a transaction more probable than in cases where the parties do not stand towards each other in such relations. The court thought the better rule would be to insist upon the most clear and convincing proof of good faith in the transaction; but that when it did conclusively appear from the testimony that the property in dispute was actually the separate property of the wife, her interest ought to be protected by the courts, notwithstanding the fact that the record title was allowed to remain for a while in the husband.

Mere silence on the part of the wife, who is the equitable owner of land, even if she knows of the mistake by which a deed thereto was placed in the name of her husband, will not estop her from asserting title as against a creditor of the latter, since this involves no representation or act on her part by which the creditors could be misled to their prejudice. Smith v. Gott, 51 W. Va. 141, 41 S. E. 175.

In Byers v. Prewitt, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 991, where land paid for by the wife's money was conveyed to the husband, who afterwards conveyed to the wife, the court refused to subject the land to the husband's debts.

A house and lot having been purchased with the means of the wife, under an agreement by which the title was to be made to her, the title having been taken in the name of the husband, it was held that, as between his creditors and his wife, he must be re-cident to absolute ownership, and made improvements thereon. The reply, pleading no new matter, denied seriatim the averments of the answer. At a trial on the merits, a decree went in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The record is of great volume, and no good purpose would be subserved by spreading on the pages of our reports the evidence in detail. It appears therefrom that Emma J. Cummins was a very old lady (three score and ten), and died two years after her husband; that her husband, Madison D., died out of debt and seised of considerable estate in Ray and adjoining counties, leaving her as his widow and defendant as his only child and heir; that Thomas J. Meadows, married to defendant some seven or eight years, was about thirty-eight years old, and was possessed of no estate; that he was appointed administrator of his father-in-law's estate and subsequently of that of his mother-in-law; that, there being ready money on hand on the death of Madison B., the question of safely investing it became a matter of family discussion, with the result that Thomas J. acted on behalf of his wife and mother-in-law in the purchase of the land in question in Clay county for $9,600, taking title in himself. Not a penny of the purchase money was paid by him out of his own means, but all of it came from the separate estates of his wife and mother-in-law, share and share alike. There was abundant evidence showing that this pur-was held that a secret trust arising in favor of the husband as the real owner. Darnaby v. Darnaby, 1 Ky. L. Rep. 399.

Permitting real estate purchased with partnership money to stand in the name of one of the partners will not estop the partnership from claiming the title as against one giving the partner credit on the faith of the apparent title of the property. Goldthwaite v. Janney, 102 Ala. 431, 28 L.R.A. 161, 48 Am. St. Rep. 56, 15 So. 560.

A wife's participation in the fraud of her husband, who obtained credit by representing himself to be the owner of his wife's land, is not shown by the fact that she permitted the property to stand in her husband's name, thereby giving him a fictitious and deceptive credit, in the absence of any knowledge on her part that her husband was doing business on credit, or that, in order to secure credit, he represented himself to be the owner of the property. Alkire Grocer Co. v. Ballenger, 137 Mo. 369, 38 S. W. 911.

Where title to property was taken in the husband's name, with the understanding that he was to convey it to the wife when she desired, and he having conveyed it when solvent, and without fraudulent intent on the part of either, neither the husband nor the wife knowing that credit was extended on the faith of such ownership, it was held that the wife would not be estopped from asserting her title. Marston v. Dresen, 85 Wis. 530, 55 N. W. 896, distinguishing Hopkins v. Joyce, 78 Wis. 443, 47 N. W. 722, supra, I.

Where the wife, as soon as she learned that the deed to her property had been taken in the name of her husband, at once took steps to have it set aside, it was held that there was no laches or delay on her part that would defeat her rights as against a creditor of her husband, and that she was entitled to relief against a purchaser at an execution sale, who purchased pendente lite, with full notice of her equities. Keller v. Keller, 45 Md. 269.

But in Citizens' Bank v. Burrus, 178 Mo. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

716, 77 S. W. 748, it was assumed that a surety induced to extend on the husband's representation that he owned property of his wife's, standing in his name, might assert estoppel against the wife if he had first paid the debt.

IV. Judgment Lien.

That credit is extended on the faith of the fact that the title to property is in the name of a woman, who, however, holds it in trust for her children, will not enable creditors to set aside the conveyance to the children before they acquire a lien thereon, merely because of the intention to defeat, by such conveyance, the claims of such creditors. Dodd v. Bond, 88 Ga. 360, 14 S. E. 581. The court said: "Whatever may be the true view of the law, where a debtor conveys his own property to a creditor, we are satisfied that where one conveys property not his own, which he wrongfully holds, to the rightful owner, the law does not require the latter to yield his rights and decline taking it because the person who has withheld it wrongfully may, in returning it, intend thereby to keep his own creditors from getting it. One who takes merely what is his own is not punished for considerations which may operate upon the mind of the party who gives it up. In this case the wrongful holder of property was performing a legal and moral duty—was doing that which, in the eyes of the law, ought to have been done—in placing the property where it belonged."

Where land was bought for a woman with her money, and the title taken in the name of her husband, under the assurance that it would be changed by deeding it to a third person, who would reconvey to her, and the property was afterwards conveyed to her under this agreement, it was held that it was not subject to sale under execution by a creditor, having, at the time of conveyance, no judgment to become a lien upon it. Van Dorn v. Leeper, 95 Ill. 35.

But in Zimmer v. Dansby, 56 Ga. 79, it chase was on behalf of the two women, who, unfamiliar with business forms and ways, trusted the whole transaction to him as their agent, and lived with him under one roof as one family. They took no part in negotiating the purchase, in concocting or delivering the deed, or in making payment, and were not present at any step. They expected the title to be taken in their names. Mrs. Cummins died without knowing it was not. The defendant knew no better until a month or so after the deed was returned, after record, by the recorder of Clay county, at which time she first saw it and read it over. It was shown (and not contradicted) that defendant, on then ascertaining the title did not stand in the names of her mother and herself, but in her husband's, requested him to correct the deed and put the title in the rightful owners, and he promised to do so. Ascertaining subsequently he had neglected to perform his promise, the same request was again made and the same promise given. These requests and promises were renewed from time to time under similar circumstances, until finally, in February, 1905, the deed was made. The mother was not told, because she was old, and defendant did not want to worry her. If this were the whole case, there could be no question about the law of it. Under such circumstances there was a resulting trust in favor of those who furnished the purchase money for the land, and a clear equity to have the same enforced. Equity consider-of the wife out of the fact that the title to her land was taken in her husband's name will not prevail against a judgment lien obtained without notice, actual or constructive, of the existence of such trust.

V. Extension of credit on faith of apparent ownership.

It is well established that a creditor of the holder of the legal title to land is not in a position to invoke the doctrine of estoppel against the real owner, in any event, unless credit has been extended on the faith of the apparent ownership. Smith v. Gott, 51 W. Va. 141, 41 S. E. 175; Cleghorn v. Obernalte, 53 Neb. 687, 74 N. W. 62.

The true owner will not be estopped from asserting ownership as against creditors of a person in whom the record title appeared, where it is not shown that the credits were induced or extended on the basis that the latter was the owner of the land. Hagerly v. Goodland, 70 Kan. 734, 79 Pac. 664.

A creditor having knowledge of the equity of the real owner can have no better right to the property than he who holds the legal title. Taylor v. Smith, 54 Miss. 50.

The courts agree that it must appear that the credit was extended to the husband on the faith of his apparent ownership of his wife's land. Standard Mercantile Co. v. Ellis, 48 W. Va. 309, 37 S. E. 593.

The debt must not have been contracted before the debtor had any apparent interest in his wife's property. Bangert v. Bangert, 13 Mo. App. 144.

The equity of the husband's creditors will not be superior to that of the wife to a piece of property, the title to which is taken in his name, if it is not shown that the creditor relied on the ownership of the property in extending credit. Goldsmith v. Fuller, 30 Neb. 563, 46 N. W. 712.

Where the creditor extends no credit to the husband on the supposition that he is the owner of the property, because of the fact that the record title is in his name, the wife's equity as real owner is superior to that of the creditor. Hews v. Kenney, 43 Neb. 815, 62 N. W. 204.

Manifestly, where the claim against the apparent owner is founded in tort, the doctrine of estoppel cannot be invoked. Lillis v. Gallagher, 39 N. J. Eq. 93.

In Brown v. West, 70 Ga. 201, land having been purchased with the wife's money, and title taken in the name of her husband, it was held that, in an effort to subject the land by a mortgage creditor of the husband to the payment of indebtedness, the controlling question was whether the creditor gave credit to the husband on the faith of his apparent ownership of the property, and without notice of the wife's equity; that, if so, he could subject it to the payment of the debt; but that if not, and he knew of the wife's equity, he could not subject it thereto, since, if credit were given on the faith of other property, he would not be injured by the existence of a secret equity in the wife.

A husband cannot, without his wife's consent, convey land belonging to her, to a third person, even for the purpose of securing her own debt, or indemnifying one who stands security for her, when such person has knowledge as to the true ownership of the land. Latham v. Latham, 98 Ga. 477, 25 S. E. 505.

Land bought by a husband for his wife, and paid for with her money, is equitably her property; and though he takes the legal title to the same, it cannot, as against the claim by her, be lawfully subjected to the satisfaction of a judgment against him, if, at the time of the creation of the debt on which the judgment is founded, credit was not given to the husband on the faith of his apparent ownership of such land. Burt v. Kuhn, 113 Ga. 1143, 39 S. E. 414.

The wife was held not estopped from asserting title to her property, title to which was in her husband's name, as against a creditor of the latter, extending credit on the faith of his apparent ownership, where, long before the debts were contracted, she was in exclusive possession by her tenants under a conveyance from her husband, and an inquiry from those in possession would have disclosed the ownership, and where the deed was not withheld from the record ing that done which should have been done, the execution of the trust by the conveyance of the husband to the wife would be but an act of tardy justice, absent any evidence that the farm, or its purchase money, was an out-and-out gift to Thomas J. Meadows, and we see no competent evidence of that sort. But there is something else in the case, and that something else is claimed by learned counsel for plaintiff to estop the wife from the right to have the trust executed, and to make the conveyance void as in fraud of the creditors of her husband. This contention seeks other facts, viz.:

The suit was brought on behalf of those creditors claiming to extend credit on the faith of Meadows's ownership of the land. The decree proceeds on that theory, and, omitting some creditors from its benefits, enumerates a list entitled to a lien for their debts, aggregating $14,387.04. One of these is the Commercial Bank of Lawson, having claims aggregating $7,901.93; another is one John Roney, having a claim for $675. In taking the laboring oar in proof of the allegation that faith and credit was given by the respective creditors to Meadows's ownership of the land, plaintiff put in some evidence pertinent to the bank, other evidence pertinent to Roney, still other pertinent to the other members of the favored class of creditors, and some common to all. It will serve a useful purpose to preserve that line of distinction. Accordingly, under (a), (b), (c), and (d), we will severally state the tendency of the testimony common to all, that pertinent to the bank, that pertinent to Roney, and that pertinent to creditors other than the bank and Roney.

(a) Common to all: Keeping in mind facts already disclosed, it seems that, for with any purpose on her part of aiding her husband in incurring indebtedness on the strength of the title as it appeared of record. Ray v. Teabout, 65 Iowa, 157, 21 N. W. 497.

A wife cannot be estopped from setting up title to land standing in the name of her husband for seventeen years, as against a creditor of the husband, if credit was not extended to him on the strength of his apparent ownership. DeVore v. Jones, 82 Iowa, 66, 47 N. W. 885.

The doctrine that where the apparent title to real property belonging to a wife is by her permitted to be in her husband, and third persons, on the strength of such apparent title, and in good faith, extend credit to him, she will be estopped to deny such title, does not apply so as to estop a wife as against a purchaser of a dishonored note of her husband, given before he obtained title to her property. Moore v. Rawlings, 137 Iowa, 284, 114 N. W. 1040.

In Holthaus v. Farris, 24 Kan. 784, it was said that no grounds of estoppel against a wife existed where the record title had not passed into the name of her husband with her knowledge and consent, and the debt sued on was not created on the faith of such ownership.

The wife is not estopped from asserting her title as against her husband's creditors, where it does not appear that credit was extended on the strength of the apparent ownership of the property in the husband, and it is not shown that the wife knew, or ought to have known, that credit was extended because of the fact that the title was in her husband's name. McAdow v. Hassard, 58 Kan. 171, 48 Pac. 846.

A wife is not estopped to claim that property is in fact hers if her husband's creditor, when he gave credit, had such notice or information as to the actual ownership of the property as would put a man of ordinary business prudence upon inquiry. Chadborn v. Williams, 45 Minn. 294, 47 N. W. 812.

Where the wife did not know at the time credit was extended to her husband that the title to her land was in the husband's name, and where the creditor did not extend credit on the strength of the apparent ownership, the wife will not be estopped to assert her title. Scrutchfield v. Sauter, 119 Mo. 615, 24 S. W. 137. The court said that, in order to constitute an estoppel, there must have been not only a false representation or concealment of the facts, but they must have been knowingly made by the one to be estopped, and believed and acted upon by the one claiming the estoppel.

The payee of a note, not misled by the wife's act in permitting title to her real estate to be in the name of her husband, cannot invoke the doctrine of estoppel against her, since no one can invoke estoppel to stay the assertion of a truth by another who is not himself misled by, or induced to do some act or thing to his injury on account of, such false act, conduct, or deed of the other, which otherwise he would not have done, or when he who invokes the rule had no knowledge of the false action of the other at the time he acted. Citizens' Bank v. Burrus, 178 Mo. 716, 77 S. W. 748.

Where the wife permitted her husband to hold title to certain lands for over ten years, during which time no debts were contracted on credit of his ownership, and when, after that, her husband was about to embark in business, she requested that the title should be put in such form that no one could be deceived or misled, and where the fact that the deeds were not put on record at once was satisfactorily explained, and no part of the creditor's debt was contracted until the deeds had been on record for more than a month, and credit was not given to the husband on the faith of his ownership of the land, it was held that the lands were not liable for the husband's debts. City Nat. Bank v. Hamilton, 34 N. J. Eq. 158.

Where credit was extended because the creditor had known the debtor for many the rise of four years after the purchase of the land, viz., from April, 1898, to December, 1902, Meadows was not engaged in the mercantile business. The record shows that during the lifetime of his mother-in-law he filled the role of man of affairs to her and to his wife, renting out not only the Clay county land, but other tracts of cultivating land in Ray county, belonging to the Cummins estate, collecting the rents, attending to improvements of some magnitude, and administering on the estate of Madison B. The mother-in-law died in 1900, and Meadows added to his occupation that of administering on her estate. The record does not disclose that his relations with the two women were in anywise strained. He seems to have had their full confidence and trust. They lived in the village of Lawson. The lands belonging to the Cummins estate were elsewhere. In paying taxes his habit was to take tax receipts in his own name on all these lands, including that in dispute. There is no contention that he used his own money to pay the taxes on other land, or that he appropriated the rents of any other land, but it is contended that he, as proprietor, appropriated the rents of the Clay county land, and paid the taxes out of his own means. On this score it may be said that the testimony did not disclose that he had a very definite or settled idea of meum et tuum, or of maintaining a line of cleavage between his own and his wife's separate means. It is shown that he drew checks to pay the taxes on the Clay county land against his own bank account, but how that account was made up is not clear. Defendant testified that she furnished the money to pay these taxes. For the first two or three years he put the rent money years, and had done business with him, and knew him to be a man of commercial standing, and reputed to be the owner of a great deal of property, and not on the strength of the debtor's apparent ownership of a parcel of his wife's land, it was held that the wife would not be estopped from asserting her title as against the creditor. Rawson v. Bogen, 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 1022.

In German Ins. Co. v. Bartlett, 188 Ill. 165, 80 Am. St. Rep. 172, 58 N. E. 1075, a married woman was held not estopped from asserting title to a homestead as against execution creditors of her husband, because she did not at once put a declaration of trust under which her husband held the property on record, and because, after deeds conveying the title to her were delivered, they were not recorded for a period of thirty days, where it did not appear that the creditors were in any way misled, or that the declaration of trust and deeds were withheld from record by reason of any agreement made by her with her husband, and where she secured title to the property, of which she was justly and equitably the owner, before they reduced their claims to judgment.

The equity of a creditor who has not been misled or defrauded by any voluntary act of the wife, who has permitted her property to rest in her husband's name, the creditor having failed to assert his claim before the completion of the wife's legal title, cannot be permitted to prevail over her equity. Campbell v. Campbell, 3 Ky. L. Rep. 15.

VI. Negligence in extending credit.

In Gallagher v. Northrup, 215 Ill. 563, 74 N. E. 711, an estoppel was held not applicable against the equitable owner of land title to which was placed in the name of her son for the purpose of having a conveyance of it to her, and in favor of one who had accepted the son as surety on a bond, on the strength of his apparent ownership, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

where tenants were in possession of the premises, and the rents were collected by the equitable owner, and the facts as to the ownership could have been ascertained by inquiry of the tenants.

Where a conveyance of real property is obtained from the owner by fraud, and a general creditor of the fraudulent grantee asserts that he gave credit upon faith in such apparent ownership, and claims that the owner should be estopped to deny the title of the fraudulent grantee, such estoppel will be denied when the reliance upon such apparent ownership is not clearly established, and the creditor appears to have been as negligent in extending credit as was the owner in the original transaction. Rihner v. Jacobs, 79 Neb. 742, 113 N. W. 220.

Where the creditors relied on the mere fact that one to whom credit was extended lived on the land, and claimed in his conversations with them that the property was his, and the fact that he was insolvent and that the real owner of the property knew it, this was held not to estop the real owner from asserting title, it being shown that the creditors did not rely on any statement made by the owner that the person to whom credit was extended owned the land, and it was not shown that they examined records which might have disclosed the real interests of the parties. Breeze v. Brooks, 71 Cal. 169, 9 Pac. 670, 11 Pac. 885.

The mere fact that a person equitably entitled to real property permits the legal title to remain in another will not estop him from asserting title thereto where no act, conduct, or admission is shown upon his part by which creditors were induced to give credit to him who had the legal title, and where it does not even appear that the creditors knew that the legal title stood in the latter's name, or that any means were taken by them to ascertain the true state of the title. Murphy v. Clayton, 113 Cal. 150, 45 Pac. 267. H. C. S.

of the Clay county land in the bank to his own credit. It is not clear that she knew such to be the fact. For several years next before he conveyed the land to her, such rent was put to her credit in the bank. At all times prior to the conveyance, Meadows assumed to rent the land out in his own name as landlord. The tenant dealt with him alone, and the only time the name of Mrs. Meadows was mentioned between them was when the tenant asked some improvements, and Meadows told him he would see his wife about it. It seems that improvements of some magnitude were made on the farm at the expense of the wife. While there was testimony to the effect that Meadows assumed to control the Clay county land as proprietor, it also seems he assumed the right (without any express authority shown, and without her knowledge) to sign her name to promissory notes, and, without any express authority shown, to draw checks against her bank account, signing her name to such checks. Knowledge that he was claiming the land was not brought home to the defendant. No creditor inquired of her in that behalf, and no statements of hers tending to prove she considered the land her husband's were shown. In December, 1902, Meadows bought into a small mercantile concern in Lawson. She states she was opposed to his doing so, and put her objection on the ground that he had other business to attend to. If she feared his business capacity, the fact is not shown. She acquiesced in his wishes, and furnished him a small amount of money ($350) to buy into the business with one Walker as a partner. The partnership lasted a little while, when she furnished, at his request, the money to buy Walker out,—the entire purchase cost being $750. After buying Walker's interest, the business ran in the name of "Meadows & Company." There were some admissions of Thomas J.'s to the effect that his wife was the "Company." But these statements were not made in her presence, nor did she know of them, nor was she consulted about the style of the firm. No creditor applied to her for information, and she gave out none. So far as appears to us, the even tenor of her domestic life, engrossed with the duties of a wife and housekeeper, unvexed with business affairs, flowed on until at a certain time she was asked to sign a statement that she was her husband's partner. This she refused to do, claiming it was not the fact. While the evidence is somewhat vague in some phases, yet it is substantially shown that from time to time her husband, under pretenses of needing to increase his business or enlarge his stock, applied to her for money. Covering the space of two years she furnished him so much as $3,000. Whether he used it to increase his stock in accordance with his pretense, or to pay bills as they matured, is somewhat dark. But there is no testimony that she actually knew he was incurring liabilities, or running in debt, or establishing a line of credit with wholesale houses, unless an inference to that effect is to be drawn from the mere fact that he was conducting business as a merchant. As against this inference is her positive testimony that he informed her he was out of debt, keeping out, and doing a prosperous business. In 1905 Meadows & Company failed. The stock on hand was the rise of $4,000; the accounts (good, bad, and indifferent) several thousand, of which $2,000 were collectable; and the mercantile debts were, as said, $14,387.04 in the favored class, plus several thousands more, which the trial court excluded from that class. It appears that defendant paid all the running expenses of the Meadows household; and during the years her husband was in business, dealt at the store and paid the bills like any other customer. So much for the evidence common to all.

(b) As to creditors other than the bank and Roney: Summarizing the testimony pertinent to such creditors, it was directed to establishing in favor of nine of them the allegation of the petition that credit was extended to Meadows on the strength of his ownership of the Clay county farm. Meadows always refused to make a statement to any commercial agency as the basis of credit. In June, 1903, the R. G. Dun & Company Commercial Agency compiled the following memoranda and forwarded it to its offices, a copy of which for the next year or so was supplied to any wholesale house desiring one, viz.: "T. J. Meadows is married and aged about thirty-seven years. He is an old resident of the place. Considered of good general character, fair habits and ability. At one time he was associated with one 'Walker' under the style of Meadows & Company. In December, 1902, he started his present venture, succeeding to the business of John C. Wright. The 'Company' of the firm is supposed to be his wife, Susie L. Meadows. The investment in the business is thought to represent a capital of about $1,500, stock in trade averaging $1,500 to $2,000. T. J. Meadows is credited with owning a farm in Clay county, besides some town property, estimated worth, all told, $8,000 or $9,000. Mrs. Meadows is considered worth between $10,000 and $15,000, independent of her husband. Of what her means consist is not stated. They are entitled to homestead exemptions of $1,500, and while it is not known in just what shape all the real estate is, after allowing for exemptions and other contingencies, there is thought attached to the firm a net responsibility of between $8,000 and $10,000. Stock of merchandise, said insured. They appear to be doing reasonably well, obligations are reported met in a reasonably prompt manner, and prospects generally are considered good." All or most all of the creditors got the foregoing report at one time or another.

In August, 1904, the following was furnished by a commercial agency to one creditor:

"Missouri, Ray county.

"December 26, 1902.—He is a married man, aged about forty. Is an old resident of the place and is considered of good character, habits, and fair ability. This business was formerly owned and operated by John C. Wright. For a short time he was associated with one 'Walker' under the style of Meadows & Company. Quite recently Walker withdrew and L. J. Meadows is alone in the business.

"He does not respond to written requests for a statement. The investment is estimated at about $1,000, stock in trade running $1,000 to $1,200. He is said to have considerable outside means, but nature of same is not stated, and a definite estimate of net responsibility is not determined. His stock of merchandise said to be insured.

"He has never failed in business, so far as known, and locally he is reported prompt pay so far as known."

"1903. Ray county.

"January 13, 1902.—Upon further investigation it is found that he has good farm and town property valued at from $7,000 to $8,000 in own name and partly exempt. Also has ready cash, and, making all due allowance, he is considered a net worth of from $5,000 to $7,000.

"It is said doing a good business at this time, and to be meeting obligations in a prompt and satisfactory manner. Considered honest and industrious and believed worthy of confidence."

In 1904 the following special report was made to one creditor by an attorney:

"Supposed net worth? $10,000. Prompt, fair, or slow pay? Prompt. Individual names (if a firm)? T. J. Meadows. Married or single? Married. Reputation for ability? Good. Honesty? Good. Age approximately? Forty years. Moral character? Good. Ever failed? No. Been sued? No. How long in business? Two years. Business seem prosperous? Yes. Value of stock on hand (estimated)? $5,000. Insurance? $2,500. Is there any real estate 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) in his own name, above homestead and encumbrance? Yes. Value? $5,000. Do you know of any unsatisfied obligations, chattel mortgages, judgments, or claims in hands of attorneys? No."

The same creditor got the following report from R. G. Dun & Company:

"Meadows, T. J. & Company, G. S. Lawson, Missouri, July 9th, 1903. He is aged thirty-eight years, married, and has been engaged in this business here for some eight months, prior to which he was engaged in farming. He is in very good standing personally, and thought to be of very fair business ability.

"Declines a statement, but upon investigation it is learned that he carries a stock of some $6,000 or $7,000. Aside from this he is said to own two or three good farms, and some residence property. After allowing for exemptions and shrinkages, he is conceded a net worth of some $8,000 to $10,000 as a basis for credit.

"Locally he meets his bills in a prompt and satisfactory manner, no complaints are ever heard from abroad, is doing a very good business, and prospects are thought to be very favorable at this time. G. 3.

"February 17th, 1904.—Considered of good general character, fair habits and ability. Appear to be doing reasonably well. Meets obligations in a prompt and satisfactory manner. Estimated worth $8,000 to $10,000. Has good prospects for success."

We find at least one creditor received the following under date of October 16, 1903, from a commercial agency:

"This business is conducted by Thomas J. Meadows and his wife, Susie L. Meadows, and they have been in the trade since September, 1902, when they succeeded J. C. Wright. It is strictly a partnership as between husband and wife.

"Previous to engaging in trade, Mr. and Mrs. Meadows resided at Lawson.

"Information obtained by our representative regarding the investment and resources is as follows:

"Merchandise stock on hand, $4,000.

"Real estate title in name of Thomas J. Meadows and Susie L. Meadows, and free of encumbrances, $25,000 to $30,000.

"Other assets, yes, but subject to exemptions, $34,000.

"Total net worth, exclusive of exemptions, as a basis for credit (estimated), $20,000.

"Ever failed? No.

"Ever burn out? No.

"Insurance carried on merchandise stock? Yes.

"Bank with Commercial Bank, Lawson, Missouri.

"About $10,000 of the real estate is in the name of Thomas J. Meadows, and the balance is in the name of his wife, Susie L. Meadows. Together, Meadows and his wife own three farms that are worth $10,000 each. They also own their home in town and have some money loaned out, besides personal property of some value.

"Competent authorities state that Mr. and Mrs. Meadows have a financial responsibility over exemptions safely of $20,000 to $25,000. They are conducting the business upon a cash basis and are prompt in their payments.

"Authorities consulted:

"No. 1. We consider them good for any credit they might ask. We frequently loan them money without security, but as a matter of fact, they have money to loan. Probably worth $25,000, and good pay.

"No. 2. We do not think anyone need hesitate to grant them credit as they are amply responsible. Are worth $20,000 to $25,000 easily. Payments are prompt and frequently discounted."

And in 1904 the following report was furnished to at least one creditor:

"Meadows & Company.....general store.....Lawson, Missouri, Ray county.

"T. J. Meadows, age forty-one, married.

"Mrs. Susie L. Meadows, age thirty-two, married.

"Statement asked for August 10th, 1904, but no answer received. This business was commenced under style of Meadows & Walker in the fall of 1902, R. J. Walker being a partner, sharing the profits. Later the style of the firm changed to above, and is composed of T. J. Meadows and his wife. They are now reported to have $6,000 invested. Their stock is estimated worth $3,500 to $4,000; it is insured, but the amount is not learned. Said to own homestead in the name of Susie L. Meadows, worth $3,000, clear, and other real estate worth $15,000 to $20,000 in the name of the members of the firm, located in Clay and Ray counties, Missouri. They are reported to be using $5,000 borrowed money.

"They are highly regarded personally, and Mr. Meadows, who has charge of the business, is considered a good business man. All bills, as far as learned, are promptly met, and prospects appear fair. Authorities at the present time offer $15,000 as an estimate of their net worth."

One creditor, Mr. Henderson, testified that Thomas J. Meadows told him he owned a good farm over in Clay county, and was all right financially in every way; also that a Mr. Hurt told him he knew it to be a fact that Meadows owned a farm in Clay county in his own name. The first remark was made to Henderson by Meadows after he had established a line of credit, and during a talk about increasing it. When Hurt gave Henderson his information does not appear.

The "credit men" of firms dealing with Meadows & Company testified that they passed on the credit given Meadows on the information disclosed upon the fact that Susie L. Meadows was a partner, and upon the fact that Meadows was said to own a farm. There is no proof of any land in his name except the farm in question.

(c) Of the Commercial Bank of Lawson: Meadows's chief creditor is the Commercial Bank of Lawson. It received no commercial reports. It did business with Meadows on the theory his wife was a partner. The officers of the bank knew she had inherited a large property. When he became involved largely with the bank, and before the renewal of some of his existing indebtedness, coupled with an increase thereof, it tried to get Mrs. Meadows to admit her partnership. She lived for years in the same little village, did business with the bank as a depositor, and occasionally visited its counting room on business. The evidence discloses that the bank's dealings with Mrs. Meadows were as remarkable for what was omitted as for what was done. None of its officers did her the courtesy to consult her at any time. They gave her no pass book indicating the state of her accounts for quite a while after she became a depositor, and when they did give her one, it did not cover all her transactions with the bank, or give her much light on the disposition of her funds. Seemingly anxious about her account and the checks signed by her husband against it, the bank officers retained them for many years against a day of need. Finally the bank caused a statement to be prepared in writing, an admission of her partnership in the mercantile business with her husband, and sent it to her to be signed. She refused point blank to sign it. The matter dropped at that. Meadows's indebtedness to the bank was evidenced by notes, and to these notes were signed the names of Thomas J. Meadows and Susie L. Meadows. The original notes were not signed in that way, but the name of Susie L. appeared on the renewals. Her name was signed by Thomas J. without a particle of authority appearing in the record, and without her knowledge or consent. She seems to have been treated as a mere cipher on all hands, except when pay day came. Not only did the bank deal on the credit of the name of Mrs. Meadows that is, on the theory she was a member of the firm of Meadows & Company,—but it claims to have dealt on the faith and credit of Meadows's ownership of the Clay county land. It seems that when the land was bought, Mr. Hurt, cashier of the bank, knew that Meadows did not have a dollar on deposit, knew that he checked the money belonging to his mother-in-law over to the account of his wife, and then checked from his wife's account in payment of the land, signing her name to the checks. In fact, Mr. Hurt drew these checks and brooded over and somewhat molded this transaction. He was the leading spirit in the bank. It had no discounting board but him. He had authority to loan its money and make discounts. At the time the land was purchased and Hurt was writing the checks, he remarked to Meadows: "Tom, you are buying a nice farm here." Thereat Thomas J. chestily replied: "Yes, and it's mine too; the folks are paying for it for me." There is no contradiction to that conversation, and the case may proceed on the theory that the officer of the bank, Hurt, who opened up a line of credit with Thomas J. Meadows, knew that the money of Mrs. Cummins and Mrs. Meadows bought the land, and at the same time was informed by Meadows, in the absence of his wife and mother-in-law, that the land was intended for him,—that the folks were buying it for him. Such is the basis of the bank's credit on the strength of the farm. Subsequently, Mr. Hurt, becoming solicitous about the title to the farm, wrote a letter to the recorder of Clay county to know whether the land still stood in Meadows's name, and was told in reply that it did. Subsequently he wrote another letter, asking if the land was transferred to Mrs. Meadows, and was told that it had been.

(d) Of the Roney claim: Coming to the Roney transaction, it may be told shortly: The Clay county farm belonged to a family by the name of Smith. Roney married one of the Smiths. His wife, being an heir, united with the other Smith heirs in making a deed to Meadows. Roney was one of the chief actors in this sale. While he does not admit that he knew that the money of Mrs. Meadows and Mrs. Cummins paid for the land, yet we have no doubt from the disclosures of the record that he was fully aware of that fact at the time of the purchase. The purchase money fell short $2,500, but of this $2,500, $1,200 was coming to Roney's wife. He took a deed of trust on the land, which secured his wife's share plus $1,300 cash advanced. This indebtedness was paid off, and we think Roney is shown to have known it was paid by the money of Mrs. Meadows, as in fact it was. Subsequently Roney, at the instance of Meadows, loaned one Rhodus $475, and Mr. Meadows signed the note as security. That note, with its accumulation, is allowed against the bankrupt estate, and constitutes the claim known as the Roney claim. He testified that he considered Mr. Meadows good at the time, but that, as a precaution, he undertook to find out whether Meadows still owned his farm, and found out that he did. It further transpired that the steps Roney took to ascertain that fact consisted in going to Mr. Hurt at the Commercial Bank and asking him. Asked in chief whether he would have loaned him the money if he had known the land had not belonged to him, he answered: "Well, I considered Mr. Meadows good, and I don't know whether I would have or not. I could not say now what I would have done then."

So much for the facts.

The case may proceed upon the theory that a trustee in bankruptcy, under the present act, does not stand precisely in the shoes of the grantee in a deed or an assignee under our statute on assignments. The bankrupt law once for all arrests the individual action of the creditor in the collection of his debt, but it only arrests him not his rights. The estate and subject-matter being in custodia legis, the law takes care of the creditor, and the trustee in bankruptcy, as the arm of the court, acts for and on behalf of the creditor in that particular, so that whatever the creditor might do in avoiding the deed of his debtor for fraud, the trustee in bankruptcy may do under the present bankrupt act as a sort of alter ego. Such trustee takes title to the bankrupt's property, including that conveyed in fraud of creditors, contrary to the terms of the bankrupt act, but he takes it subject to outstanding equities (not lost by estoppel or fraud) to which the title was subject in the hands of the bankrupt. While there are some uncertain and some discordant notes struck in the case,—learning on the foregoing propositions, elaborated by diligent counsel in their briefs,—yet we think the foregoing formulation of the law asserts sound doctrine (see authorities in brief of counsel). Without further exposition in that behalf, we pass to a consideration of the main proposition in the case, viz.: Is Meadows's wife estopped to assert the equity of a resulting trust in the Clay county land, arising from the fact that it was purchased with her inheritance money,—her own estate and that of her mother, whose heir she was? In other words, does such assertion of her right operate by way of a fraud on his creditors, and make her deed fraudulent and void in a court of conscience?

It may be conceded that unless the confidential relation of husband and wife affects estoppel, or unless the facts relied on to establish the estoppel are insufficient, the decree should stand. Is estoppel applied to a married woman in her dealings with her husband precisely as to other persons? Counsel for respondent argue that way. Orally at this bar it was stoutly and with animation exclaimed that (in that regard) old things had passed away and all things had become new; that there issued from the married woman's enabling acts a still, small voice of command to courts, viz., "Forward! March!" That in the "gladsome light" of modern jurisprudence the wife appeared from head to foot armed as a feme sole; that she takes the bitter with the sweet, hence her new power to contract and control her estate invokes a new responsibility and danger, to wit, estoppel in pais, now to be applied to her unsparingly with rigid, stern, and unaccommodating vigor. We think no consideration of this question can justly proceed by overlooking the fact that estoppel in pais is not the creature of statutory law. It was the creature of elevated and refined ethics administered in a court of equity. Moreover, when, in former days, it was held that estoppel in pais (except as to her separate equitable estate) did not lie against a married woman at all, the grace of freedom from that burden did not spring from statutory mandate, but was a product of judicial reasoning to attain justice. Since that grace was not given by statute, even though an order has come to "Forward! March!" may we at least not look about a little to inquire if statutes (silent as ours in the giving or denying of it) take it quite away? and to inquire: Who issued such order? On what road are we to march? How far? Where? If we are to march blindfolded, we might say with a certain unhappy person who once hesitated long and doubted much in a certain crisis:

If it were done when 't is done, then 't were well
It were done quickly, —and have the thing over with. Estoppel in pais, created by the reason of the thing, should rest in reason, and we are not called upon to write the law relating to the estoppel of a wife one inch beyond where reason and common sense compel us to go; because, absent a statute on estoppel, if any command has come to march, it is from the forum of reason, and nowhere else. Statutes giving to the modern wife the right to contract, the right to her estate, and to sue and be sued, were intended as a benefit to her, and, rightly applied, they subserved a wise and good purpose. They were not intended to injure her. If she permit or encourage her husband to hold himself forth as the owner of property, if she voluntarily put the title to her property in him, thus knowingly clothing him with indicia of ownership, or by conscious acts acquiesce in his apparent ownership, knowing, or having good cause to know, that he is using the property to obtain credit, or if she conspire with him to that end, or if (when applied to for information) she lie, deceive, or mislead, it is not unreasonable to estop her to claim the property when such claim makes her husband insolvent. But the case made on this record is no such case as that. This wife was wronged by her husband. Although the statute forbade him to reduce his wife's estate to his possession except by her written consent, this husband proceeded to take her estate in the teeth of the law. The facts in this regard were open to the Commercial Bank and Roney at least. Neither of them had the right to believe that Mrs. Meadows was making an out-and-out gift of $10,000 to an impecunious husband, because such course of dealing as that is not usual. Those two creditors knew the equities of the wife, and had the means at hand of knowing; and he who knows cannot be deceived. As to the other creditors, when this wife found she had been wronged, what was the measure of her duty to herself and to the world at large? Was she required to post her husband? Did she have to sue him instantly, although the statute of limitations still treats her as under disability? Shall she quarrel and fuss with him, and, what is more, blazon their squabble abroad in order that creditors may know how the matter stands? If the order to march requires that the peace of the household must be sacrificed in order to protect her property rights, that the love, honor, and trust at the very root of the marriage relation shall be turned into the bitterness and gall of dissension and strife, then is the reform a reform? Do we march forward or retreat? This wife did what she could in a gentle way to protect her interests, having in mind the fact that her husband was the head of the household, that she loved him, and trusted him to comply with her requests and his own promises, and that concord in the household was a wifely duty. We do not think she was estopped as to his creditors, absent a fraudulent intent on her part. We agree that in a given case estoppel in pais may now be applied to a married woman. Her right to contract and to control her estate results by necessary inference in that conclusion. But we cannot agree to apply the rule of estoppel harshly and with close particularity under any and all circumstances where the marital relation is involved. Such holding would injure the very class the married women's acts were intended to protect, and would not subserve the welfare of society. The personnel of those involved in estoppel must not be lost sight of, and it is not unreasonable to hold that facts sufficient to estop a Socrates or other "lord of creation" would not estop Susan, Jane, and Mary,—good Missouri mothers all.

Whatever the motives of the husband may have been in this transaction, there is no evidence implicating Mrs. Meadows in his fraud, and this court has shown a disposition to sustain conveyances made under circumstances similar in some respects to those disclosed here. De Berry v. Wheeler, 128 Mo. 85, 49 Am. St. Rep. 538, 30 S. W. 338; Alkire Grocer Co. v. Ballenger, 137 Mo. 369, 38 S. W. 911; Hudson v. Wright, 204 Mo. 412, 103 S. W. 8; Scrutchfield v. Sauter, 119 Mo. 615, 24 S. W. 137; Columbia Sav. Bank v. Winn, 132 Mo. 80, 33 S. W. 457. We accordingly rule that she was no party to any fraud of her husband, that she had a clear equity in the land, that the conveyance attacked was the execution of a trust, and not made in fraud of his creditors, and that she was not estopped to claim the right to such conveyance. This holding disposes of the case.

But we may as well say a word further. We have held in a line of cases (Berry v. Rood, 168 Mo. loc. cit. 333, 67 S. W. 644 et seq.; Colonial Trust Co. v. McMillan, 188 Mo. loc. cit. 567, 107 Am. St. Rep. 335, 87 S. W. 933 et seq.; Meyer v. Ruby Trust Min. & Mill. Co. 192 Mo. 162, 90 S. W. 821) that creditors charged with knowledge that corporation stock was issued as fully paid up to persons who paid for their stock in simulated values, or creditors who participated in such scheme, could not maintain an action against such stockholders for the difference between the par value of the stock and the amount paid, on the theory that they dealt with the corporation on the faith and credit that the stock was fully paid for in money or money's worth. How much less, then, can Roney and the bank, through the trustee in bankruptcy, sue Mrs. Meadows on the theory that they relied on Meadows's ownership, when they must be held to know that he was not the true equitable owner of the property? Their knowledge of her elder and better equity defeated the running of estoppel under the peculiar facts present.

Again, plaintiff alleged and must be held to prove that the commercial creditors in the class favored in the decree extended credit on the faith of Meadows's ownership of the land in question. In order to maintain their case in this regard, the commercial reports set forth are relied upon. Those reports do not describe the land, nor do they state that a deed is recorded in Clay county, putting the title in Meadows. Nor do they, as a rule, positively assert ownership in Meadows of any land in Clay county. They do suggest and hint at such ownership. He is "said" to own; that is, there is a rumor or talk to that effect. He is "credited" with owning; that is, there is a belief to that effect. If confidence and trust were to be put on actual ownership of a valuable farm in Clay county, it is inconceivable why more accurate information was not demanded than was received. Can a substantial commercial credit be predicated of such mere fog and guesswork? The credit men testifying to that effect were speaking at long range; i. e., a long time after the event itself. There is internal evidence in their depositions that they were construing on the stand the language of the commercial reports, rather than testifying to a distinctly remembered fact,—a sort of nunc pro tunc exposition. In that view of it, they were no better able to construe the language of the reports than this court. Construing that language for ourselves, it cannot escape attention that much is made of the fact that Susie L. Meadows is a partner, and that her credit and her property, as well as the property of the supposed firm, were a large and possibly controlling element in stiffening the credit of Meadows & Company. A credit on the faith of ownership, to be so effective as to overturn a deed, must reasonably produce substantial faith and confidence. Mere conjecture, hearsay, supposition, rumor, and such brood of uncertainties, are not the foundation upon which genuine faith is built in the business world. There was a copy of one report furnished to one creditor in August, 1904, which report bore date January 13, 1902,—obviously a mistaken date. Assuming the original data were furnished in January, 1903, the report says: "Upon further investigation, it is found that he has good farm and town property valued at from $7,000 to $8,000 in own name and partly exempt." That is the nearest to a statement of fact worthy to be the basis of credit we can find. The report itself is made of and concerning one "L. J. Meadows." It either does not concern defendant's husband, or mistakes his name. Admitting the name as well as the date are wrong, then the report does not locate the farm and town property in any of the four quarters of the globe, let alone as within the reach of an execution levy and sale. Shall we say it meant a clay county farm? If so, was the farm in the mind of the commercial agency large enough or valuable enough to be a substantial element in establishing a mercantile credit? Is the valuation of $8,000 or $7,000 referable to the town property said to be owned by Meadows or to the farm? We do not rule that creditors must see for themselves the actual record of an actual deed in their debtor's name; for faith, says a sound lawyer (Heb. xi. 1, q. v.), is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. But this whole bundle of reports, including the one last under exposition, is so palpably vague and uncertain in relation to the ownership of the actual land in dispute that we cannot see how faith and credit could be reasonably predicated on the information. Therefore we are inclined to the belief that the commercial reports should be rejected as a basis of credit, because of uncertainty and vagueness. With that holding, the mainstay of plaintiff's case is taken away.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded, with directions to enter a judgment in favor of defendant, dismissing plaintiff's bill as on a hearing on the merits.

All concur; Valliant and Woodson, JJ., in separate opinion.

Valliant, J., concurring:

Whilst concurring in all that my learned Brother Lamm has said in the opinion in this case, there is one fact in the evidence on which I feel compelled to say a few words, lest, if it be passed over in silence, an improper inference might be drawn from it; I refer to the reports of the commercial agencies, which seem to have been received in evidence without objection. The reports of commercial agencies have for so long been relied on in commercial transactions, and are really of so much value, that they cannot be dispensed with, but referring to them and trusting them as a guide or help in a business transaction is one thing, while bringing them into court as evidence is another thing. They are frequently admitted, and properly so, in evidence when the proper foundation for their admission is laid. The information from which those reports are furnished by the commercial agencies to their subscribers is not infrequently, perhaps usually, furnished by the merchant himself; and when that fact is shown in a suit against the merchant charged with obtaining credit on a false showing, the commercial report is competent evidence against him. Other instances might be supposed where the reports would be competent, but unless guilty knowledge or notice of the contents of the report is brought home to the party sought to be affected, they are mere hearsay. A merchant has a right, if he sees fit to do so, to consult the agency report, and give or refuse credit on it; but that is his own private affair; if the report is false, and he has been misled by it to his injury, he cannot charge it as a badge of fraud on someone who is in no way responsible for the information on which the report was founded, and had no notice that trust was being placed on it. The records of the commercial agencies are not public records of which all the world is required to take notice. They are private matters, and to a certain extent are secret. They are given out only to subscribers, and the subscribers are pledged to secrecy. Mrs. Meadows had no notice of those reports. It is not sure that she ever heard of such an institution as a commercial agency. The reports on their face showed that her husband had refused to give the information, but, even if he had given it, it would not be evidence against Mrs. Meadows, unless, on further evidence, it was shown that she knew it.

The reports were incompetent as evidence against Mrs. Meadows, and if objection had been timely interposed, no doubt the learned trial court would have excluded it. All the Judges concur in the views here expressed.

Woodson, J., concurring:

I fully concur in all that my associates, Judges Lamm and Valliant, have written in this case; and in doing so I wish to emphasize what is said regarding the admission of the commercial reports preserved in the record. They are admissible in evidence in the first instance solely for the purpose of showing that the merchandise was sold upon the faith and credit given to them by the vendor, and not for the purpose of showing fraud on the part of the vendee,—that must be done later and by other evidence. In order for the reports to be of any benefit to the vendor, he must not only show he sold the goods upon his faith in the truthfulness of the same, but he must go one step further, and show that the vendee had knowledge or notice of their existence, and that he (the vendor) relied upon the vendee's knowledge or notice of their existence in selling same. Both of those facts must be shown before the reports become vitalized; but, nevertheless, they are admissible in evidence in the first instance without first showing said knowledge or notice.

It would be impossible for the vendor to show that he relied upon the vendee's knowledge or notice of the existence of said reports without first showing that they did in fact exist. As before stated, proof of notice of their existence on the part of the vendee, and that the vendor relied upon that knowledge or notice, vitalized the reports, and gave them potential force as evidence; but until that is shown they are inanimate, and binding upon no one; and, if said notice is not subsequently shown, then the proper practice is to either move the court to strike out the reports, or request an instruction withdrawing them from the consideration of the jury.

The same practice prevails in the trials of causes involving fraudulent conveyances. The plaintiff must not only show fraud upon the part of the transferrer of the property, but he must go one step further, and show that the transferee had knowledge or notice of that fraud before the fraud of the former is visited upon the latter; but the moment that is done, the fraud of the transferrer becomes the fraud of the transferee, and gives to it life and potentiality. If knowledge or notice of the former fraud is not brought home to the latter, then all evidence of the fraud of the former, previously admitted, should be stricken out or withdrawn from the consideration of the jury.

I understand both opinions so hold.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

EWING-MERKLE ELECTRIC COMPANY,
Appt.,
v,
LEWISVILLE LIGHT & WATER COM-PANY.

(92 Ark. 594, 124 S. W. 509.)

Set-off — equity — claim against non-resident.

Equity will enforce against a claim of a nonresident for goods sold and delivered, a set-off of a claim of the purchaser against the seller for breach of warranty in another transaction between them, where satisfaction of such claim cannot be secured by action without compelling defendant to seek the courts of the state where the seller resides.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Lafayette Chancery Court in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover for certain merchandise sold and delivered.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. M. Pierce, Paul W. Farley, and Bradshaw, Rhoton, & Helm for appellant.

Messrs. Warren & Smith, for appellee:

The cross bill seeks to recover unliquidated damages for breach of contract from a foreign corporation having no agent or 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

property in this state, and chancery is the only forum of jurisdiction in such matters.

Forbes v. Cooper, 88 Ky. 285, 11 S. W. 24; Taylor v. Stowell, 4 Met. (Ky.) 175; Matthews v. Weiler, 57 Ark. 606, 22 S. W. 569.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ewing-Merkle Electric Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, sold to the Lewisville Light & Water Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Arkansas, an alternating current generator complete and switch board transformers for an electric light plant for $1,150, all secondhand machinery, but guaranteed to be in strictly first-class order and in good operative condition. The sale was made under a written contract dated May 10, 1904. The Lewisville Light & Water Company purchased of the Ewing-Merkle Electric Company sundry items of merchandise between July 1 and October 1, 1904, amounting to $488.04, and on the 5th of October, 1904, paid thereon $300, leaving a balance of $188.04.

On the 13th day of July, 1905, the Ewing-Merkle Electric Company brought an action against the Lewisville Light & Water Company in the Lafayette circuit court for $188.04.

The defendant answered and admitted that it purchased the merchandise mentioned in the complaint, and that the sum of Note. — Nonresidence as ground of equitable set-off.

Although there is a marked conflict in the authorities as to whether the nonresidence of the party against whom set-off is sought to be asserted is good ground for equitable interference to allow the set-off, it must be said that the majority of cases in which nonresidence was alleged have held it sufficient to warrant the application of the doctrine.

Cases of this nature are Plattner Implement Co. v. Bradley, A. & Co. 40 Colo. 95, 90 Pac. 86 (claims for unliquidated damages for defective goods sold; for failure on the part of the plaintiff to deliver certain merchandise, in conformity with the terms of the contract; and for certain credits, sought to be set off against a judgment obtained in a foreign jurisdiction); Fitzgerald v. Wiley, 22 App. D. C. 329 (damages consisting of loss of profits by the mortgagor of an invention on the sale of the patent, set off against suit to foreclose the mortgage); Porter v. Roseman, 165 Ind. 255, 112 Am. St. Rep. 222, 74 N. E. 1105, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 718 (claim for money wrongfully paid to plaintiff by defendant's agent set off against claim of plaintiff for goods sold and delivered); Carson v. Carson, 2 Met. (Ky.) 96 (award in $188.04 remains unpaid, "but by way of set-off and cross bill defendant states: That on the 10th day of May, 1904, it entered into a contract with plaintiff for the purchase of certain goods, machinery, and material for an electric light plant.

"That the said machinery and appliances were guaranteed to be in strictly first-class order, as set out in the complaint, and defendant agreed to pay the sum of $1,150, and plaintiff guaranteed the machinery to be in good operative condition. That plaintiff knew at the time of the contract of purchase that defendant desired to use them solely for the purpose of operating an electric plant, and guaranteed it to be in first-class order for that purpose. That defendant bought and paid for said machinery relying solely upon plaintiff's representations and guaranty as to its quality and condition. Defendant was inexperienced in the matter of such machinery, which plaintiff knew, and defendant relied on plaintiff's representations.

"That after defendant had installed said machinery, it was found to be defective and unsound, and not in strictly first-class order, nor in good condition. The armature in the generator was worthless and burned out, and the insulation rotten, and the machinery utterly worthless for the purpose of the defendant.

"That because of the defective condition of the machinery, it was not worth more than $100, and the defendant had been damaged in the sum of $1,050.

arbitration set off against suit to recover money collected on a judgment afterwards reversed); Taylor v. Stowell, 4 Met. (Ky.) 175 (demand for unliquidated damages for breach of warranty of the quality of lumber set off against a note for its price); Forbes v. Cooper, 88 Ky. 285, 11 S. W. 24 (demand for unliquidated damages arising from the nonperformance of a building contract set off against claim for the price of merchandise); Gregory v. Hasbrook, 1 Tenn. Ch. 218 (claim for hire of slave set off against judgment on note for merchandise); Edminson v. Baxter, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 112, 9 Am. Dec. 751 (claim for loss of rum set off against claim for payment of freight); Fleming v. Stansell, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 558, 36 S. W. 504 (joint and several debt against two offset against action on bond); Piotrowski v. Czerwinski, 138 Wis. 396, 120 N. W. 268 (sums due several defendants set off against note signed by all of them in favor of payee, who afterward assigned to third person; the payee in this case being insolvent as well as a nonresident); North Chicago Rolling Mill Co. v. St. Louis Ore & Steel Co. 152 U. S. 596, 38 L. ed. 565, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 710 (claim for unliquidated damages arising out of breach of contract set off against claim for sale of ore.)

The above doctrine seems also to have been recognized in Smith v. Field, 6 Dana, 361; Aldridge v. Birney, 7 T. B. Mon. 344, 18 Am. Dec. 183; Wallenstein v. Selizman, 7 Bush, 175.

In Moss v. Rowland, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 321, it was held that a claim for usury was available as a set-off against a judgment, where, subsequent to the rendition of the judgment, the judgment plaintiff became a nonresident.

In Abernathy v. Myer-Bridges Coffee & Spice Co. 30 Ky. L. Rep. 844, 99 S. W. 942, it was held that under a statute defining a counterclaim to be a cause of action in favor of the defendant, against the plaintiff, or against him and another, which arises out of the contract or transaction stated in the petition as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or which is connected with the subject of the action, a person 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

could not set up against an action for debt and an affidavit of attachment, damages as a counterclaim arising out of the fact that, under the attachment, the defendant's store had been locked and their trade broken up, and further, that the plaintiff had itself taken charge of the attached property, and sold it privately. On petition for rehearing it was noted that the plaintiff was a nonresident, and the court in 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1236, 100 S. W. 862, said: "As the plaintiff is a nonresident, the claim relied on by defendant for the conversion of the goods is allowable as a set-off." This was reaffirmed in 31 Ky. L. Rep. 807, 103 S. W. 342.

The nonresidence of the complainant is sufficient to warrant the application of the doctrine of equitable set-off even where the defendant had the opportunity of pleading his set-off as a defense to a suit at law. Gregory v. Hasbrook and Edminson v. Baxter, supra.

To the same effect is Quick v. Lemon, 105 Ill. 578, the holding of which is sufficiently set out in EWING-MERKLE ELECTRIC CO. v. LEWISVILLE LIGHT & WATER CO. In this case, after a judgment against a corporation, and execution returned unsatisfied, an action was brought by a nonresident creditor of the corporation to hold certain stockholders liable on their unpaid stock subscription, the corporation being also made a party. It appeared that the corporation had a claim against the complainant, arising out of the same transaction, which however, could have been interposed as a set-off in the suit against the corporation.

And even where the defendant's claim has arisen after the commencement of the action, the nonresidence of the plaintiff has been held to constitute good ground for equitable set-off. Bibb Land-Lumber Co. v. Lima Mach. Works, 104 Ga. 116, 30 S. E. 676, 31 S. E. 401.

In Livingston v. Marshall, 82 Ga. 281, 11 S. E. 542, it was held that where the plaintiff in an action on a bond against two defendants, one as principal, the other as surety, is a nonresident of the state, and without property there, a debt due

"The plaintiff is a nonresident of the state, and has no agent upon whom service can be had, nor any property in the state, and that it has no adequate remedy at law, and prays for the recovery of the damages, and asks that the cause be transferred to the chancery court of Lafayette county for hearing, and prayed for judgment."

On October 9th, the defendant filed an amendment to its answer and cross bill, as follows:

"That the exciter purchased from plaintiff failed to excite the fields and armature, and thus rendered it impossible to operate the said machine.

"The bearings on the dynamo were worn and rubbed, and caused the boxes to heat so that it was impossible to operate the machinery. The transformers were not in first-class order nor in good operative condition, but were worn and worthless."

On motion of the defendant, the cause was transferred to the Lafayette chancery court.

The plaintiff answered the cross complaint of the defendant and denied the allegations.

Much evidence was adduced by both parties, and the court found upon hearing that plaintiff is a nonresident and has no property in this state, that the defendant is indebted to plaintiff on the account sued on in the sum of $188.04, and that the plaintiff is indebted to the defendant "on account of damages for breach of warranty in the contract for the sale of machinery and appliances, as alleged in the defendant's answer and cross bill, in the sum of $1,050;

from him to the principal may be set off in equity against the judgment obtained.

Barrow v. Mallory Bros. 89 Ga. 76, 14 S. E. 878, has also been cited as supporting the above doctrine, it merely being held in that case, however, that in an action of trover, unless there be some special equitable ground, such as nonresidence or insolvency of the plaintiff, for allowing the defense, the damages sustained by the defendant from a breach of contract by the plaintiff are not the subject matter of set-off, and cannot be so pleaded. To the same effect is Harden v. Lang, 110 Ga. 392, 36 S. E. 100.

In Brown v. Pegram, 149 Fed. 515, it was held that a debtor cannot be prevented from maintaining a suit in equity to enjoin the collection of a judgment, where its enforcement would be inequitable, by the fact that the ascertainment of the amount due on an assessment and the liquidation of an unliquidated claim for damages in an action of tort, as items of set-off, are involved, especially where the parties against whom the set-off is claimed are all nonresidents of the United States, and one of them is insolvent.

So, in Hannon v. Hilliard, 83 Ind. 362, it was held that, as against a suit to set aside a void satisfaction of a judgment of foreclosure, and to have execution issued thereon, a person may set up as a set-off and counterclaim a claim for the rents and profits which had accrued while the purchaser under the foreclosure sale, and before its setting aside, was in possession, especially where the complainant was a non-resident and insolvent.

Several of the above cases have been cited, and some are freely quoted, in EWING-MERKLE ELECTRIC CO. v. LEWISVILLE LIGHT & WATER CO.

There are a number of cases, however, in which it has been held that the mere inconvenience of being compelled to resort to a foreign jurisdiction is not sufficient to call into operation equitable interference to allow the set-off.

Thus, in Murray v. Toland, 3 Johns, Ch. 569, where it was insisted that set-off should be allowed, because the complainant might have difficulty in obtaining satisfaction of his demand from a party who resided in Spain, the chancellor said: "The inconvenience of following a party to his place of residence abroad does not appear to me to be, of itself, a sufficient ground for departing from the settled doctrines of the court. The court cannot be governed by the mere question of comparative convenience. What would be proper if the party resided in a country where there was no regular law or justice, or where he was absolutely inaccessible, is not a point before me. A residence at Cadiz is surely not such a case; nor is Spain, with all her infirmity, to be put out of the pale of civilized nations."

To the same effect is Tone v. Brace, 8 Paige, 597, where a lessee, evicted, sought to be allowed an equitable set-off against the lessor, suing for rent.

So, in Isenburger v. Hotel Reynolds Co. 177 Mass. 455, 59 N. E. 120, it was said generally that nonresidence is not a sufficient ground for allowing an equitable set-off.

In Braithwaite v. Akin, 3 N. D. 365, 56 N. W. 133, where it was sought to set off a claim in tort against a claim in contract, the court held generally that the mere nonresidence of the plaintiffs does not warrant the application of the doctrine of equitable set-off. The court continued further: "But, even if we should hold that a special equity in favor of the defendant was created by the fact that the interveners resided in another state, our conclusion would not be different. The doctrine of set-off, as applied in equity, relates only to claims arising on contract. Equity has never set off a cause of action for tort against a debt. The doctrine was borrowed from the civil-law doctrine of compensation."

So, in Ingram v. Jordan, 55 Ga. 356, it was intimated that the mere fact that the plaintiff is a citizen of another state is insufficient to warrant the application of the doctrine of equitable set-off, since, as the court said, he might reside in the state where suit is brought in a way to be sued, that defendant is entitled to judgment for said sum; and that the amount found for plaintiff should be set off against the amount found for defendant pro tanto, leaving due defendant the sum of $861.96," and rendered judgment for that amount in favor of the defendant; and plaintiff appealed.

The evidence was sufficient to sustain the findings of fact by the court. At law appellee was not entitled to set up in this action, by way of set-off or counterclaim, the $1,050 damages suffered by it by a breach of contract made by appellant. Was it entitled to set it up as an equitable set-off?

In 2 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, 13th ed. § 1437a, it is said: "It has been already suggested that courts of equity will extend the doctrine of set-off and claims in the nature of set-off beyond the law in all cases where peculiar equities intervene between the parties. These are so very various as to admit of no comprehensive enumeration."

In North Chicago Rolling Mill Co. v. St. Louis Ore & Steel Co. 152 U. S. 596, 616, 38 L. ed. 565, 572, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 710, 716, it is said: "By the decided weight of authority it is settled that the insolvency of the party against whom the set-off is claimed is a sufficient ground for equitable interference. . . . In addition to insolvency, it is held by many well-considered decisions, including those of Illinois, that the nonresidence of the party against whom the set-off is asserted is good ground for equitable relief. Quick v. Lemon, 105 Ill. 578; Taylor v. Stowell, 4 Met. (Ky.) 175; Forbes v. Cooper, 88 Ky. 285, 11 S. W. 24; Robbins v. Holley, 1 T. B. Mon. 191; Edminson v. Baxter, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 112, 9 Am. Dec. 751; Davis v. Milburn, 3 Iowa, 163."

In Forbes v. Cooper, supra, it is said: "It is certainly unconscientious for an insolvent party to coerce the payment of his claim when he is owing the other party an equal or larger sum, and thus leave the latter remediless, nor should a nonresident be allowed, under like circumstances, to enforce through the agency of the courts the collection of his debt, and compel the other party to seek a foreign jurisdiction for relief, and then perhaps find the debtor insolvent. If the object of litigation be the attainment of justice, assuredly such results should be prevented. Indeed, the doctrine of equitable set-off to the extent it was formerly applied was based upon moral justice, and to meet such cases as the above, thus preventing wrong. It was then not uncommon to stay an insolvent or nonresident debtor in the collection of his claim until damages to which the complainant might be entitled against him were liquidated under the order of the chancellor, and then apply them in satisfaction of his independent debt."

In Quick v. Lemon, supra, it is said: "It would seem to be inequitable to require the corporation to go to another state to collect its demand in an action at law, and we are inclined to hold that the nonresidence of the complainant, in connection with the fact that he calls upon a court of equity to enforce his judgment, is sufficient to allow the defendant corporation to prove and set off its demand set up in the cross bill against the judgment of the complainant."

To the same effect, see Porter v. Roseman, 165 Ind. 255, 112 Am. St. Rep. 222, 74 N. E. 1105, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 718, and note to that case and cases cited.

The rule announced in these cases is a just rule, and should be enforced. We see no good reason for sending a citizen of this state to a foreign jurisdiction to obtain justice when the courts of this state can afford relief. They are as fully competent to afford relief to the citizen as to the nonresident. Why should one in cases like this be accorded greater rights than the other?

or have property there accessible to legal process.

In Birdsall v. Fischer, 17 Minn. 100, Gil. 76, where it was sought to set off in equity a separate debt against a joint debt, merely because the plaintiff was a nonresident, the court said: "There are two grounds upon which this question must be answered in the negative. In the first place, 'courts of equity, following the law, will not allow a set-off of a joint debt against a separate debt, or, conversely, of a separate debt against a joint debt, or, to state the proposition more generally, they will not allow a set-off of debts accruing in different rights.' . . . In the second place, there is no allegation in the answer showing that defendant Fischer has not an adequate remedy at law upon his claim against the plaintiffs. There is no allegation of plaintiffs' insolvency, and no reason to suppose that Fischer may not have a remedy at law in the courts of the state of New York, where he alleges that plaintiffs reside. And to constitute an adequate remedy at law, it is not necessary that such remedy should be attainable within the jurisdiction where the defendant resides, or where suit is brought against him."

So, in Smith v. Washington Gaslight Co. 31 Md. 12, 100 Am. Dec. 49, it was held that an unliquidated claim for damages, growing out of the same transaction, cannot be set up as a set-off in equity against a judgment recovered and about to be enforced by one, merely because such person seeking to enforce the judgment is a nonresident.

In Beall v. Brown, 7 Md. 393, it was held that the mere fact that a plaintiff who sues and recovers a judgment is a nonresident does not give a court of equity jurisdiction at the behest of the defendant, who has a cross action at law upon a warranty growing out of the same transaction, to restrain such plaintiff "from collecting his judgment, until he shall have come within this state and signified his presence and willingness to have a suit instituted against him, and have the matter adjusted at law or in this case." The court said: "The appellee rests upon his judgment at law. He does not ask the aid of equity, in which case a complainant will be required to do equity. Having come here to enforce a right, and obtained a judgment, we do not perceive by what authority a court of equity can deny him the fruits of his judgment, because the defendant in that judgment has a cause of action at law against him, growing out of the same transaction on which the judgment was founded. If he had a subject-matter of set, or a defense in mitigation of damages, or in bar of the action, he might have relied on it in the action against himself, and taken his appeal, if improperly rejected by the court; but if he prefers to treat it as a substantive cause of action, the nonresidence of the party cannot give him a standing in court, as upon an equitable claim, when otherwise his remedy would be at law."

In M'Kinney v. Bellows, 3 Blackf. it was held that the rule that a joint demand cannot be set up as a set-off against a separate demand could not be affected by the fact that the persons against whom the joint demand existed were nonresidents.

In Barnes v. McMullins, 78 Mo. 260, although it was recognized that insolvency and nonresidence of the plaintiff, and his assignment of the claim without value, furnish proper grounds for equitable interference, provided the demand in behalf of which it is invoked is of such a character as will justify the assistance and aid of a court of equity, it was held that equity will not interpose its aid in behalf of the defendant when he asserts an action in tort by way of cross demand when sued upon his promissory note, and therefore in this case the defendant could not set off a claim for unliquidated damages arising out of alleged fraud in connection with the sale of certain merchandise, against a note not connected with that transaction, and in fact assigned to a third person by the payee.

In King v. Goddard, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 150, it was held that the rule that, in an action by an assignee, a demand against the assignor, not matured at the time of notice to the defendant of the assignment, is not the proper subject of set-off, is not affected, so far as equitable set-off is concerned, by the nonresidence of the assignor.

In Stonemetz Printers' Machinery Co. v. Brown Folding-Mach. Co. 48 Fed. 854, it was held that the fact that the plaintiff is a foreign corporation is not sufficient to sustain a cross bill seeking relief for an alleged infringement of defendant's patent in a suit where the plaintiff sought relief on account of interference and infringement.

In two jurisdictions it appears that the legislature, by statute, has conferred upon the defendant, in an action where a non-resident is plaintiff, the right to set up, by way of counterclaim or set-off, any cause of action he may have against such non-resident, regardless of the plaintiff's cause of action.

Cases which depend upon these statutes, of course, are not in point in this note. Attention, however, is called, among possibly other cases, to Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Walrath, 53 Wis. 669, 10 N. W. 151; Aultman Co. v. McDonough, 110 Wis. 263, 85 N. W. 980; Rigney v. Monette, 45 La. Ann. 940, 13 So. 201; Spinney v. Hyde, 16 La. Ann. 250; *State Nat. Bank v. Specific performance — doubtful title — effect.

CROSS APPEALS from a decree of the Court of Chancery in complainant's favor upon condition, in a suit to compel specific performance of a contract to purchase certain real estate; the complainant appealing from so much of the decree as required him to remove an alleged defect in his title, and the defendant appealing from so much as decreed specific performance upon the perfecting of the title by complainant. Affirmed on both appeals.

Statement by Vorhees, J.:

These are cross appeals from a decree of the chancellor for specific performance, advised by Leaming, vice chancellor. The bill is filed by Charles Cobb Van Riper, executor and trustee under the last will and testament of Joseph A. Seffarlen, deceased, and is founded upon an agreement dated October 7, 1907, whereby the executor agreed to sell sense of the contract, and to do so will not work an injustice to the vendee.

In Pulliam v. Pulliam, 4 Dana, 123, which was a suit by a vendee for title or the return of purchase money, where it appeared probable that married women who were not legally bound to convey would do so voluntarily, so that the title could be perfected, the court said: "It was within the discretion of the court to have allowed reasonable time for this purpose when the case was heard, and to have suspended final decree upon the result."

In Logan v. Bull, 78 Ky. 607, it was held that the chancellor would give a reasonable time for a vendor who sought specific performance, to complete his title, when time was not of the essence of the contract, and this rule is recognized in Gaither v. O'Doherty, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 594, 12 S. W. 306, and Smith v. Cansler, 83 Ky. 367.

But it appears that this favor should be asked before going to trial under a claim of perfect title, for in Beckwith v. Marryman, 2 Dana, 371, where plaintiffs endeavored to perfect their title during the suit in the circuit court for a specific performance, and, believing that they had done so, went to trial and were defeated, the court says: "Had they, instead of going to trial when they did, asked for further time to perfect their title, or to prove that it was already unquestionable, and such indulgence had been refused, we should have been inclined to reverse the decree. But the decree must be tested by the proofs as they are now exhibited by the record; and, thus considering it, we are compelled to affirm it."

In Grillenberger v. Spencer, 7 Misc. 601, 27 N. Y. Supp. 864, where the defense alleged that the deeds were insufficient, but it appeared that the plaintiff acted in good faith, believing them to be sufficient, the hearing was held open to permit him to perfect his title.

In Merchants' Bank v. Thomson, 55 N. Y. 7, an order for specific performance was 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

and convey certain premises in Atlantic City to Elizabeth A. Wickersham. This instrument provided that the premises to be conveyed should be clear of encumbrances and the title good and marketable; that the settlement should be made within thirty days after authority of a court shall have been obtained authorizing the sale, time to be of the essence of the agreement. The agreement was executed upon the express condition that the proper court having jurisdiction should authorize the sale to be made, the vendor covenanting that he would with due diligence apply to the court to make the sale. The peculiar provision of the will of the testator gave rise to the covenant inserted in the agreement, regarding the application to the court for authority to sell. The testator's will provided as follows:

"I also give to my said daughter Mary granted on condition that, in thirty days, plaintiff procure a deed which was necessary to complete his title.

In Coffin v. Cooper, 14 Ves. Jr. 205, the court said that where the master's report showed that the vendor could procure a good title, the court would put him under terms to procure it speedily, instead of granting the vendee's motion to be discharged from his contract.

In Devenish v. Brown, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 23, where it was necessary for plaintiff to procure an act of Parliament to validate his title, and the contract was made with this defect in view, the court refused to throw the case out on demurrer.

And in Clay v. Rufford, 5 De G. & S. 784, where plaintiff failed on hearing to prove such title as to justify a decree, because of a defect which was not raised by the pleadings, the bill was dismissed without prejudice.

But there must be some certainty that the vendor will be able to make good title to warrant the granting of additional time for him to do so. Thus, in People v. Open Board, 92 N. Y. 98, reversing 28 Hun, 274, it was held that the court would not hold an action open to enable a vendor seeking specific performance to bring suit against other parties, and try the experiment of an effort to secure good title at some uncertain date in the future.

And the giving of additional time for a vendor to perfect his title is a matter of favor, to be granted only when it will not prejudice the vendee; and it will not be granted when the defect was known to the plaintiff or his attorney, and concealed from the purchaser at the time the contract was made. Christian v. Cabell, 22 Gratt. 82; Kenny v. Hoffman, 31 Gratt. 442.

But where plaintiff asserts and defendant denies good title, and both refer the question to the court, it should determine the question at once, and not give the vendor time to perfect his title. Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh, 161.

Regina C. McCloskey the right and privilege to occupy my cottage at Atlantic City, New Jersey, which is used by me principally as a summer residence, without any charge for rent, taxes, or water rent, and if she desires to so occupy the said property, she may do so during the term of her natural life, and during her occupancy of said property my executors and trustees are authorized to keep it in good order and repair, to pay all taxes, water rent, and charges thereon, as they shall periodically fall due.

"Second. I also give my daughter Laura Agnes Seffarlen the same right and privilege to occupy my aforesaid Atlantic City cottage, and to share the same with Mary Emma Rothenberger during the term of the natural lives of both the said Laura Agnes Seffarlen and Mary Emma Rothenberger, and the same benefits and advantages that I have given my said daughter Mary Regina C. McCloskey regarding the said cottage are also given to my said daughter Laura Agnes Seffarlen and the said Mary Emma Rothenberger. And I direct my executors and trustees to permit the said Mary Emma Rothenberger to take care and full charge of my said daughter Laura, and if my daughter Mary Regina C. McCloskey does not desire to occupy the Atlantic City cottage during the winter months, it is my wish and desire that my daughter Laura Agnes Seffarlen and Mary Emma Rothenberger shall occupy the same, and whatever costs and expenses are necessary for the proper care, keep, and comfort of my daughter Laura shall be paid by my trustees as a primary charge out of the income of my residuary estate.

"And if neither of my said daughters desire to occupy my Atlantic City cottage, my executors and trustees are directed not to rent it, but they are authorized and directed to sell the cottage at public or private sale, under the general power of sale of my real estate, hereinafter delegated to them."

The executors and trustees under the will were made guardians of the estate of the testator's daughter Laura, who was of feeble mind, and the will further directed: "And I hereby authorize and direct my said trustee to see that the comfort of my said daughter Laura Agnes Seffarlen is in every way provided for so long as she shall live, and I direct that they employ proper persons for that purpose, preferably my trusted servant Mary E. Rothenberger, and if necessary other persons under them, and that they make liberal compensation out of said income for that purpose." All the parties to the contract had notice that Laura was of feeble mind and incompetent to express a desire not to occupy the premises. Therefore, the complainant, in pursuance of the provision in the agreement, filed his bill on January 23, 1908, but did not make Mary Emma Rothenberger a party defendant thereto. On the 11th day of May in the same year a decree was entered in said cause which, after reciting that, in the opinion of the chancellor, the said Laura Agnes Seffarlen was not mentally competent to express her desire not longer to occupy said premises, and the court being of the opinion that it is for her best interests that the agreement should be performed and the sale consummated, adjudged that Mary Regina C. McCloskey does not desire longer to occupy said premises, and that said Laura Agnes Seffarlen is not mentally competent to express her desire in the premises, and that the executor and trustee under the will be and is authorized and directed to sell the premises under the terms of said agreement, and that the purchaser need not look to the application of the purchase money. A deed was prepared and tendered to the vendee on July 7, 1908, within thirty days after the decree, but was refused by her. The defendant did not object to accepting the deed because of any alleged outstanding interest of Mary Emma Rothenberger in the premises, but solely because due diligence in procuring the above-mentioned decree authorizing the sale had not been used, and of laches in tendering the deed.

This bill was filed July 22, 1908. The defendant filed her answer thereto September 18th following, in which she admitted the tender of the deed and her refusal to perform, basing such refusal upon the delay by the complainant in instituting suit for authority to make sale of the premises, because time was of the essence of the agreement. The cause came on for hearing on December 30, 1908, when the defendant asked leave upon affidavits to amend her answer by setting up therein that the title as tendered to her was not good and marketable, because Mary Emma Rothenberger had not been made a party defendant in the proceedings in the court of chancery to obtain leave to sell the premises, and her rights were in no way affected by such proceedings; that she did not join in the deed tendered, and that she, under the will of Joseph A. Seffarlen, had an outstanding interest in the premises. Leave was given and such answer was immediately filed. The vice chancellor rendered his decision at the conclusion of the hearing on the same day, and a decree thereon was entered January 13, 1909, ordering specific performance of the agreement, and that the complainant, within thirty days from the date of the decree, deliver a good and sufficient conveyance to the defendant, and if the defendant require it, cause a deed of release of any interest which Mary Emma Rothenberger might have in the premises to be executed by her, releasing to the defendant such interest, and deliver the release to the defendant contemporaneously with the conveyance.

From this decree cross appeals were taken; by the complainant, from that part of the decree adjudging that the complainant procure a release from Mary Emma Rothenberger, on the ground that Mary Emma Rothenberger possessed no interest in the premises; and by the defendant, because the complainant was not entitled to have the agreement specifically performed, by reason of his delay in acquiring authority from the court to make the conveyance, and by reason of his not tendering a marketable title prior to the filing of his bill, and that the defendant was entitled to have the bill dismissed upon the pleadings and proofs.

Messrs. S. Stanger Iszard and Clarence L. Cole for complainant.

Messrs. Grey & Archer, for defendant:

Specific performance of a contract for the sale of land the title to which is alleged to be defective will not be decreed, even though the court may be of opinion that the objection to the title is not well founded, where the engagement is to give a marketable title, if the doubt is of such a nature that purchasers are likely to object to the title. Vreeland v. Blauvelt, 23 N. J. Eq. 483; Boylan v. Townley, 62 N. J. Eq. 591, 51 Atl. 116; Cornell v. Andrews, 35 N. J. Eq. 7; Zane v. Weintz, 65 N. J. Eq. 214, 55 Atl. 641; Lippincott v. Wikoff, 54 N. J. Eq. 107, 33 Atl. 305.

Voohees, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Whether the complainant was in laches in procuring the authority from the court of chancery to make the conveyance under the will was a question of fact. Between the execution of the agreement and the filing of the bill, the defendant consulted a conveyancer in Philadelphia, who in turn consulted a title company, and in October notified the complainant that a commission in lunacy for Laura and the appointment of a guardian would be required by the title company. The complainant was not willing to take proceedings of that character, which would consume more time, and New Jersey counsel was called in, advising that such proceedings were not necessary, and thereupon took up the matter with the title company selected by the defendant, and finally reached an understanding some time in December with the title company that the proceedings as they were finally taken should 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

be commenced. We agree with the conclusion of the vice chancellor that the complainant was reasonably diligent, and is not chargeable with laches in the commencement of those proceedings under the circumstances evinced by the proofs. That being admitted, it follows that the tender of the deed was within the time prescribed by the contract,—namely, within thirty days after the decree was entered in the court of chancery.

The next question to be determined relates to the title tendered,—whether it was unmarketable because of a possible interest outstanding in Mary Emma Rothenberger. The principle adopted by courts of equity in matters of specific performance is that they will not compel a purchaser to take a title of which there is a reasonable doubt, and such doubt is held to exist if the purchaser, desiring to sell the lands, would be adversely affected by such doubt. Fry, Spec. Perf. chap. 17. Professor Pomeroy, in his work on Specific Performance, at § 198, says: "In suits by a vendor, the purchaser will not be forced to complete the contract unless the title is free from any reasonable doubt. . . . If, however, there arises . . . a reasonable doubt concerning the title, . . . the court, without deciding the question, . . . regards the existence of this doubt as a sufficient reason for not compelling the purchaser to carry out the agreement." So it is the uniform rule in this state to decline to decree performance where such doubt exists, though rested on grounds merely debatable, but which might visit upon the purchaser litigation in that regard, and that, too, where at law the title might in fact be declared good. The following cases are in point: Vreeland v. Blauvelt, 23 N. J. Eq. 483; Dobbs v. Norcross, 24 N. J. Eq. 327; Tillotson v. Gesner, 33 N. J. Eq. 313; Cornell v. Andrews, 35 N. J. Eq. 7, s. c. 36 N. J. Eq. 321; Paulmier v. Howland, 49 N. J. Eq. 364, 24 Atl. 268; Lippincott v. Wikoff, 54 N. J. Eq. 107, 33 Atl. 305; Day v. Kingsland, 57 N. J. Eq. 134, 41 Atl. 99. We agree with the learned vice chancellor that the objection raised to the title tendered should be decided in favor of the vendee.

The decree below allowed to the complainant thirty days in which to procure the release of the alleged outstanding interest, and to tender it within that time, together with the executor's deed. While this allowance of time is not made a specific ground of appeal by the defendant, yet the point has been argued. The complainant, however, alleges as ground of appeal that he should not be compelled to obtain the release of Mary Emma Rothenberger. A material allegation of the bill is that the complainant executed and tendered to the defendant a good and valid deed of conveyance, and that the complainant was ready and willing to deliver a good and valid conveyance in accordance with the agreement. In her original answer, the defendant admits the tender made to her of the deed mentioned by the complainant, and her refusal to accept is placed, not upon the ground that the title thus offered was unmarketable, but because of the laches of the complainant in making the tender. This ground is set out in the answer with extreme minuteness. If the defendant did not thus, by failing to answer the material allegation of the tender of a good title, confess that fact (Sanborn v. Adair) 29 N. J. Eq. 338; Lee v. Stiger, 30 N. J. Eq. 610; Jones v. Knauss, 31 N. J. Eq. 609; Pinnell v. Boyd, 33 N. J. Eq. 190; Halsey v. Ball, 36 N. J. Eq. 161; Heyde v. Ehlers, 10 N. J. Eq. 283; Tate v. Field, 56 N. J. Eq. 35, 37 Atl. 440), she lulled the complainant into inactivity and a feeling of security as to any objection that might be urged on the score of title, and she furthermore allowed this condition of affairs to remain undisturbed until the day of the final hearing excusing her delay, however, upon the ground that the true state of the title was unknown to her until about the time of the hearing. Furthermore, in March, 1908, two months before the decree, the defendant served notice of rescission of the contract on account of delay. No objection was then made to the character or the validity of the proceedings for obtaining an order authorizing the complainant to sell. This conduct of the defendant likewise had a natural tendency to raise in the mind of the complainant a reasonable belief that the point of difference between the parties was laches, and not the character of the title. Now, if the defendant had promptly specified that objection would be made to the title, the complainant would have had all the time existing between the disclosure of that defense to him and the entry of the decree in which to remove the defects complained of. So that we do not need to press to its extreme result, the effect of the failure to answer the material allegations of the bill as to a good title being tendered, but may rest upon the fact that the silence of the defendant in this particular has raised an equity in favor of the complainant, entitling him to such reasonable time for completing the title, not exceeding that which he might have had if the defendant had urged this defense promptly.

The English rule seems to be that laid down in Langford v. Pitt, 2 P. Wms. 630, by Sir Joseph Jekyll, M. R., that it is sufficient if the party entering into articles to sell has a good title at the time of the decree.

The cases are collected under Seton v. Slade, in 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 4th Am. ed. 529. It has been said that the courts have never directed performance by the vendee if the title, at the time of the decree, was still defective. The English rule, however, holds that if the master's report on title is that the vendor, upon getting in a term or getting administration, etc., will have a title, the court will put him under terms to procure that speedily. Coffin v. Cooper, 14 Ves. Jr. 205. In a note to Cooper v. Denne, 1 Ves. Jr. 567, it is said that the rule has been productive of great hardship, and Lord Eldon, who decided Coffin v. Cooper, declared that he would never extend it to any case to which it had not been previously applied.

The difference, however, between the practice of the English courts and those of our own, makes it illogical to apply their rules with exactness to all cases arising in our courts. They have the matter of title first referred to a master to report upon, and then comes the decree. They hold that perfection of the title by the time of the decree—that is, after its adjudication by the master—is sufficient. Now, with us, the title is not adjudicated until the final hearing, upon which a decree may be entered and signed immediately. Thus we see that the English rule is even more lenient than ours; for it allows the necessary time intervening between the master's determination of the title and the time of the entry of the final decree. Professor Pomeroy, in his work on Specific Performance, at § 424, says: "There are many modes, however, in which the vendee, by his acts or omissions, will waive all right to object to the vendor's delay in making out a good title." And in Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. Jr. 285, where specific performance was decreed, the abstract, though delivered very late, and under a notice that the vendee would insist on his deposit with interest if the title should not be made out and possession delivered by the time of payment, having been received and kept without objection, Lord Eldon, upon summing up the case, said: "Under the circumstances, therefore, whether the time is or is not an objection founded upon the authorities the reports of this court furnish,—which I will not discuss, let the authorities upon that point turn the scale either for the defendant or the plaintiff,—there is no authority that has not some reference to the conduct of the party in the meantime; and upon the conduct, this defendant has no right, under the circumstances, to say this contract was not performed within the two months."

In Murrell v. Goodyear, 1 De G. F. & J. 432, Lord Justice Turner said: "I am not prepared to hold that in the case of bona fide conduct on the part of a vendor putting up property for sale in which he has a partial interest, supposing himself to have the entire interest, it is competent to a purchaser to say that the contract shall be no contract if the vendor is able ultimately to make a title to the property according to the more extended interest he has contracted to sell. I certainly have always thought that in such a case a purchaser could have no right to resist a specific performance of the contract. But I say without any hesitation that if a purchaser has any such right as has been contended for and insisted upon on the part of this defendant, it is a right he is bound to insist upon at the first moment."

In Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 415, it was said: "In all cases it is sufficient for the seller, upon a contract made in good faith, if he is able to make the stipulated title at the time when, by the terms of his agreement or by the equities of the particular case, he is required to make the conveyance, in order to entitle himself to the consideration."

The defendant concedes that there are precedents where a decree has been made on terms allowing a vendor to remove mortgages from the property (Oakey v. Cook, 41 N. J. Eq. 350, 7 Atl. 495), and where the vendor has perfected his title before bill filed, or before the hearing, or before the decree, or even after that time, when the vendor held a contract entitling him to such outstanding interest (Soper v. Kipp, 5 N. J. Eq. 383), but it is contended that no cases can be found where additional time has been decreed to afford an opportunity to acquire an outstanding title over which the vendor had no control. When the vendor in a suit for specific performance, by reason of the silence or the conduct of the vendee, regarding the title to be conveyed, during the negotiations or in the progress of the cause, has lost an opportunity to perfect his title before decree, this opportunity will still be afforded to him by the allowance of a reasonable time even after the entry of the decree, if it can be done without hardship to the vendee.

It is apparent that, by reason of the defendant's delay in not bringing forth her objection until the very day of the hearing, an equity has arisen in favor of the complainant that he be not deprived of the period of time which he would have had under the ordinary rules, and therefore we are constrained to hold that the allowance of thirty days after the making of the decree within which to obtain a release for the alleged outstanding interest is not inequitable, and does not work hardship upon the defendant.

The decree should be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

WILLIAM H. CADDY, Resp't.,

v.

INTERBOROUGH RAPID TRANSIT COMPANY, Appt.

Master — scaffolds — statutory liability.

1. A car 47 feet long and 16 feet high, jacked up 6 feet from the floor, is a structure within the meaning of a statute providing that a person directing another to perform labor in the repairing of a house, building, or structure shall not furnish, for the performance of such labor, unsuitable scaffolding.

Same — scaffold defined.

2. Planks placed 8 feet from the ground, on painter's horses, to be used as platforms for workmen in repairing a railroad car, are within the meaning of a statute requiring a person employing another to perform labor in the repairing of a house, building, or structure, to furnish for the performance of such labor safe scaffolding.

Note. — What are scaffolds or structures within statutes relating to safety of scaffolds in connection with structures.

A search has failed to reveal a statute in any other state similar to the one construed in the CADDY v. INTERBOROUGH RAPID TRANSIT Co., and consequently the American cases discussed below are confined to New York state. A very similar question, however, may arise under the English workmen's compensation act of 1897, and a number of English cases have passed upon the question.

Scaffolds.

The New York statute is sufficiently set out in the foregoing opinion. The following contrivances have been held to be scaffolds within the meaning of the statute:

—timbers placed on empty barrels, used to facilitate passing lumber to workmen higher up. McLaughlin v. Eidlitz, 50 App. Div. 519, 64 N. Y. Supp. 193.

—a plank on horses in a building in process of erection used to facilitate the work of securing a derrick, to be used in putting beams into position. Warren v. Post & McCord, 128 App. Div. 572, 112 N. Y. Supp. 960.

—planks placed on cross pieces resting on two rows of upright timbers. Herman

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, reversing a judgment of a Trial Term for Kings County, dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lemuel E. Quigg, with Mr. Charles A. Gardiner, for appellant:

The car upon which plaintiff was working was not a "structure" within the meaning of the labor law.

In some of the foregoing cases, it will be seen that there could be no question that the contrivance was a scaffold, the only question being whether the statute was intended to apply to scaffolds used in the manner and for the purpose indicated.

A scaffolding built by the plaintiff and his fellow workmen under the direction of the master's superintendent is one furnished by the master, within the meaning of the statute. Berthelson v. Gabler, 111 App. Div. 142, 97 N. Y. Supp. 421.

If a scaffold one side of which is supported by masonry and the other is swung from hooks or hangers suspended from a traveler is not, as a matter of law, embraced by the phrase "all swinging or stationary scaffolding," as used in the statute, it certainly may be found so as a matter of fact. Flannigan v. Ryan, 89 App. Div. 624, 85 N. Y. Supp. 947.

In Pursley v. Edgemoor Bridge Works, 56 App. Div. 71, 67 N. Y. Supp. 719, affirmed in 168 N. Y. 589, 60 N. E. 1119, the statute was held to have reference to a completed scaffold only, and not to one in process of erection. And to the same effect was the decision in Welk v. Jackson Architectural Iron Works, 184 N. Y. 519, 76 N. E. 1116, the court adopting the dissenting opinion in the court below, 98 App. Div. 247, 90 N. Y. Supp. 541.

A scaffold built around a house in the process of construction is being used for the erection of a house, within the meaning of the statute, although, at the time of the accident, the workman was using it to construct another scaffold higher up. Jones v. Gamble, 126 N. Y. Supp. 143.

workmen are required to stand, cannot be considered a scaffold, but is a "mechanical contrivance," within the meaning of the statute. Michael v. Standard Concrete Steel Co. 55 Misc. 255, 105 N. Y. Supp. 131.

The following contrivances have been held not to be scaffolds within the meaning of the statute:

—staging 4 to 5 feet high above the floor, and used for attaching fixtures. Schapp v. Bloomer, 181 N. Y. 125, 73 N. E. 563.

—planks with one end resting on cleats nailed onto a building, and the other on horses, and used for the purpose of removing pipes connecting a boiler on the outside of the building with one on the inside. Conley v. Lackawanna Iron & Steel Co. 94 App. Div. 149, 88 N. Y. Supp. 123, affirmed in 183 N. Y. 551, 76 N. E. 1092.

—timber lashed at the ends to steel columns of a building, and intended to hold iron girders until the wall was built up for them to rest on. Welk v. Jackson Architectural Iron Works, 184 N. Y. 519, 76 N. E. 1116, reversing the court below on the dissenting opinion, 98 App. Div. 247, 90 N. Y. Supp. 541.

—platform used in erecting a temporary partition in a store to protect goods from dust. Sutherland v. Ammann, 112 App. Div. 332, 98 N. Y. Supp. 574, affirmed in 190 N. Y. 514, 83 N. E. 1133.

—a plank laid across two wooden horses, used to facilitate the work of putting a casing in a window frame. Williams v. First Nat. Bank, 118 App. Div. 555, 102 N. Y. Supp. 1031.

—the platform of a bridge in the process of erection. Brady v. Pennsylvania Steel Co. 134 App. Div. 372, 119 N. Y. Supp. 75.

It is to be noted that in a number of the foregoing cases, the contrivance was erected to facilitate the installation or removal of machinery or fixtures within the building.

So, in Schapp v. Bloomer, supra, the court, in holding that a scaffolding composed of horses, with planks thereon to furnish a platform for workmen to stand on in installing shafting in a completed building, was not within the meaning of the statute, said: "As we have seen, the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

statute limits the scaffolding to be constructed to certain specified cases, such as the erection, repairing, altering, or painting of a house, building, or structure. The limitation to specified cases shows that it was not intended to include scaffolding in all cases. What the legislature evidently had in mind was scaffolding on buildings or structures, where its use was obviously dangerous to life and limb of an employee thereon in case of a fall. If ordinary staging, put up in a room, from 4 to 6 feet above the floor, to facilitate the placing of fixtures, was intended to be included as among the specified cases, we should find it difficult to suggest a scaffold that would not fall within the limitation of the statute."

But placing machinery within a room in a building, and attaching the same firmly to the ceiling, was held in Wingert v. Krakauer, supra, to constitute an alteration of such room.

So, in Tracey v. Williams, supra, the court said: "The heating apparatus of a school building is a part of the building itself; it is a part of the realty; and whether the work upon which the plaintiff was engaged was being done as a part of the original construction of the building, or of its alteration or repair, we think the statute applied. The plaintiff was doing the kind of work contemplated by the statute; the danger from a defect in the scaffold upon which he was working was the kind of danger which the statute requires the master to guard against."

A temporary or false arch used to support and shape the permanent arch until that arch should be set and hardened sufficiently to justify the removal of the temporary structure does not become a scaffold because of the habit of the workmen of stepping on it while at work. Haughey v. Thatcher, 89 App. Div. 375, 85 N. Y. Supp. 935.

—English workmen's compensation act.

Section 7, subsec. 1, of the English workmen's compensation act 1897, is to apply to employment "on, in, or about any building which exceeds 30 feet in height," and is either being constructed or repaired by

Werner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was injured while engaged in repairing one of defendant's cars in its shop in the borough of Manhattan, in the city of New York. The car was 47 feet long, 8 feet 6 inches wide, and 16 feet high. It was "jacked up" about 6 feet above the floor, so that its height over all was about 22 feet. Around the car there had been placed a staging consisting of "painters' horses," constructed like ladders, with rungs about 12 inches apart. Upon these "horses" were placed planks about 8 feet above the floor. The plaintiff was standing at work upon a plank which formed a part of the staging on the south side of the car when it broke and precipitated him to the floor, causing the injuries for which he seeks to recover in this action. At the trial term the complaint was dismissed. At the appellate division the judgment entered upon that decision was reversed and a new trial granted. Upon defendant's appeal to this court, the two principal questions presented are whether the staging upon which the plaintiff was standing when it gave way was a "scaffold," and whether the car upon which he was at work was a "structure," within the purview of §§ 18 and 19 of the statute commonly known as the "labor law" (Laws 1897, chap. 415, p. 467).

Before the enactment of that statute, it had been held that a staging or scaffolding means of a scaffolding. Under this section the courts have, in a number of cases, passed upon the question what is a scaffolding within the meaning of the act.

Thus, in Hoddinott v. Newton, C. & Co. [1901] A. C. 49, it was held that a movable platform formed by boards resting on ledgers lashed to iron columns, and supported in the middle by trestles, was a scaffolding within the meaning of the act.

And in Veazey v. Chattle, [1902] 1 K. B. 494, it was held that the county court judge was justified in holding that a crawling board, which was described as being a plank 18 to 20 feet long and 10 inches wide, across which were nailed ridges of wood to give the workmen a grip on the board while at work on the roof, was a scaffolding within the meaning of the act.

So, ordinary painters' steps may be found to be a scaffolding within the meaning of the act. Elvin v. Woodward & Co. [1903] 1 K. B. 837.

And in O'Brien v. Dobbie, [1905] 1 K. B. 346, it was held that an ordinary ladder on which a workman was standing for the purpose of doing work might be properly found by the jury to be a scaffolding.

A plank with one end resting on one of the rounds of a ladder leaning against one of the walls of a building, and the other resting upon one of the roof principals in the center of the room, is a scaffolding within the meaning of the act. Reddy v. Broderick [1901] 2 Ir. Q. B. 329.

A scaffolding consisting of movable trestles inside the rooms of a building, with boards laid across the top, is within the act. Maude v. Brook, [1900] 1 Q. B. 575.

As the act is not confined to accidents in some way connected with the use of the scaffolding, and says nothing about the height, position, or extent thereof, the height of the scaffold from the ground or floor beneath it is of no consequence, so long as the building upon which the work is being done is over 30 feet, Hoddinott v. Newton, C. & Co. supra.

But in Crowther v. West Riding Window Cleaning Co. [1904] 1 K. B. 232, it was held that it could not be said that a ladder used for a purpose for which scaffolding might be used must, as a matter of law, be a scaffolding. And to the same effect was the decision in Marshall v. Rudeforth, [1902] 2 K. B. 174.

And in Ferguson v. Green, [1901] 1 K. B. 25, it was held that a platform erected for the use of plasterers, and composed of trestles, with loose boards laid across the top, may be found, as a matter of fact, not to be a scaffolding.

A ladder used in the ordinary way by a painter in a building is not a scaffolding. McDonald v. Hobbs (1899) 2 F. 3, Ct. of Sess. cited in 2 Butterworths's Dig. 740. Nor is a ladder used in the work of silicating the walls of a house, although such work is usually done by means of a scaffolding. Campbell v. Sillars (1904) 5 F. 900, Ct. of Sess. cited in 2 Butterworths's Dig. 743.

And in Wood v. Walsh, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1009, it was held that, as a matter of law, ladders were not scaffolding within the meaning of the act. This decision, however, was rendered before the Hoddinott Case was passed upon by the House of Lords, and is spoken of in a number of the other English cases as being overruled by the latter case.

Structures.

The following were held to be structures within the meaning of the statute:

—a vessel in the course of construction in a shipyard. Chaffee v. Union Dry Dock Co. 68 App. Div. 578, 73 N. Y. Supp. 908.

—a vessel in a dry dock. Gruner v. Texas Co. 133 App. Div. 413, 117 N. Y. Supp. 741, motion for leave to appeal to the court of appeals denied in 134 App. Div. 931, 118 N. Y. Supp. 1110.

—a vessel to which iron plates were being attached. Herman v. P. H. Fitzgibbons Boiler Co. 136 App. Div. 286, 120 N. Y. Supp. 1074.

—a scow in which repairs were being made. Madden v. Hughes, 104 App. Div. 101, 93 N. Y. Supp. 324, affirmed in 185 N. Y. 466, 78 N. E. 167.

erected for workmen was not a place in which to do their work, but an appliance or instrumentality by means of which the work was to be done, and the logical corollary of that conclusion was that, when the master had exercised reasonable care in the selection of competent fellow workmen, and suitable materials for the proper construction of the appliance, he was not liable for injuries sustained by one workman through the fault or negligence of another. Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. 1017; Kimmer v. Weber, 151 N. Y. 417, 56 Am. St. Rep. 630, 45 N. E. 860. By the statute of 1897, the legislature established a different rule in specified instances where the employer assumes, or is charged with, the duty of furnishing scaffolding for the use of his employees. The statute provides that "a person employing or directing another to perform labor of any kind in the erection, repairing, altering, or painting of a house, building, or structure shall not furnish or erect, or cause to be furnished or erected, for the performance of such labor, scaffolding, hoists, stays, ladders, or other mechanical contrivances which are unsafe, unsuitable, or improper, and which are not so constructed, placed, and operated as to give proper protection to the life and limb of a person so employed or engaged." Section 18. And the following section adds that "all swinging and stationary scaffolding shall be so constructed as to bear four times the maximum weight required to be dependent therefrom or placed thereon, when in use. . . ." Section 19. In considering this statute in the case of Stewart v. Ferguson, 164 N. Y. 553, 556, 58 N. E. 662, this court held that § 18 lays upon the master a positive prohibition, from the violation of which neither his own ignorance nor the carelessness of his servants will shield him. In that case the statute as it now stands was compared with the provisions of an earlier one (Laws 1885, chap. 314, § 1, p. 539), under which the master was charged with responsibility for "knowingly and negligently" furnishing defective scaffolding, etc., and the decision was predicated upon the obvious purpose of the legislature to impose upon the employer the affirmative and imperative duty to furnish to his employees stagings and scaffoldings for certain purposes that are safe, suitable, and proper, regardless of the employer's knowledge or negligence in the matter. This is absolute and unequivocal. Whenever a scaffold is furnished or caused to be furnished by an employer, to be used in erecting, repairing, altering, or painting a house, building, or structure, it must be safe, suitable, and proper, or the employer is liable.

Thus far there is no difficulty in ascertaining the legislative purpose; beyond it there is doubt and uncertainty. And the trouble arises from the inherent impossibility of defining in unequivocal phrase the physical objects mentioned in the statute. What is a "scaffold?" What is a "structure?" These are the vexed questions which the courts are constantly being called upon to answer in cases involving an infinite variety of practical conditions. Experience has shown that they are questions which cannot be solved by academic discussion, and that even when they are applied to concrete facts they often lead judicial minds to radically divergent conclusions. In the case at bar the question is whether the car above described is a "structure" within the meaning of the law. Counsel for the defendant, in a very lucid and forceful argument, invokes the rule of ejusdem generis. His contention, reduced to its shortest statement, is that the general word "structure" must be limited by and comprehended within the specific terms "house" and "building," and when thus construed it necessarily excludes all structures which do not fall within the generic description of houses and buildings. To this argument counsel for the plaintiff replies that the words "house" and "building" are in themselves so general and comprehensive that the word "structure" cannot possibly

But an upright boiler, standing on its own base, having no roof or shelter, and connected with the main building only by means of a pipe running through the wall, and connecting with another boiler, was held in Conley v. Lackawanna Iron & Steel Co. 94 App. Div. 149, 88 N. Y. Supp. 123, affirmed in 183 N. Y. 551, 76 N. E. 1092, to be a mere appliance, and not within the statute.

In Chaffee v. Union Dry Dock Co. supra, where it was held that a ship in the course of construction in a dry dock was a structure within the meaning of the labor law, the court said: "The injury of workmen falling by reason of defective scaffolds was the thing to be avoided. It was an entirely 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

immaterial circumstance before this general purpose whether the scaffold should happen to be around a house, a barn, a vessel, or a flag pole. . . . It was against that injury that the legislature sought to guard by imposing additional responsibilities upon the employer in favor of the employee."

The statute applies to a vessel belonging to a foreign corporation, but in a dry dock in this state for repairs. Gruner v. Texas Co. 133 App. Div. 413, 117 N. Y. Supp. 741.

broaden or amplify their meaning, and need not necessarily be associated therewith; that the term "structure" was used, not to make more definite the description of "house" and "building," but to enlarge to the fullest extent the list of artificial physical objects to which the reason of the statute can be applied. The question is not free from doubt, but we incline to the view that the rule of ejusdem generis does not apply. The term "house," as used in common speech, embraces every form of structure designed for human habitation; but in a legal sense it is even more comprehensive, as is shown by the statutes relating to burglary, arson, and other crimes which involve acts committed in or upon buildings or structures. A building is a structure which, of course, includes every form of artificial house, but also many structures not included in that more restricted term; and so the word "structure," in its broadest sense, includes any production or piece of work artificially built up or composed of parts joined together in some definite manner, and its extended legal signification can easily be gathered from the great variety of subjects to which it is applied in creating and penalizing what are known as "statutory misdemeanors." In cases like this, lexicographers' definitions are useful as guideposts, but they do not take us to our destination. The statutory meaning of a word or phrase must be gathered from the purpose for which the law containing it was enacted. Under the common law it was often difficult to fix the legal responsibility for accidents arising from defective scaffoldings and stagings. In many cases where the master should have been held liable, he escaped under cover of the fellow-servant doctrine; and in many more he was mulcted in damages for the negligence of others in details which he could not control. This was the evil sought to be remedied by a statute designed to charge the master with a more rigid and personal responsibility for the erection of scaffoldings and stagings, and to assure the servant, who takes no part in their construction, of greater safety in their use. A scaffold is no more dangerous when used in erecting, repairing, altering, or painting a house or building, than when used for the same purpose upon any structure where the same kind of a scaffold is necessary. The dangers to the employee are the same, and the evils of the common-law rule sought to be remedied by the statute are alike in each case. It is to be observed, moreover, that the word "structure" is not joined to "building" and "house" by the adjective "other," but by a simple "or," so that the language is "house, building, or structure." The word

"or" here takes the place of a comma, and this grammatical construction indicates that the word "structure" has as distinct and separate a meaning as "building" has from "house." This broad and practical view of the statute was taken by the appellate division in the fourth department in Chaffee v. Union Dry Dock Co. 68 App. Div. 578, 73 N. Y. Supp. 908, where it was held that a ship was a structure; by the second department in Flannigan v. Ryan, 89 App. Div. 624, 85 N. Y. Supp. 947, where one of the piers of the Williamsburg bridge was regarded as within the same category; and in Madden v. Hughes, 104 App. Div. 101, 93 N. Y. Supp. 324, where a scow 100 feet long, 30 feet wide, and 14 feet deep was thought to fall within the statute. These cases differ just enough in circumstance to indicate the limitless variety of objects which may be described as structures, and the comparatively narrow field within which the statute would be operative if it were confined to buildings and houses. The more carefully this statute is studied, the more apparent it becomes that it was clearly designed to cover many structures which are not ejusdem generis with houses and buildings, and that no hard and fast legal definitions can be framed of the many things which may be comprehended by its provisions. Within this broad construction of the statute, we think the car upon which the plaintiff was at work when injured was a structure. If it had been built of the same shape and dimensions upon wooden posts or stone piers sunk into the ground, and had been intended for a dwelling or a workshop, it would clearly have been a structure. The fact that it happens to have been a thing called a "railroad car" when in use does not exclude it from the category of structures when it is temporarily necessary to use scaffolding thereon in the process of erecting, repairing, altering, or painting.

When we undertake to define a scaffold or scaffolding, we meet even greater difficulties. It is like reasoning in a circle to attempt to define "scaffolding" and "structures" in their relation to each other. On the one hand, it may be argued that anything large enough to require the use of a scaffold in the work of erection or repair may very properly be dignified by the title of "structure," and the process need only be reversed to prove that a staging necessary to erect or repair a "structure" must certainly be of such dimensions and character as to constitute a scaffold. Upon this branch of the case we can add practically nothing to the foregoing discussion. The same reasoning applies. The reports of decisions in the appellate division are full of cases in which the question has arisen in many forms, but they are of no use as authorities except where the facts are identical or so similar as to be controlling. The following cases disclose the wide range of things which the appellate division have held to be scaffolds within the statute: Madden v. Hughes, 104 App. Div. 101, 93 N. Y. Supp. 324, platform consisting of planks between divisions of hold of a scow; Chaffee v. Union Dry Dock Co. supra, timbers laid across hold of vessel and resting on chains; Swenson v. Wilson & B. Mfg. Co. 102 App. Div. 477, 92 N. Y. Supp. 849, platform used only for materials, made of planks laid across girders in uncompleted building; McLaughlin v. Eidlitz, 50 App. Div. 518, 64 N. Y. Supp. 193, planks laid across barrels which were placed on each side of a cable; Anderson v. Milliken Bros. 123 App. Div. 614, 108 N. Y. Supp. 61, unfastened planks placed upon braces which formed part of a grain bin then in course of construction; Tracey v. Williams, 127 App. Div. 126, 111 N. Y. Supp. 114, planks laid on horses placed one above the other; Croce v. Buckley, 115 App. Div. 354, 100 N. Y. Supp. 898, the top of an elevator upon which workmen were standing under directions from master. We cite these cases, not for the purpose of indorsing the conclusions reached in them, but to illustrate the variety and difficulty of the subject.

When we turn to the lexicographers, we find nothing much more definite. We all accept the definition that a "scaffold" is "a temporary structure of timber, boards, etc., for various purposes, as for supporting workmen and materials in building." Webster's International Dict. But when that is admitted we may still differ as to the height and other dimensions which mark the difference between a scaffold and a platform or staging. In Schapp v. Bloomer, 181 N. Y. 125, 128, 73 N. E. 563, 564, this court held that a staging from 4 to 6 feet high, used for the purpose of placing shafting and fixtures, and supported by large rolls of paper and brackets nailed to posts which upheld the roof, was not a scaffold within the meaning of the statute. That case clearly discloses the impossibility of fixing an arbitrary point at which a thing ceases to be a mere platform and becomes a scaffold. There Judge Haight said of the statute that "what the legislature evidently had in mind was scaffolding on buildings or structures where its use was obviously dangerous to life and limb of an employee thereon in case of a fall." (p. 128.) That is true, but it is just as impossible to exactly fix the point at which a thing may become obviously dangerous to life and limb in case of a fall as it is to say with dogmatic certainty that a thing of one height, length, and breadth is a structure, while a thing of the same character, but of lesser dimensions, does not fall within that definition. The inherent difficulties of the subject are such as to finally compel us to work out each case upon its own peculiar facts, in the light of the manifest purpose of the legislature to secure greater protection to the employee, and to impose upon the employer directly a personal obligation which, under the common law, he had the right to delegate to competent employees. Upon the facts disclosed by the record, we think the conclusion that the car upon which the plaintiff was employed was a structure justifies the further conclusion that the temporary support which surrounded it was a scaffold.

Having reached this decision, the other facts of record present no obstacle to plaintiff's recovery, for the evidence was such as to support a finding that the scaffold was furnished by the defendant, that the plaintiff took no part in its erection, and that the defects in the plank which broke were not so obvious as to charge the plaintiff with responsibility for his own injuries. This disposition of the case renders it unnecessary to discuss the other questions argued orally and in the briefs.

The order of the Appellate Division should therefore be affirmed, and judgment absolute is ordered for the plaintiff upon defendant's stipulation, with costs to the plaintiff in all courts.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

WILLIAM WYNKOOP, Respt.,
v.

LUDLOW VALVE MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Appt.

(196 N. Y. 324, 89 N. E. 827.)

Master — statutory duty to guard machinery — tracks.

A statute requiring a master to guard all vats, pans, saws, planers, cogs, gearing, belting, shafting, set screws, and machinery

Note. — What is comprehended in expression "machinery of every description," in statutes imposing duty on master as to placing guards.

Cases have not been included in which it was admitted or apparently conceded that the particular contrivance or appliance was machinery within the meaning of the stat-of every description, does not apply to an elevated track running near galleries in a factory, upon which run traveling cranes, so as to render the master liable to a servant injured by falling onto the track, in front of the crane, to his injury.

(November 9, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Rensselaer County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Murray Downs, with Messrs. Rosendale & Hessberg, for appellant:

Masters are required only to guard ute, and the decision turns upon other questions, as, for instance, whether the servant assumed the risk of the unguarded machinery.

This note is confined strictly to cases involving statutes which impose upon the master the duty of placing guards for the safety of his servants; and cases involving the proper construction of similar phrases in statutes not involving the placing of guards have been excluded.

A somewhat similar question arises under statutes making the master liable for defects in the ways, works, and machinery, but the word "machinery" in such a statute might well include various tools and contrivances which would not be embraced by the phrase "machinery of every description," in statutes making it the master's duty to place guards. As, for instance, in Clements v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 127 Ala. 166, 28 So. 643, the court passed upon the question whether or not a crowbar was machinery within the meaning of the statute which makes employers liable for injuries caused by defects in the condition of their ways, works, machinery, or plant; of course, it would be utterly absurd to argue that a crowbar could possibly have been intended to be embraced within a statute making it the duty of the master to guard "machinery of every description." Again, in many cases of this kind it is impossible to tell whether the contrivance or appliance in question would be considered a part of the machinery or a part of the ways or works. Thus, in Brouillette v. Connecticut River R. Co. 162 Mass. 198, 38 N. E. 507, it was held that a wire used to connect the joints of the rails of an electric railroad, to facilitate the transmission of the electricity through the rails, was a part of the ways, works, or machinery of the railroad, within the meaning of the statute; but the court does not point out whether it was considered part of the machinery or part of the works or ways.

The following appliances or contrivances have been held to be embraced within the phrase "machinery of every description," as used in statutes imposing upon the master the duty of placing guards:

—a drop hammer used to break scrap iron into smaller pieces, the purpose of the guard being to prevent pieces of the iron from flying. Green v. American Car & Foundry Co. 163 Ind. 135, 71 N. E. 268; Inland Steel Co. v. Kachwinaki, 80 C. C. A. 571, 151 Fed. 219.

—a revolving fan placed in an inconspicuous position, although it was not usual to guard fans of that description. Jones v. American Caramel Co. 225 Pa. 644, 74 Atl. 613.

—a conveyor in a cement factory, consisting of a long, cylindrical, rotating rod, with flanges attached. United States Cement Co. v. Cooper (Ind. App.) 82 N. E. 981.

—a crane used to hoist molten metal, although portable, and capable of being used outside defendant's shop. Crawford & McC. Co. v. Gose (Ind. App.) 82 N. E. 984.

And a jointer used to "edge" boards, which consisted of two revolving knives about 16 inches wide, and projecting slightly above the surface of an iron table, was held in Godwin v. Newcombe, 1 Ont. L. Rep. 525, to be machinery within the meaning of the Ontario factories act, the dangerous parts of which are thereby required to be, so far as practicable, securely guarded.

And a commercial ice house which is extensively equipped with machinery, and in which numerous operatives are employed, is a factory within the meaning of the New York statute, so that the machinery therein must be guarded as required by that statute. *Rabe v. pose of grinding is not within the statute. National Drill Co. v. Myers, 40 Ind. App. 322, 81 N. E. 1103.

—nor a machine described as a "liner," consisting of an iron frame on which rested a heavy, hollow, revolving roller, filled with steam, and heated to a high temperature, upon the top of which and revolving thereon was another and smaller solid iron roller. Jenkins v. LaFayette Box Board & Paper Co. 43 Ind. App. 463, 87 N. E. 992.

—nor the rapidly revolving cylinders of a printing press. Bemis Indianapolis Bag Co. v. Krentler, 167 Ind. 653, 79 N. E. 974.

—nor a square opening in a floor, below which was certain machinery consisting of an arrangement of rollers and knives which revolved at a high rate of speed, the purpose and use of which was to mix sawdust, damp clay, and other materials to the proper proportions and consistency for molding into shape for tiling and building material. National Fire Proofing Co. v. Roper, 38 Ind. App. 600, 77 N. E. 370.

The statute requires to be guarded only those parts of machinery which, in reasonable anticipation, may be a source of danger to the operatives. Byrne v. Nye & W. Carpet Co. 46 App. Div. 479, 61 N. Y. Supp. 741.

So, the statute is not intended to embrace shafting or set screws 14 or more feet above the floor, and reached only by a ladder. Glens Falls Portland Cement Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 162 N. Y. 399, 56 N. E. 897; Dillon v. National Coal Tar Co. 181 N. Y. 215, 73 N. E. 978.

Nor does the statute apply to shafting 8 feet from the floor. Scialo v. Steffens, 105 App. Div. 592, 94 N. Y. Supp. 305.

In Laporte Carriage Co. v. Sullender, 165 Ind. 290, 75 N. E. 277, the appliance in question was an emery belt used as a polishing machine, and in holding that the complaint did not show a cause of action, the court said: "There being nothing in the statute in question to indicate to the contrary, the general phrase, namely, 'and machinery of every description therein,' must, under the rule stated, be construed as meaning and including machinery or appliances belonging to or of the class or character designated as 'vats, pans, saws,' etc."

But in Inland Steel Co. v. Kachwinski, supra, it was held that the Sullender Case was decided merely upon questions of pleading, and that the emery belt in question might have been brought within the statute by averring and proving that it was of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the same kind as an unguarded vat, pan, saw, etc., with respect to danger of operation and practicability of erecting guards. The language used in the Sullender Case does not tend to support this view, but it is supported by the fact that the plaintiff was given leave, upon request, to file an amended complaint.

A different view, however, was taken of the Sullender Case in Pien v. Miznerr, 41 Ind. App. 255, 83 N. E. 784, where it was held that the statute included a laundry mangle, and the appellate court believing that its decision was contrary to the rule of the Sullender Case, transferred the cause to the supreme court with the recommendation that the Sullender Case be overruled or modified; but when the case came before the supreme court in 170 Ind. 659, 84 N. E. 981, this question was not discussed at all, but the lower court was instructed to sustain a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that the complaint disclosed contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

The failure to provide a chute or conveyor to carry slabs of wood and other material from the second floor of a building, so as to remove the danger of a workman on the ground floor being injured by the refuse being thrown down, was held not to be a violation of the statutory duty to safeguard machinery, in Crum v. North Vernon Pump & Lumber Co. 34 Ind. App. 253, 72 N. E. 193, appeal dismissed in 163 Ind. 596, 72 N. E. 587.

A rather unusual view of a similar statute was taken in Sutton v. Des Moines Bakery Co. 135 Iowa, 390, 112 N. W. 836, where, in holding that the master was not liable for failing to place a safety hood on a dough mixer, the court said: "It is difficult to see how this statute imposes any greater duty upon the defendant than that which would rest upon it without special statute. The defendant would be negligent if it failed to properly guard these rollers for the purpose of preventing injury that would otherwise be likely to result to an employee, and it may be conceded that, on the question of defendant's negligence, it would have been proper to submit to the jury the issue as to whether the failure to provide a safety hood was negligence under the circumstances."

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's fingers on his left hand were cut off by one of the wheels of the truck of a traveling crane in the defendant's factory. In the defendant's factory is a gallery about 20 feet above the ground floor, which extends around 3 sides thereof. There is a space between the side galleries of about 40 feet. Along the inner side of each side gallery there are timbers 12 inches square extending the whole length thereof, which are situated from 2½ to 3 feet above the floor of the gallery. On the center of these timbers are fastened rails like the heavy rails used for steam railroad tracks. The defendant maintains a crane for lifting and moving heavy weights in the lower part of the building, which is carried upon a truck extending across the space between the galleries and the wheels of said truck run upon said tracks. The machinery used by the defendant's employees faces the outside of the building. On the west gallery there is a long lathe near the center of the building, the back of which is about 3 feet from the timbers on which the rails are fastened, and near the end of such lathe, attached to a post, which is also west of the timbers, but partly east of the lathe, is a drill press with which the plaintiff was about to work on the morning of the accident. In the space surrounded by the lathe on the west, a cupboard on the north, the drill press on the south, and said timbers on the east, being a space about 3x12 feet, are kept certain form boxes and other things used in connection with the work conducted on said gallery. The plaintiff's work that morning was to drill certain brass valves with said drill press, and it was necessary for him in doing so to have one of the boxes or forms in which to hold such valves while they were being drilled, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) and he went to the space or room in which the boxes were stored, and looked over about 100 of them in an effort to find a form to fit the particular valves on which he was to work. As he returned through this small room, assorting the boxes, and continuing his effort to find a form, he thought he saw one that could be used by him, and, as he reached for it, he, in some way which does not appear, slipped or tripped, and as he did so, he put out his hand upon the top of the rail just as a wheel of the crane truck was passing, and his fingers were injured as stated.

The plaintiff had been employed in a machine shop for many years, and he was entirely familiar with the situation of the track and the use of the truck. The only question which is now before us for consideration is as to the alleged negligence of the defendant, under all the circumstances, in not guarding the rail. It is claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant failed to obey the labor law (Laws 1901, chap. 9, § 81), which requires that "all vats, pans, saws, planers, cogs, gearing, belting, shafting, set screws, and machinery of every description, shall be properly guarded." There is no testimony in the record to show that it was practical to guard the rail, or that such a rail is now or ever has been guarded in any similar or other factory. The wheels of such truck were from 15 to 18 inches in diameter, and the structure of the truck extended above the wheels, so that it was not possible to guard the track by a covering and continue its use. It is not suggested, and it does not appear, how the track could have been guarded, except, perhaps, by the construction of a fence or partition at a point so far inside of the rail that it would not interfere with the truck, and at such a height as to prevent a person intentionally or by accident falling over it upon the track. The danger arising from unguarded vats, pans, saws, planers, cogs, gearing, belting, shafting, and set screws is more or less hidden, and consequently, when unguarded, they constitute special and unnecessary exposure to injury. The intention of the legislature in directing that certain things should be guarded was thereby to remove all unnecessary danger to persons employed upon or about such special dangers. Other mechanical appliances constituting similar hazards were doubtless included in the words "machinery of every description." Where, however, danger to employees does not exist or is not reasonably to be expected, it is not necessary, under the act quoted, for employers to guard even the enumerated machines or appliances. Dillon v. National Coal Tar Co. 181 N. Y. 215, 73 N. E. 978; Glens Falls Portland Cement Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 162 N. Y. 399, 56 N. E. 897; Scialo v. Steffens, 105 App. Div. 592, 94 N. Y. Supp. 305. This court, in Glens Falls Portland Cement Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co., said: "We think, however, that the legislature could not have intended that every piece of machinery in a large building should be covered or guarded. This would be impracticable. What evidently was intended was that those parts of the machinery which were dangerous to the servants whose duty required them to work in its immediate vicinity should be properly guarded, so as to minimize, as far as practicable, the dangers attending their labors. Human foresight is limited, and masters are not called upon to guard against every possible danger. They are required only to guard against such dangers as would occur to a reasonably prudent man as liable to happen." Page 403 of 162 N. Y.

There is no inherent danger in a track upon which a car or truck is run. The danger of remaining on a track when a car of any kind is approaching is neither hidden nor obscure. In this case, as we have seen, the track was elevated higher than an ordinary table, and the defendant's employees were not required to work upon or about it. Any contact with it would have to have been intentional and voluntary, or arise from some intervening accident. There was no defect in the floor of the room to precipitate an accident. The possibility of a person falling while in such room, and, in falling, of putting his hand in front of the wheel of the truck, was so remote that an ordinarily prudent man would not guard against it. The track has been maintained in the same way for several years, and no previous accident had occurred. An experienced man would not have anticipated such an accident. The remote possibility of a person falling in front of approaching wheels exists in every case where vehicles of any kind are moved, with or without trucks, about the floor of a factory building or otherwise, or where steam or other cars are propelled upon rails along unfenced passenger platforms. It is one of those necessary and obvious dangers not commonly guarded against by fences or partitions, and which should not be held to be within a general statute for the "protection of employees operating machinery." If the legislature require fences to be erected in such cases, it should so state in a more specific enactment.

new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

KLOTS THROWING COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
MANUFACTURERS' COMMERCIAL COMPANY.

(103 C. C. A. 305, 179 Fed. 813.)

Note — negotiability — terms of contract.

A note which, on its face, is subject to the terms of a contract between maker and payee, is not negotiable.

Note. — Reference to extrinsic agreement as affecting negotiability of bill or note.

This note is confined in the main to cases where the reference is to an extrinsic agreement which must be consulted in order to ascertain its possible effect upon the obligation imported by the bill or note. It is not intended to cover cases where the bill or note itself embodies the whole agreement, e. g., a case like Siegel v. Chicago Trust & Sav. Bank, 7 L.R.A. 537, where the note recited that it was given for the privilege of advertising in street cars, under conditions and for a term there definitely stated, the whole agreement apparently being embodied in the note itself.

The effect upon the question of negotiability of a reference in a bill or note to a mortgage or other instrument by which it is collaterally secured is not within the scope of this note. As to the negotiability of a note secured by mortgage, as affected by provisions in the mortgage, see note to Brooke v. Struthers, 35 L.R.A. 536.

For a note on the effect of a reference to account or fund as affecting negotiability of instrument, see Hays v. Lapeyre, 35 L.R.A. 647, and a supplemental note thereto on the same point in 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 231.

On the question of reservation of title to property as affecting negotiability of note for purchase price, see note to Choate v. Stevens, 43 L.R.A. 277.

Statement by Noyes, Circuit Judge:

Writ of error to review a judgment entered upon a verdict directed by the court in favor of the defendant in error, who was the plaintiff below. In the following statement and opinion the parties are designated as in the circuit court.

The action was brought to recover upon a note† of which the following is a copy:

contract in such a way as to make the bill or note subject to the terms of that contract, as distinguished from a reference importing merely that the extrinsic agreement was the origin of the transaction, or constitutes the consideration of the bill or note, the negotiability of the paper is destroyed.

In entire accord with this rule is KLOTS THROWING CO. v. MANUFACTURERS' COMMERCIAL CO., wherein a promissory note 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Six months after date we promise to pay to the order of Regenerated Cold Air Company, thirty-one hundred and sixty-six 00/100 dollars at 487 Broadway, New York City, with interest at 6 per cent per annum.

Value received, subject to terms of contract between maker and payee of October 25th, 1905.

No. — Due July 15th, '06.

Klots Throwing Company,
H. D. Klots, Prest.

The complaint alleged that the note had been indorsed and assigned by said Regenerated Cold Air Company to the plaintiff, negotiable note or as a written agreement for the payment of money. Therefore, without defining terms, and for convenience, it is designated as a note,—negotiable or non-negotiable.

contained a stipulation that it was "subject to terms of contract between maker and payee of October 25th, 1905," and the following additional cases which are sufficiently set out in that case:

McComas v. Haas, 107 Ind. 512, 8 N. E. 579; Cushing v. Field, 70 Me. 50, 35 Am. Rep. 293; Dilley v. Van Wie, 6 Wis. 209 ("subject to the provisions contained in an agreement this day made between said Carter and myself").

So, in American Exch. Bank v. Blanchard, 7 Allen, 333, Bigelow, Ch. J., in passing upon the question of the negotiability of a promissory note containing a provision that it was payable "subject to the policy," gave the reason for the rule: "It was clearly intended to be made subject to a policy of insurance then existing between the parties. This is the result, not of mere conjecture, but is a reasonable inference from the facts which are apparent on the face of the contract. Thus interpreted, it is too plain for discussion that the promise is in its nature contingent, and dependent for its fulfilment on other stipulations than those which are inserted in the body of the contract. To determine whether, at its maturity, any money would become due upon it, it would be necessary to have recourse to the policy therein referred to, and to ascertain whether any loss had occurred which would constitute a valid claim against the company in favor of the promisors, and operate as payment or set-off in whole or in part for the amount which the defendants had agreed by their promise to pay to the company. The legal effect of the stipulation was to incorporate the policy into the contract for the payment of the money, and to make the latter dependent on the contingency that no claim would arise on the policy against the company before the expiration of the time when the promise would mature. Such a contract clearly comes within the principle on which it is held that promises which are not ab-which was the lawful owner and holder thereof. The answer alleged, among other things, that said Regenerated Cold Air Company had failed to perform its part of the agreement referred to in the note, and set up by way of counterclaim a demand for damages for such nonperformance. Upon the trial the court ruled that the note was a negotiable instrument, basing its decision upon the opinion of this court reported in 170 Fed. 311, 95 C. C. A. 203, reversing a judgment in the case sustaining a demurrer to the complaint. Consequently the court further ruled that the defendant was not entitled to establish defenses available as against the payee of the note, and directed a verdict for the full amount thereof.

Argued before Lacombe, Coxe, and Noyes, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. John L. Wilkie and Chester A. Jayne, with Messrs. Gould & Wilkie, for plaintiff in error.

Noyes, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The trial judge misapprehended our former opinion in this case. We did not hold that the note in question was a negotiable note. We merely held that whether it was negotiable or not, its indorsement and assignment gave the plaintiff the right to recover thereon. If the note were negotiable, the plaintiff would recover as indorsee; if non-negotiable, as assignee. It was unnecessary to determine the question of negotiability. The case as now presented turns upon this question of negotiability. If the note was negotiable, the trial court properly directed a verdict for the indorsee, for the defendant was not entitled to establish against it the defenses offered. If, on solute as to amount or event cannot be deemed negotiable. The necessity of certainty and precision in mercantile affairs, and the inconveniences which would result if paper securities were encumbered with conditions and contingencies, have led to the establishment of an inflexible rule that a promise, to be negotiable, must be absolute."

In Kingston v. Long, 4 Dougl. K. B. 9, wherein it appeared that an order was given to pay money, "provided the terms mentioned to them in letters of that date were complied with," it was held that it was not a negotiable bill of exchange, since it was made payable only upon a contingency. To the contention raised that, "as the drawer had given all the appearance of a negotiable bill to the instrument, it ought to be presumed that the condition was such as would not prevent its negotiability," Buller, Justice, said in answer: "It is not true that the drawer has given this instrument all the appearance of a bill of exchange; for it appears on the face of it that it is not to be payable at all events, but only upon a contingency."

In First Nat. Bank v. Badham, 86 S. C. 170, 68 S. E. 536, certain notes were held non-negotiable on account of the following reference contained therein: "For value received in one machinery, as per contract November 23, 1899." The court said: "This provision is notice to the commercial world of a contract made November 23, 1899, in connection with the purchase of the machinery for which these notes were given; the terms of the contract do not appear on the face of the notes, but it is sufficiently referred to and stated to inform those who deal with these notes they must take the contract into consideration in so doing."

Rep. 138, 60 N. E. 586, a promissory note payable in a certain time after the completion of certain work "according to the requirements of a certain agreement of even date herewith" was held not to be negotiable.

In Hays v. Gwin, 19 Ind. 19, a note contained the following provision: "Provided, however, that prior to the time when this note becomes due, said Ash [payee] shall pay and have satisfaction entered of record of a certain mortgage given by him to . . . , for $250, dated August 26, 1851, which mortgage is on the lands for which this note is given." In a suit upon this note by an indorsee, it was held that it was not negotiable.

In Kingsbury v. Wall, 68 Ill. 311, the bill of exchange declared on was only payable in the event of the happening of a certain contingency, viz.: that the party to whom property to a certain amount was to be delivered should have in his hands, ready to be delivered, a deed from certain parties for specific property described therein. The court said: "The single question presented by this record is whether the instrument upon which the action is founded is assignable, so as to enable the assignee to maintain the suit in his own name. We think it is not. . . . It is indispensable that all bills of exchange or promissory notes, to be assignable under our statute or at common law, must be certainly payable, and not dependent on any contingency either as to the event or the fund out of which payment is to be made, or the parties by or to whom payment is to be made."

An ordinary promissory note with an added stipulation that "this note is given for part payment of rent of certain pasture fields, and is not to be paid unless I have the use of said premise, in accordance with a certain lease and agreement," is not the other hand, the note was non-negotiable, the action of the court was manifestly erroneous.

In examining the question of negotiability, it is important to recognize at the outset the distinction between it and any question of pleading. The plaintiff, throughout its brief, insists that because a note contains no conditions precedent, performance of which must be alleged in suing upon it, it is a negotiable instrument. But this conclusion does not follow. The conclusion which does follow is that the plaintiff, upon proving the note, is entitled to recover the full amount thereof in the absence of defenses established by the defendant. Thus, in our former opinion, we said that performance of the contract referred to in the note was not made a condition precedent to the payment thereof; that, as a consequence, it was unnecessary to plead such performance, and that non-performance could be set up, if at all, only by way of defense. But, as already pointed out, we did not hold that, on account of the absence of conditions precedent, the note was a negotiable instrument.

It is elementary that a promise to pay must be absolute and unconditional to make the instrument containing it a negotiable note. If payment be dependent upon a condition or contingency, the instrument is not negotiable. In many cases the contingency is expressed in the form of a condition precedent. But we do not think it necessary that it should be so expressed. In our opinion, when a note contains special stipulations, and its payment is subject to contingencies, it fails to possess the character of a negotiable instrument, and is subject in the hands of an assignee to any defense which would be available if it were still held by the original payee. See McClelland v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 110 N. Y. 469, 1 L.R.A. 299, 6 Am. St. Rep. 397, 18 N. E. 237. And, as bearing especially negotiable. Jennings v. First Nat. Bank, 13 Colo. 417, 16 Am. St. Rep. 210, 22 Pac. 777.

In Baird v. Underwood, 74 Ill. 176, where a note provided for the payment of a certain sum "on condition said amount is not provided for as agreed by J. Updike," it was held not to be negotiable.

In Haskell v. Lambert, 16 Gray, 592, it was held that a promissory note containing a stipulation that it was to be held as collateral security for certain specified debts for which different persons were liable was not negotiable, since, upon the payment of the debts by the principal debtors, the note would not be payable.

To the same effect, see Robins v. May, 11 Ad. & El. 213; American Nat. Bank v. Sprague, 14 R. I. 410; Hall v. Merrick, 40 U. C. Q. B. 566; Sutherland v. Patterson, 4 Ont. Rep. 565.

As indicated at the beginning of the note, the question whether a reference in a bill or note to collateral agreements or instruments by which it is itself secured affects the negotiability of the note, is not within the scope of this note.

In Oatman v. Taylor, 29 N. Y. 649, wherein several notes were given "for interest on a loan . . . according to the conditions of a certain writing," and others were "for value received, . . . according to the conditions of a certain agreement in writing" the effect of the stipulations upon the negotiability of the paper was not decided, Johnson, J., merely saying: "If it were necessary to determine the question whether these several instruments, with the exception of the first [which contained no qualifying words], were negotiable, so as to protect the holder taking them before maturity from the provisions of the contract, without any other notice than what appears upon their face, I should incline most decidedly to the opinion that they were not, but would be affected and controlled by the contract, in the hands of any holder. . . . I have not thought it necessary, however, that this question should be passed upon here."

Anything put upon any portion of the face or back of a promissory note by the maker, before delivery, is a part of the contract. Hence it was held in Costello v. Crowell, 127 Mass. 293, 34 Am. Rep. 367, that the words, "Given . . . with agreement," written on the margin of a promissory note, destroyed its negotiability.

And in Parker v. American Exch. Bank (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 1071, certain promissory notes, each indorsed on back, "This note is given in accordance with and subject to the terms of a contract made February 10, 1891," were held to be non-negotiable.

In Van Zandt v. Hopkins, 151 Ill. 248, 37 N. E. 845, affirming 40 Ill. App. 635, the words "Ctf. of stock No. 113 for 50 shares of stock . . . to be surrendered on payment of this note," were written after the signature of the makers, and the court held that the negotiability of the paper was impaired because the payment of the note was subject to a contingency.

Where reference to consideration or origin of transaction.

As has been stated, the reference in a bill or note to some extrinsic agreement, in order to destroy its negotiability, must be such as indicates that the paper is to be burdened with the conditions of that agreement. Where, therefore, the reference is simply a recital of the consideration for which the paper was given, or is merely a reference to the origin of the transaction, its negotiability is not affected thereby.

Ryland v. Brown, 2 Head, 270 (the notes recited the consideration as follows: "The same being in part for an 85-acre and upon the facts in this case, we think that whenever the payment of a note is expressly made subject to the equities growing out of, and defenses based upon, an existing or contemporaneous agreement, a person taking such note holds it subject to such equities and defenses.

The distinction between conditions precedent, performance of which must be alleged in bringing the action, and contingencies and equities which must be set up by way of defense, and which yet serve to qualify the obligation to pay the note, and deprive it of negotiability, may be shown by illustration. Thus, let us suppose that the note in suit contained the following stipulation: "This note in the hands of all holders is subject to all defenses which would be available to the maker, based upon the contract between the maker and the payee of October, 1905, in the same manner and to the same extent as if it were held by the payee."

Such a provision would not constitute a condition precedent. It would not be necessary to plead performance of the contract in a suit upon the note. And yet it could hardly be claimed that an assignment of 100-acre tract of land, this day bought of him"); Doherty v. Perry, 38 Ind. 15 (promissory note given for certain patent right); Hubert v. Grady, 59 Tex. 502 (promissory note "for part of the purchase money in a tract of land purchased" of certain parties); Smilie v. Stevens, 39 Vt. 315 (provision in instrument for return of the maker's guaranty of the payee's note to another); Treat v. Cooper, 22 Me. 203 ("contents of this note" to be paid on mortgage of third party to payee); Wood v. Shaw, 3 Lower Can. Jur. 169 (notes given for insurance premiums on certain vessels, containing such recital); Elliott v. Smitherman, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 338 (promissory note reciting the purchase of another note).

In First Nat. Bank v. Michael, 96 N. C. 53, 1 S. E. 855, wherein it appeared in a promissory note that it was given as the balance of the purchase money for certain land "sold this day by . . . to me, and for which I hold a bond for title," Mr. Justice Merrimon said: "The defendant contends that the reference in the body of the bond to the consideration for which it was given rendered it non-negotiable. We do not think so. This inference does not imply a condition or limitation, affecting the promise to pay the sum of money specified; it simply recites the particular consideration, and is intended to mark the bond as of a particular transaction between the original parties to it, for their convenience. This view is strengthened by the fact that the bond is expressly in terms made payable to 'order,' thus indicating the purpose of the parties to make it negotiable. The mere fact that the particular consideration of the note is mentioned in it, and that it possibly might involve or give rise to equities between the parties to it, cannot prevent its negotiability by indorsement. To have this effect, it must appear from the reference to it in the note, that it qualifies the promise to pay the sum of money specified, and renders it conditional, or the amount to be paid uncertain. A different rule would much embarrass business transactions involving negotiable notes and bonds, and tend to impair the freedom and confidence that ought to prevail and be upheld in the course of general business and trade."

Where the note contained a reference that it was "for a part of the third payment on the Garee plantation purchased of said Gregg, as per agreement of the 14th February, 1874," the court held that its negotiability was not affected. Bank of Sherman v. Apperson, 4 Fed. 25.

In Stevens v. Blunt, 7 Mass. 240, it was held that a promissory note payable on a certain named date, or when "he [payee] completes the building according to contract," was negotiable.

See to the same effect, Goodloe v. Taylor, 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 458; Garner v. Hall, 114 Ala. 166, 21 So. 835.

In Clanin v. Esterly Harvesting Mach. Co. 118 Ind. 372, 3 L.R.A. 863, 21 N. E. 35, a recital that "this note is given to secure the payment of the Universalist church debt" was held not to render the obligation collateral or conditional, since it merely related to the consideration upon which the note was given.

In Phelps & B. Windmill Co. v. Honeywell, 7 Kan. App. 645, 53 Pac. 488, the note recited that it was given for the erection of certain improvements upon real property, "pursuant to previous written order in that behalf; and the execution, delivery, and acceptance of this note shall not in any way or manner be deemed a waiver of any lien [the payee] may have therefor upon said real property in said written order described." Apparently the court assumed that the reference to the written order in the note was merely a recital of the origin of the transaction, and therefore in nowise affected the negotiability of the instrument, for it said nothing about the effect of this particular stipulation.

And no question was raised as to the negotiability of the note in Jewett v. Lyon, 3 G. Greene, 577, where it contained a recital that it was in part payment for land which was deeded to the grantor by a certain party.

Nor was any raised in Bringham v. Leighty, 61 Ind. 524, where the provision in a promissory note was "given for purchase money on real estate; if title defective, note void."

In Taylor v. Curry, 109 Mass. 36, 12 Am. Rep. 661, it was held that a promissory note given to an insurance company is not rendered unnegotiable by bearing on its face the note would shut out the defenses which the parties had stipulated should exist in the case of an assignment. Any such claim, if sustained, would deprive the parties of their right to make lawful contracts. The obligation to pay in such a case as this would be qualified and conditional, but would not depend upon the fulfilment of any condition precedent.

The real inquiry in the present case is whether the promise in the note should be treated as the substantial equivalent of the supposititious promise we have examined. Manifestly, if the provision "subject to terms of contract between maker and payee" constitutes merely a reference to the agreement or a statement of the consideration for the note; it does not impair the negotiability of the latter. So, if it merely constitutes notice of the existence of the contract, and not of the breach thereof, it would not affect negotiability. But the evident purpose of the parties to this note was to go further, and make it subject to and to impress upon it the defenses to which the maker would be entitled under the contract. The assignee took it in that condition. To deprive the maker of those defenses, upon the words, "on policy No. 33,386." The court said: "Such a reference may be for mere convenience, or for any other reason, but it cannot be interpreted as a modification of the promise."

To the same effect, see Union Ins. Co. v. Greenleaf, 64 Me. 123; Barker v. Valentine, 10 Gray, 341; White v. Haight, 16 N. Y. 310; Bresce v. Crumpton, 121 N. C. 122, 28 S. E. 351.

So, in Pendleton v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 7 Fed. 169, it was held that a note was negotiable where it contained a clause reading, "for premium on policy No. 2,346, which policy shall become void if this draft is not paid at maturity."

In Williams v. Albany City Ins. Co. 19 Mich. 451, 2 Am. Rep. 95; Williams v. Republic Ins. Co. 19 Mich. 469; Roehner v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 63 N. Y. 165; Kirk v. Dodge County Mut. Ins. Co. 39 Wis. 138, 20 Am. Rep. 39; and Washington County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 26 Vt. 77,—wherein it appeared that certain notes were given for premiums on insurance policies of certain numbers, the effect of the reference to the policies on the negotiability of the notes does not appear to have been considered.

And, in Berenson v. London & L. F. Ins. Co. 201 Mass. 172, 87 N. E. 687, where an instrument was held not to be negotiable because of a specified condition not involved in this note, it seems that a reference therein to a certain numbered insurance policy would not have affected its negotiability.

A promissory note containing a mode by which it may be discharged is not rendered non-negotiable by the fact that another contract is referred to; thus, in Pool v. McCrary, 1 Ga. 319, 44 Am. Dec. 655, it was held that a provision in a promissory note which was for a certain sum, payable unconditionally on a day named, enabling the makers thereof to relieve themselves from liability thereon provided they should secure the discharge of the payee from liability on a certain other obligation referred to in the note, did not render the note non-negotiable.

493, wherein the note contained a provision that it was "given in accordance with the terms of a certain contract, under the same date, between the same parties," the court held that the negotiability of the paper was not impaired; and apparently this is the effect of Biegler v. Merchants' Loan & T. Co. 164 Ill. 197, 45 N. E. 512.

In Jury v. Barker, El. Bl. & El. 450, the promise to pay in the note was, "as per memorandum of agreement." Lord Campbell, Ch. J., said: "The note here is an absolute and unconditional promise as to the payer, the payee, the amount, and the date. If the addition of the words in question make the promise conditional, it is on the defendant to show that, and he has not done so."

And a similar holding was made in Brill v. Crick, 1 Mees. & W. 232.

In Bank of Louisiana v. Williams, 21 La. Ann. 121, it seems that the instrument involved was a non-negotiable promissory note, and was questioned upon a point not involved in this note. It contained a stipulation, however, that the makers would "comply with all the conditions of the mortgage this day made by us, and also with the obligations of the charter of the said bank." It appears from what the court said, that the stipulation in the note would not have impaired the negotiability of the paper had it been of that nature. Howell, J., said: "The further stipulations, . . . impose no condition and propose no contingency on which payment is to depend, but recognize accessory obligations contracted or enacted for the security of the payment, and their omission would not have impaired the obligation to pay the money."

No case other than KLOTS THROWING CO. v. MANUFACTURERS' COMMERCIAL CO. appears to have expressly considered the question as to whether the reference to some extrinsic contract in the bill or note, in order to destroy negotiability, must disclose a condition precedent.

It will be observed that in many of the cases above cited, in which the reference was held to destroy negotiability, it did not disclose a condition precedent, but, at most, a defense.

the ground of the negotiability of the note, would work great injustice. And we think that we are not required to reach such result. As between the maker and the payee of a note, payment is, as a matter of law, subject to existing equities and defenses, even in the absence of any statement to that effect in the note. It is not too much to hold that when a promise is expressly limited by a provision in the note itself, assignees should take it subject to such limitation. In our opinion, the special stipulation in the present note limits and qualifies the obligation to pay so that it is not absolute, but is a prima facie obligation, subject to be defeated by the maker's defenses.

Authorities cited by the plaintiff as well as by the defendant support these views. Thus, in Jewett v. Lyon, 3 G. Greene, 577, referred to by the plaintiff, it was said in a suit by the assignee of a promissory note containing a stipulation for a deduction from the amount thereof in a certain contingency: "The obligation to pay is in all respects a promissory note, and the stipulations attached to it do not change in any respect its character, or weaken the liability of the maker. It only provides for a certain contingency, the onus to establish which lies upon the defendant. Upon the introduction of this note in evidence, the plaintiffs made out a prima facie case, and in the absence of any rebutting testimony on the part of the defendant, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and hence the court did not err in overruling the motion for a nonsuit."

So, in Cushing v. Field, 70 Me. 50, 35 Am. Rep. 293, it was held that a note payable to order, on the face of which was the following indorsement: "This note is subject to a contract made November 13, 1874,"—was not negotiable, and that an assignee took it subject to all the equities between the original parties.

In American Exch. Bank v. Blanchard, 7 Allen, 333, an instrument containing a promise to pay a stipulated sum at a fixed time, "subject to the policy," was held, in a suit by the indorsee, not to be a negotiable promissory note because the promise was not absolute. The court said: "Thus interpreted, it is too plain for discussion that the promise is in its nature contingent, and dependent for its fulfillment on other stipulations than those which are inserted in the body of the contract. To determine whether at its maturity any money would become due upon it, it would be necessary to have recourse to the policy therein referred to, and to ascertain whether any loss had occurred which would constitute a valid claim against the company in 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) favor of the promisors, and operate as payment or set-off in whole or in part for the amount which the defendants had agreed by their promise to pay to the company."

In McComas v. Haas, 107 Ind. 512, 518, 8 N. E. 579, 582, the note contained the following clause: "This note is given in consideration of, and is subject to, one certain contract," etc., and the court said: "Although the note in suit was, by its terms, payable at a bank in this state, with the clause or condition quoted on its face, it was not negotiable as an inland bill of exchange, and was not governed by the law merchant; but the appellant, as the assignee thereof before maturity, took such note subject to all the equities existing between the appellee as its maker, and S. B. J. Bryant as the payee and assignor thereof."

In Dilley v. Van Wie, 6 Wis. 209, 212, a note contained the following provision: "Subject to the provisions contained in an agreement this day made between said Carter and myself." In a suit by the indorsee, the court said: "The instrument in writing on which judgment was rendered is not a promissory note. Its payment is made subject to a contingency, or rather to the equities between the parties, growing out of a contemporaneous agreement between the same parties. This is expressed upon the face of the (so-called) note, and deprives it of its commercial character."

In Bringham v. Leighty, 61 Ind. 524, a note contained the following provisions: "This note was given for purchase money on said estate. If title defective, note void."

In an action on the note by an indorsee, it was held that it was not necessary to allege in the complaint that the title to the real estate referred to was not defective, the subject of title in such connection being entirely a matter of defense.

Upon principle and upon what we regard as the weight of authority, we reach the conclusion that the note in question was not negotiable, and that the trial court erred in its rulings.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

H. J. SHANK, Appt.,
v.

EDISON ELECTRIC ILLUMINATING

Master — fellow servants — electrician and lineman.

The electrician and engineer of an electric light company are fellow servants of a lineman, where they exercise no supervisory power over him or the work, so that the company is not liable for their negligence in turning on the current while he is in a position of danger, so as to cause injury to him.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Court of Common Pleas for Lancaster County refusing to take off a nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The opinion of the trial court in discharging the rule to take off the nonsuit, which is referred to in the opinion, is as follows:

Note. — Who are fellow servants of linemen.

Cases are not included in this note in which, although the question of fellow servants may have been raised, it was unnecessary for the court to pass upon that question, as, for instance, where the plaintiff fails to show any negligence upon the part of the defendant, or where the servant was himself guilty of negligence which contributed to the injury.

So, too, where the question of fellow servants is determined by statute, a different question is presented, and cases involving that question have not been taken.

So, cases are excluded where, as in Lord v. Wakefield, 185 Mass. 214, 70 N. E. 123, no question is made of the negligent servant's being a superintendent.

So, too, cases have not been taken where the lineman was injured in the performance of some duty in no wise peculiar to his employment as lineman; as, for instance, while felling trees or digging holes.

In some cases the question of fellow servant, although raised, is eliminated by the finding that the duty of inspecting the poles in climbing which the servant was injured devolved upon the servant himself. Cases of this character will be found in a note to Lynch v. Saginaw Valley Traction Co. 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 774.

A good example of this class of cases is McGorty v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. 69 Conn. 635, 61 Am. St. Rep. 62, 38 Atl. 359, where the court said: "We have no occasion, upon the facts found, to consider whether the foreman Phelps was a fellow servant of the plaintiff. . . . We must assume that, although he knew that, in obedience to the order of the foreman, he was required to do the work upon the pole, yet he was to rely upon his own judgment in determining whether it was safe to climb it without testing it or supporting it, and that it was his right to secure the pole before climbing it if he doubted its safety."

"The testimony in the trial of this case showed that the plaintiff was in the employ of defendant company as a lineman on September 15, 1895, and had been so employed for several years. On that day there was some trouble with the wires of the company, which several attempts had been made to locate, at the switch board in the power plant. After ascertaining that the trouble was not on the circuit where they supposed it to be, the plaintiff returned to the power plant, and in the presence of the foreman of the linemen, the chief engineer of the company, and its chief electrician, or consulting engineer, he made another attempt, and did locate the circuit on which the trouble was. He then threw off the switch of the circuit, which turned the current from it, and told the injured servant was not, strictly speaking, a lineman, but was employed in a somewhat similar capacity, and was injured by dangers similar to those incurred by linemen. In cases of this kind, however, the character of the workman and the nature and cause of the injury will be fully set forth.

The real bearing of different cases upon any given concrete question involving the doctrine of fellow servants cannot be determined without bearing in mind the fact that the term "fellow servant" is used in two distinct senses; and the yet more important fact that there are two entirely distinct tests applied in different jurisdictions to determine who are fellow servants in one of the two senses mentioned above.

Two servants in the employ of a common master may not be fellow servants within the meaning of the rule relieving the master from liability for injuries to his servant, caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, for two distinct reasons: First, the work in which one servant is engaged may be entirely disconnected with the work in which the other is engaged, so that it cannot be said that the employment is common, and one servant would have no knowledge at all of the conditions under which the other is working, could make no provisions for his own protection, nor in any way restrain the conduct of the other servant, so that none of the reasons upon which the fellow-servant rule is said to be based would exist; second, one of the two servants, although working in the same department with the other, may be intrusted with a certain degree of superintendence, so as to be, in the view of the law, a representative of the master, or, as it is commonly called a vice principal.

There are two well-recognized rules as to the determination of the question whether a servant is a vice principal or not; one of which depends upon the character of the act causing the injury, the other upon the grade of the servant.

As to what servants are deemed to be in the same common employment, apart from these three people to leave it open. He, accompanied by the foreman part way, went over the line and found that the wire of defendant company had come in contact with the wire of another company on East King street, about 1½ miles from the power plant. He climbed a pole, and was about to properly adjust the wires, when he received a severe shock and was severely injured, for which injury he seeks to recover damages in this case.

"In his statement, as amended, the plaintiff alleges four acts of negligence: (1) 'that the wires were crossed in another portion of the city; (2) that the defendant had an inexperienced foreman; (3) that its wires were not properly insulated; and (4) 'that he turned or pulled the main switch that conducted electricity over the line that he subsequently went over, and was injured, and at the time he did it, and previous to his starting away from said power house, the defendant had knowledge thereof, and the representatives or officials and persons in employ of said company were informed thereof by the plaintiff, and also requested not to move the said switch, but to leave the same in the condition in which the plaintiff put it; that he was going out on the line to search for the trouble on the same, and repair or correct it; that after the plaintiff left, and unknown to the plaintiff, the said defendant or its employees turned the said switch without the knowledge of or informing the plaintiff thereof, and caused the electricity to pass over the statutes, where no questions as to vice principalship arise, see note to Sofield v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. 50 L.R.A. 417.

Upon the subject, Vice principalship considered with reference to the superior rank of a negligent servant, see note to Stevens v. Chamberlain, 51 L.R.A. 513.

Upon the subject, Vice principalship as determined with reference to the character of the act which caused the injury, see note to Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Olsen, 54 L.R.A. 33.

I. Where no question of vice principalship is involved.

Members of the same gang, although performing somewhat different work, are fellow servants.

Thus, two members of a takeout gang of a telephone company are fellow servants while one is on a pole cutting the wire, and the other is on the ground, pulling it down. Wight v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 137 Ky. 299, 125 S. W. 718.

So, linemen engaged in tying wires to the poles are fellow servants of the men engaged in pulling and stretching wires. Eastern Kentucky Home Teleph. Co. v. Mellon (Ky.) 116 S. W. 709.

And employees who are engaged in removing an electric wire, not under direction of any foreman, but acting in accordance with their own judgment, are fellow servants one with the other. Wagner v. Portland, 40 Or. 389, 60 Pac. 985, 67 Pac. 300.

A lineman engaged in resetting poles broken down by blasting by a crew engaged in repairing the roadbed is a fellow servant of the members of such crew, where he has a right to call upon them for any assistance which he may need, so that he cannot recover for injuries due to their negligence in connection with the work of repairing the roadbed. Neal v. Northern P. R. Co. 57 Minn. 365, 59 N. W. 312.

The negligence of a fellow servant is the proximate cause of injury to a lineman in the employ of an electric lighting company by the fall of a pole, which results from the selection by such employee, from among others, and the attempted use, of a pike pole as a brace, the point of which has become blunted, so that it is no longer fit for the use to which he puts it. Towne v. United Electric Gas & Power Co. 146 Cal. 766, 70 L.R.A. 214, 81 Pac. 124, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 905.

—linemen as fellow servants of members of gang erecting poles.

Linemen who are injured while at work on poles are generally held not to be the fellow servants of the employees who erected the poles originally.

Thus, linemen who set an electric trolley pole will not be held to be the fellow servants of a lineman who is injured two years afterwards because of their negligence in setting a defective pole, where there is no evidence that any of the linemen in defendant's employ at the time of the accident were employed in that capacity at the time the pole was set in the original construction of the road, or that they had any knowledge or means of knowledge of the original defect in the pole, except by taking it out of the ground. Livingway v. Houghton County Street R. Co. 145 Mich. 86, 108 N. W. 662.

So, the members of a gang of workmen digging holes and setting the poles for the construction of a telephone line, under their own foreman, are not the fellow servants of the members of a gang engaged in stringing the wires on the poles, under the supervision of a separate foreman. Ault v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 82 Neb. 434, 130 Am. St. Rep. 686, 118 N. W. 73.

And a lineman injured by the pulling out of a pin which he grasped in climbing a pole is not a fellow servant of the employee who originally placed the pin in the pole. Chisholm v. New England Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 185 Mass. 82, 69 N. E. 1042.

A servant who nailed the bracket upon a pole to which the glass insulators are fastened is not a fellow servant of the lineman who subsequently climbs the pole to tie the wires to the insulators. Eastern Kentucky Home Teleph. Co. v. Mellon, supra.

The foreman of a construction gang, and his assistants, by whom a semaphore was wire to where the plaintiff received his injuries,' etc. No testimony was produced to support the first two allegations of negligence, nor was there any testimony to show that the insulation of the wires was imperfect, or that any other kind of insulation was in general use, or, if another kind had been used, it would have prevented the accident. The testimony in support of the fourth act of negligence was that the chief engineer, who had charge of running the engines of the company in the same room in which the switch board was located, together with the chief electrician, or consulting engineer, some time after the plaintiff left to look for the trouble on the circuit on which he had located it, went to the switch board and tested for the trouble, which they did not find. The engineer then changed the switch so as to turn the current on that circuit.

"We entered judgment of nonsuit at the trial because we were of the opinion that the turning on of the current into the wire upon which plaintiff was at work was the act of a coemployee, for which the defendant company was not liable. In this application to strike off the nonsuit, the only question for our consideration is whether the man who had charge of the engines in the room in which the switch board was located, and who turned on the current, or the chief electrician, or consulting engineer, who was with him, were coemployees of the plaintiff or not.

"The cases are numerous in Pennsylvconstructed, are not the fellow servants of the plaintiff, who was engaged in operating the semaphore. Welty v. Lake Superior Terminal & Transfer R. Co. 100 Wis. 128, 75 N. W. 1022.

II. Fellow servants as dependent upon existence of vice principalship.

In Kentucky, where the superior-servant rule prevails, several cases have held that a telephone or telegraph company is liable for injuries caused to a lineman by the negligence of one in charge of the work, and superior to the lineman. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Ware, 115 Ky. 581, 74 S. W. 289; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Holtby, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 523, 93 S. W. 652; Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Graves, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 972, 104 S. W. 356.

In the majority of the jurisdictions, however, vice principalship is determined by the character of the act causing the injury, and much conflict exists, even among cases presenting facts very similar. With the exception of the two or three cases cited immediately below, the cases have been grouped so far as possible in accordance with the general nature of the alleged negligent acts.

The foreman of a gang of men engaged in stringing telegraph wires over live electric wires of third parties may be at times a fellow servant of the linemen, and at other times a representative of the master; and the question whether he is a fellow servant of the linemen in the doing of the alleged negligent act is ordinarily a question of fact, to be submitted with proper instructions to the jury. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Nolan, 132 Ill. App. 427.

Testimony that an employee temporarily placed in charge of a gang of nine or ten men engaged in constructing a telegraph line does not receive any greater wages than the other linemen is not evidence to show that he is not a vice principal. Fritz v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 25 Utah, 263, 71 Pac. 209.

The negligence of a foreman in charge of a gang of men at work on a tower car on the defendant's electric railroad, in not protecting the men whom he had ordered to proceed with the car over a bridge, from the danger of being struck by an approaching train, was the negligence of the company, for which it was liable. Hillis v. Spokane & I. E. R. Co. (Wash.) 110 Pac. 624.

Servants held to be vice principals by general nature of duties imposed upon them.

In a few cases, the general nature of the duties imposed upon a superintendent or foreman has been held such as to make him a vice principal of the master. It is to be noted that in these cases the superintendent or other employee has the absolute control of the work imposed upon him by the master.

Thus, a wire chief of a telephone company, to whom the company's system of business required all defects, either in wires or telephones, to be reported, was held in Texarkana Teleph. Co. v. Pemberton, 86 Ark. 329, 111 S. W. 257, to be a vice principal, and not a fellow servant of a lineman injured by his negligence in failing promptly to repair a sagging wire that had been reported to him.

So, a foreman who has the management, superintendence, and control of a branch of an electric light company's work is not a fellow servant with the workmen under him, even while assisting in the manual work of removing lamps from poles, so that his negligence is that of the company. New Omaha Thomson-Houston Electric Light Co. v. Baldwin, 62 Neb. 180, 87 N. W. 27.

And a foreman who was given the entire charge and supervision of the work of taking down and removing a telephone pole, and who gave orders in every step in the process of taking it down, and which orders the employees were bound to obey, is the representative of the master, and is not a fellow servant of the employees under him. Sandquist v. Independent Teleph. Co. 38 Wash. 313, 80 Pac. 539.

Duties generally held to be nondelegable.

Certain primary duties of the master are generally held to be nondelegable, so that employees charged with the performance of vania where the distinction between an employee and a vice principal is pointed out. In the recent case of Hughes v. Leonard, 109 Pa. 123, 48 Atl. 862, it was claimed that a superintendent of a certain piece of work for the defendants was a vice principal, and that his knowledge of the defective rope, which broke and caused the accident for which the plaintiff sought to recover damages, was the knowledge of the plaintiff's employer. In delivering the opinion of the court, Justice Brown says: 'No matter by what title called by those under him, and though he may have power to employ and discharge them, and, in directing them in their work, hold in his hands plans and specifications, the man selected by his employer simply to direct a set of men in their performance of a special piece of work is their fellow workman; generally and properly known as their foreman. For the consequences of his incompetency his employer must respond to his coemployee; but the risk of his negligence is assumed by those who work with him. No incompetency of Sprague is charged, and his negligence, if he was negligent, was his own, and not that of his employers. He was not acting for them as their representative when the accident occurred. He was working for them. To have bound them by his negligence, his relation to them must have been that so clearly defined in Prevost v. Citizens' Ice & Refrigerating Co. 185 Pa. 617, 64 Am. St. Rep. 659, 40 Atl. 88: "A vice principal for whose negligence an employer will be such duties are to be considered vice principals, and not fellow servants of other employees injured by their negligence in the performance of such duties.

If the lineman is not himself charged with the duty of inspecting the poles before he climbs them, then the foreman charged with that duty is a representative of the master, and not a fellow servant of the lineman. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Bills, 62 C. C. A. 620, 128 Fed. 272; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Tracy, 52 C. C. A. 168, 114 Fed. 282.

In the Bills Case the court said: "If the telephone company, by not instructing the lineman to inspect, assumed the duty itself of seeing that the poles were safe to work on, this was a positive duty. The company could not escape the obligation by delegating the duty to the foreman or anyone else. If the duty of inspection rested upon the foreman, the foreman was not a fellow servant, but a vice principal, and the company is responsible for his neglect."

And the master cannot, by delegating to a servant the duty of inspecting long ladders furnished for the use of employees in stringing wires, and replacing rotten rounds, escape liability for injuries caused by neglect of the duty, on the ground that the neglect was that of a fellow servant of the one injured by a fall caused by the breaking of a rotten round. Twombly v. Consolidated Electric Light Co. 98 Me. 353, 64 L.R.A. 551, 57 Atl. 85.

But see Gibbons v. Brush Electric Illuminating Co. 36 App. Div. 140, 55 N. Y. Supp. 378, infra.

An inexperienced lineman is not the fellow servant of a foreman charged with the duty of instructing him. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Burgess, 47 C. C. A. 168, 108 Fed. 28, writ of certiorari denied in 181 U. S. 620, 45 L. ed. 1031, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 924; Sias v. Consolidated Lighting Co. 79 Vt. 224, 64 Atl. 1104.
30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A foreman directing and superintending the stringing of wires is a representative of the master, and the latter is liable for his sending an inexperienced lineman up a pole to encounter dangers from uninsulated wires of another company, of which the foreman had knowledge, but the lineman did not. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Likes, 225 Ill. 249, 80 N. E. 136.

It is the duty of an electric company to warn of the danger an employee who is hired to dig holes, repair poles, and to do other work on the ground, and who, to its knowledge, is unacquainted with the dangerous character of the work of a lineman, upon ordering him to ascend a pole and scrape a wire, and it cannot relieve itself from liability for injuries caused by non-compliance with such duty by delegating its performance to a foreman who is, in a general sense, a fellow servant of the person injured. Tedford v. Los Angeles Electric Co. 134 Cal. 76, 54 L.R.A. 85, 66 Pac. 76.

Where one of the questions at issue is whether the plaintiff was experienced or was inexperienced and required instructions, and the alleged negligence of the master consisted in his failure to instruct him or to cause him to be instructed by another employee with whom he was working, the defendant is entitled to an instruction upon the doctrine of fellow servants. Sias v. Consolidated Lighting Co. supra.

—duty of selecting fellow servants, appliances, etc.

The foreman of a gang of men engaged in the construction of a telegraph line is a representative of the master in hiring men, and his negligence in employing incompetent men is that of the company. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Coote (Tex. Civ. App.) 57 S. W. 912.

A foreman in charge of a gang of which the plaintiff, a lineman, is one, with power to hire and discharge the men, is not a fellow servant of the plaintiff. Vicars v. Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 52 La. Ann. 2153, 23 So. 367.

A foreman charged with the duty of se-liable to other employees must be either, first, one in whom the employer has placed the entire charge of the business, or of a distinct branch of it, giving him not merely authority to superintend certain work or certain workmen, but control of the business, and exercising no discretion or oversight of his own (New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Bell, 112 Pa. 400, 4 Atl. 50); or, secondly, one to whom he delegates a duty of his own which is a direct, personal, and absolute obligation, from which nothing but performance can relieve him (Lewis v. Seifert, 116 Pa. 628, 2 Am. St. Rep. 631, 11 Atl. 514; Ross v. Walker, 139 Pa. 42, 23 Am. St. Rep. 160, 21 Atl. 157, 159; Prescott v. Ball Engine Co. 176 Pa. 459, 53 Am. St. Rep. 683, 35 Atl. 224)."

lecting guy wires and of determining when they should be replaced is not a fellow servant of a lineman injured by the falling of a pole because of the defective guy wires. Sarno v. Atlantic Stevedoring Co. 66 App. Div. 611, 74 N. Y. Supp. 578.

A servant to whom the master intrusts the duty of furnishing safe poles for the other servants to work upon is not, in the matter of performing that duty, a fellow servant of the other workmen. Kelly v. Erie Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 34 Minn. 321, 25 N. W. 706.

Duty in respect to having current cut off.

In some cases, where the lineman has, in the performance of his duty, to work on wires carrying high and dangerous voltage, the duty of having the current cut off, so as to make the place of work safe, is held to be a mere detail, and the negligence of a foreman in regard thereto, the negligence of a fellow servant.

Thus, the foreman of a construction gang, although charged with the duty of turning off the current, is a fellow servant of one of the workmen injured by his negligence in regard thereto, where the turning off of the current was but one of the details of the work. Bridges v. Los Angeles P. R. Co. 156 Cal. 492, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 914, 105 Pac. 586.

So, a foreman has no authority to bind the master by an agreement to watch a switch box and keep it open, so as to render safe the place of work of a wire man, where, in the absence of such an agreement, there was no rule of law making the defendant liable. Guest v. Edison Illuminating Co. 150 Mich. 438, 114 N. W. 226.

A foreman in charge of a gang of men engaged in stringing wires is a fellow servant of a lineman in regard to shutting off the current in an electric wire in close proximity to where he is at work, where the lineman knew how to shut off the current, and had a right to do so. Anglin v. American Constr. & Trading Co. 109 App. Div. 237, 96 N. Y. Supp. 49, affirmed in 186 N. Y. 590, 79 N. E. 1100.

"Tested by this case, the chief engineer was a coemployee, and not a vice principal. He was not in entire charge of the defendant company's business, or a distinct branch of it that had anything to do with turning on or off the current into or from the wire which caused the accident. Nor does it appear that any other duty than running the engines had been delegated to him by the defendant. When he turned on the switch, he was meddling with something that was not part of his duties, as shown by the testimony; and if any accident resulted from such meddling, as did here, he was responsible for it to the injured party, but it did not bind the company. What the duties of the chief electrician, or consulting engineer, were, we are not told. It does not ap-

But in Hough v. Grants Pass New Water, Light, & P. Co. 41 Or. 531, 69 Pac. 655, it was held that the duty of notifying the servants in charge of the power house that linemen are at work upon the dead wires, and that the current is not to be turned on until further notice, cannot be delegated.

And a foreman who, in effect, tells a lineman that the current has been cut off, and directs him to go ahead and climb the pole, is, in so doing, in the performance of the master's duty, and is not a mere fellow servant of the lineman. Crist v. Wichita Gas, E. L. & P. Co. 72 Kan. 135, 83 Pac. 199.

Acts in respect to mere details of the work.

Where the question of vice principalship is determined with reference to the character of the act causing the injury, it is generally held that, if the act causing the injury is committed while the employee, however high his grade may be in other matters, is merely carrying out the details of the work, he is, in respect to that act, only a fellow servant, for whose negligence the master is not liable to other servants.

Thus, an employee of a telephone company is, in the act of jerking down a wire which had become lodged in a tree, a fellow servant of a lineman who was injured by being thrown from the tree against which the wire was lodged, although the first employee was the district manager, and placed by the defendant in entire charge of his plant, working force, and operations within that district, with power to employ and discharge subordinates, and at the time of the occurrence in question not only held a position of superiority to the plaintiff, but was actually exercising his authority by guiding and directing the plaintiff's movements at the moment of the accident. Knutter v. New York & N. J. Teleph. Co. 67 N. J. L. 646, 58 L.R.A. 808, 52 Atl. 565.

So, a foreman in charge of the construction and repair gang of a telephone company is, in climbing a pole and loosening wires, which caused other poles to fall, in-pear that he had charge of the lines or switch board, or any particular branch of the defendant company's business, or what duties were delegated to him by it. The burden was on the plaintiff to prove this fact, and having failed to do so, we cannot assume that he had such powers and duties delegated to him by the defendant as made him a vice principal.

"The cases of other states cited by counsel for the plaintiff to sustain the position that those at work in the power plant of an electric light company are not coemployees of the linemen do not do so. In Zentner v. Oshkosh Gaslight Co. 126 Wis. 196, 105 N. W. 911, it was the superintendent of the plant who turned on or failed to turn off the current. He was held to be a vice principal. It is stated in that case that, if he had been engaged as chief engineer and chief electrician, or consulting engineer, as here, in the common employment of ascertaining the trouble to the lines in order to repair them, he would have been a coemployee of the linemen. In Crist v. Wichita Gas, E. L. & P. Co. 72 Kan. 135, 83 Pac. 199, the person who turned on the current was the superintendent of the plant, who had previously told the linemen to go to work on the line, as the current had been turned off. The case also decides that a foreman is a fellow servant when laboring to acquiring the plaintiff, a member of his gang, a fellow servant of the plaintiff, for whose negligence the master is not liable. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Bower, 20 Ind. App. 32, 49 N. E. 182.

And a master is not liable for the negligence of a foreman in making a splice in a "messenger" wire along which a lineman has to propel himself in order to fasten hooks for the suspension of the telephone wires. Tweed v. Hudson River Teleph. Co. 130 App. Div. 231, 114 N. Y. Supp. 607.

So, a superintendent of a gang of men engaged in setting poles for the defendant company is not, in giving the order to the men to "let go" the pole as they had it raised to be placed on a "dinkey" carriage, performing a duty legally imposed upon the master, and consequently is only a fellow servant of the workmen under his charge. Morgridge v. Providence Teleph. Co. 20 R. I. 386, 78 Am. St. Rep. 879, 39 Atl. 328.

The foreman of a repair crew of an electric light company engaged in putting up new frames, hoods, and lamps on the poles is, even in the matter of inspecting a pole and directing a lineman to climb it, a fellow servant of the lineman. Gibbons v. Brush Electric Illuminating Co. 36 App. Div. 140, 55 N. Y. Supp. 378. And see Bridges v. Los Angeles P. R. Co. supra.

The foreman of an electric railway repair gang and the driver of the wagon from the top of which the plaintiff was at work repairing a wire are both fellow servants of the plaintiff, so that the company is not liable for their negligence in handling the wagon. Hayes v. Jersey City, H. & P. Street R. Co. 73 N. J. L. 639, 64 Atl. 119.

A workman has no cause of action at common law against the company because of the negligence of a foreman in setting him to work at stripping the lead covering from certain electric wire cables, with the assurance that the work could be done safely, or that the cables were "dead," and further ordering him to use a chisel instead of a hammer in doing the work, the foreman in so acting being only a fellow servant of the injured lineman. Grebenstein v. Stone & W. Engineering Corp. 205 Mass. 431, 91 N. E. 411.

Lineman as fellow servant of employee in control of the current.

SHANK v. EDISON ELECTRIC ILLUMINATING CO. presents the very important question whether the employee in control of the current is a fellow servant of a lineman. A few cases take the position that the duties of such an employee are of such a character that the master cannot delegate them.

One of the leading cases upholding this view is Massy v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. (Wis.) — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 126 N. W. 544, in which it was held that an operator charged with the duty of connecting and disconnecting an electrical current from wires is not a fellow servant of a lineman whose duty is to work on the wires, so as to relieve the master from liability for injury to the latter by the negligence of the operator in turning the current on a wire upon which he was at work.

In distinguishing employees controlling the current, and other classes of employees, the court said: "Reasons which may have led to classing as fellow servants men employed in conduct of railroads may fail to control situations in this field, though apparently closely analogous. One distinction is in the sudden and unavoidable nature of the peril from a failure to take the proper and easy precautions, as in this case. A man at one moment is handling a cold and harmless wire which it is the duty of his master to keep so. The next, he is in contact with a deadly peril, unforeseeable and unescapable, by reason of the act of another whom his master has employed to perform the duty resting on the latter to make and keep safe the place of work. We think reasons to hold that the persons so employed are agents performing a nondelegable duty are very apparent." After reviewing other Wisconsin decisions involving the same question, the court lays down the following rule: "We hold, therefore, that a distinct and independent employee to whom is dele-comply with a common object or purpose of the labor. In New Omaha Thomson-Houston Electric Light Co. v. Baldwin, 62 Neb. 180, 87 N. W. 27, the superintendent was held to be a vice principal.

"It is a question, also, whether, even though the person who turned the current into the wire on which plaintiff was working, and which caused the accident, was a vice principal, the plaintiff did not assume the risk of his employment, and would, on this account, be unable to recover. We will not discuss this, however, as we are firmly convinced that the person who turned on the current was a coemployee of the plaintiff, and that the defendant company is not liable, but that the plaintiff must look to his coemployee, if the coemployee did what he should not have done, and thereby caused the injury.

"We therefore discharge the rule to show cause why judgment of nonsuit should not be stricken off."

Mr. B. F. Davis, for appellant:

The melting of a fuse at the power house of an electric light and power company is notice to the company that either a wire has been broken and grounded, or that a short circuit has been caused by the crossing of wires; and it is sufficient to put the company upon inquiry, and impose upon it the duty of refraining from sending a gated the duty to disconnect and make safe the wires on which others must work is ordinarily a vice principal, and not a fellow servant with the lineman and other like workmen."

And the superintendent of a company is not a fellow servant of the lineman, either in turning on the current in the regular operation of the plant, or in negligently failing to turn off the current temporarily while the line was being repaired. Zentner v. Oshkosh Gaslight Co. 126 Wis. 196, 105 N. W. 911.

In Smith v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 127 Wis. 253, 106 N. W. 829, it was apparently conceded that the defendant's superintendent was, so far as turning on or off the current was concerned, a vice principal.

Some of the earlier Wisconsin cases are not entirely in harmony with the rule as laid down in the Massy Case.

Thus, a superintendent of an electric light company is, in making repairs upon a dynamo, a fellow servant of the lineman who was injured by the turning on of the current to test the repaired motor. Williams v. North Wisconsin Lumber Co. 124 Wis. 328, 102 N. W. 589.

So, the turning on and off of the electric light in a mill, as the exigencies of the business may require under the varying conditions of the natural light, does not pertain to the personal duty of the master to furnish a safe place to work, but is mere operative detail, the performance of which may be delegated to a servant. Miller v. Centralia Pulp & Water Power Co. 134 Wis. 316, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 742, 113 N. W. 954.

The decision in the Williams Case is distinguished in the Zentner Case upon the ground that, in repairing the dynamo, the superintendent was merely attending to the details of the work; but, in the Massy Case, the court says there is no very clear distinction in principle between the Miller and Williams Cases, on the one hand, and the Zentner and Smith Cases, on the other, and apparently it was in view of the conflict in the ultimate decisions in those cases that the court in the Massy

Case laid down the clear and explicit rule given above.

An electrician clothed with and exercising authority as to the shutting down and repair of motors is not a fellow servant of a helper who was ordered by him to stop a defective motor, and assured that he would see that no one would start the motor or interfere with it until he had fixed it. Marquette Cement Mfg. Co. v. Williams, 230 Ill. 26, 82 N. E. 424.

Where a laborer was injured by striking the third rail of an elevated electric railway while it was alive, with a steel or iron tool, it was held in Keeley v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 192 Mass. 481, 78 N. E. 490, that the master would be liable for the injury if the current had been negligently turned on by one to whom the master had intrusted the control thereof; but it is apparently assumed that the foreman in charge of the gang, who directed the plaintiff to strike the rail with the chisel, was a mere fellow servant of the plaintiff, and if he had known that the current was on, the order would have been negligent, but the company would not have been liable therefor.

But the engineer of an electric light company and its linemen, being subject to direction and control by the same general master, in the same common enterprise, were held in Brush Electric Light & P. Co. v. Wells, 110 Ga. 192, 35 S. E. 365, to be fellow servants, though employed in different departments, and so far removed from each other that one could in no degree control or influence the conduct of the other; and granting that the lineman was killed by reason of the negligence of the engineer in failing to give a signal before the electric current was turned on, the defendant company is not liable for his death.

In Malay v. Mt. Morris Electric Light Co. 41 App. Div. 574, 58 N. Y. Supp. 659, it was apparently assumed that an employee in charge of the dynamos in a power house was a fellow servant of a lineman injured by the foreman's negligence, as the case turns principally upon the question of the company's knowledge of his incompetency.

Stewart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was a lineman in the employ of the defendant company. An interruption having occurred in the circuit, he ascertained by using the switch board at the power plant where the trouble was on the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

line. Before proceeding to make the necessary repair, in the presence of his foreman, the company's electrician, and the engineer in charge of the engine, he turned off the current, and told those present not to turn it on until he was heard from. He then started, in company with his foreman, to the place of interruption. Within a half an hour after he left, the electrician and the engineer went to the switch board and tested the circuit. No break being disclosed by the test, the engineer turned on the current, with the result that the plaintiff, then engaged with the wires in repairing the break, received the charge and was severely injured. Manifestly, the plaintiff was injured through negligence not his own. Was it the company's negligence or the negligence of a fellow employee? In the general business in which defendant is engaged, furnishing electric light and power, the interruption of the circuit from one cause and another is a matter of such frequent occurrence that it is necessary to keep steadily employed trained men whose business it is to make repairs in the line and maintain it in working condition. It is alike necessary to employ others of technical skill to co-operate in this general work. The whole business of repairing the line, whether regard be had to the actual work on the line, or the care of the circuit while men are so engaged, must necessarily be done by employees engaged in the general business, under the direction of the employer. It would be wholly impracticable for an employer to personally attend to such detail, and therefore it is that such work may be properly, and commonly is, intrusted to employees. Where this is so, the duty of the employer extends no further than to employ competent and suitable fellow servants, and supply them with everything needed for the work. In all such cases the employee is presumed to have contemplated that work incidental to that which he engaged to do would be done by fellow employees, and he is held to have assumed all risk for their negligence in doing it. Here the whole dependence of the plaintiff was on the faithful and intelligent co-operation of the electrician and engineer, both of whom were admittedly competent. Both were in the employ of the company. Neither of them, however, exercised any supervisory power over the plaintiff or the work. They simply assisted in the accomplishment of a common object, and were strictly coemployees. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Bell, 112 Pa. 400, 4 Atl. 50; Hughes v. Leonard, 199 Pa. 123, 48 Atl. 862. What was done by them, or either of them, in the matter of the turning on of the current, could not be regarded as the act of the defendant company, except it be held to be an absolute nondelegable duty of the employer to keep constant watch upon the switch to prevent the current being turned on every time an employee attempts to repair a line. We know of no authority which enforces such obligation. The learned judge directed a nonsuit, which he afterwards refused to remove, on the ground that it nowhere appears in the evidence that either electrician or engineer had charge of the line or switch board, or any particular part of defendant's business, or what, if any, duty was delegated to either. The opinion filed in discharging the rule to take off the nonsuit amply vindicates the conclusion reached.

Judgment is affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM J. BEST and Wife, Respts.,
v.

JAMES W. OFFIELD and Wife, Appts.

(— Wash. —, 110 Pac. 17.)

Vendor and purchaser — misrepresentations of quantity — right to rescind.

The purchaser of real estate including an orchard of such irregular shape that it is difficult to ascertain its area without a survey, who is entirely unfamiliar with the fruit business, has a right to rely on the vendor's statements as to area, and may rescind the contract in case a represented area of 70 acres of orchard proves to be less than 49.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Walla Walla County in complainants' favor in an action brought to rescind, for alleged fraudulent misrepresentations, a contract for the sale of land, and to recover purchase money paid and expenses incurred. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cain & Hurspool, for appellants:

The parties were dealing at arm's length, and as the plaintiffs made an inspection for themselves, it cannot be said that they relied on the defendants' representation as to quantity of land, and therefore cannot rescind the contract.

Messrs. Skuse & Morrill, for respondents:

Where a contract is entered into and money is paid thereunder upon the representations that certain conditions exist, but which representations are untrue, but are relied upon, and the contract would not have been entered into and the money paid if it had been known to the party making the contract and paying the money that the conditions as represented were untrue, such party, if injured thereby, is entitled to a rescission of the contract and to recover the money so paid, and for any damages sustained therefrom.

Note. — Is fraudulent representation by vendor of extent or proportion of land of particular kind included within the tract sold, actionable where purchaser inspects the land.

In a note to Mabardy v. McHugh, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 487, the cases are gathered which consider the actionability of fraudulent representations as to area where the boundaries are correctly pointed out. On principle, the question is very similar to the one under consideration, as to the facts; the cases gathered in that note relate to false representations as to the area of the entire property, while in this note they relate to false representations as to the area of a portion of the property.

It is the general rule, subject to many exceptions, some of which will be hereafter considered, that a false representation, although fraudulently made, is not actionable unless relied on and acted upon by another, to his injury. Applying this general rule to the question under consideration, it may be said that ordinarily, where a person of judgment and experience personally inspects real estate before buying it, and is in no way prevented from forming an independent judgment as to the acreage of different portions thereof, and does form such a judgment, he will not thereafter be permitted to say that he relied upon the representations of the vendor as to the acreage, and recover his damages on the theory that such misrepresentation is actionable.

As said by the court in Farrar v. Churchill, 135 U. S. 609, 34 L. ed. 246, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 771: "Fraud is never presumed, and where it is alleged, the facts sustaining it must be clearly made out. The representation must be in regard to a material fact, must be false, and must be acted upon by the other party in ignorance of its falsity, and with a reasonable belief that it was true. It must be the very ground on which the transaction took place, although it is not necessary that it should have been the sole cause, if it were proximate, immediate, and material. Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by William J. Best and wife for the rescission, for fraudulent misrepresentation, of a contract of sale, whereby plaintiffs agreed to purchase, and the defendants, J. W. Offield and wife, agreed to sell, a certain orchard and land in Garfield county, Washington; the plaintiffs seeking to recover the amount of the purchase money already paid, together with expenses incurred in connection with the purchase, and expenditures made upon the land while they were in possession. The misrepresentations set up in the complaint and relied on at the trial were (1) misrepresentations as to the amount of land in the different varieties of fruit in the orchard as a whole, and the amount of land in cultivation outside of the orchard; (2) misrepresentations as to the quality of fruit grown in the orchard; (3) misrepresentations as to the whole number of acres of fruit embraced in the orchard; (4) misrepresentations as to the sufficiency of water for irrigation; and

(5) misrepresentations as to the amount and character of the personal property included in the transaction. The defendants answered, denying the making of the misrepresentations alleged, setting up the fact that the plaintiffs inspected the orchard, made outside inquiries, and relied on their own judgment in making the purchase; and asking for a forfeiture of the contract of sale, on the ground that plaintiffs had failed to make the second payment under the contract, and had abandoned the land, and for damages for negligence and carelessness in pruning the vineyard and orchard. The case was tried to a jury on questions of fact. Certain special interrogatories were submitted to the jury, which, with the answers thereto, were as follows: "(1) Did the defendants, James W. Offield and Nettie Offield, or either of them, at or before the making of the contract in question, make the plaintiffs, or either of them, any positive statements by which they, or either of them, materially misrepresented to the plaintiffs the true facts regarding the lands, premises, and property which was the subject of the contract in question? Answer: Yes. (2) How much expense did the plaintiffs incur in caring for and making improvements upon said land and premises, and in caring for and feeding the stock while in possession thereof? A. $416.70. (3) Were the plaintiffs, William J. Best and Emma L. Best, negligent in the care of said premises during the time they were in possession of self, and nothing is done to prevent his investigation from being as full as he chooses, he cannot say that he has relied on the vendor's representations." Applying this rule to the facts, it was held that misrepresentations as to the number of acres of cleared land and the number subject to overflow did not constitute fraud, where the purchaser personally inspected the land before buying it, at the request of the vendor's agent. It is to be noted that the representations complained of were that there were 1,060 acres of land under cultivation, and that there were 800 acres above overflow, according to the owner of the property, and 500 above overflow, according to the levee engineer. The acreage was so great that it could hardly be expected that, without a survey, a person could form an approximately accurate estimate thereof. The theory of the court, however, was that the purchaser was informed by the vendor's agent he was not sure as to the accuracy of the representations, and hence requested the vendee personally to examine the land before purchasing, and it did not appear that the representations as made were not made in good faith, and with a belief in their truth.

In Hall v. Thompson, 1 Smedes & M. 443, the rule of caveat emptor was held to apply to misrepresentations by a vendor of real estate as to the quality thereof and the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

number of acres of cleared land, where the purchaser personally inspected the land before buying it. Here the misrepresentations complained of were that there were but 50 or 60 acres of untillable land in a tract sold, whereas there were about 300. This misrepresentation was treated by the court as relating to a patent defect, discoverable upon ordinary inspection, thus apparently recognizing that the rule of caveat emptor would not apply had the representations related to a matter not discoverable upon ordinary inspection.

Where the purchaser of real estate is a man of judgment and experience with reference to farm lands, and personally inspects a plantation before purchasing it, he cannot thereafter claim that he relied upon the representations of the vendor as to the quantity of cleared land or the number of acres in an orchard; the rule applicable under such circumstances being that where the means of information are accessible or are availed of, and a personal examination is made by a purchaser of property before purchasing, equity will not permit him thereafter to say that he was induced to purchase on the statements and representations of the vendor, which related to matters discoverable upon ordinary inspection. Gridler v. Clopton, 27 Ark. 244.

And where a purchaser of a farm person-the same, and, if so, how much were defendants damaged thereby? A. None." The court adopted the findings of the jury, and found that James W. Offield made representations to the plaintiffs in regard to material facts concerning the lands and premises which are the subject of the agreement in question; to wit, among other things, in regard to the number of acres thereof growing to fruit and grapes, which were false; that such representations were known by defendants to be false when made, and were so made by said defendants to induce plaintiffs to enter into said agreement; that the plaintiffs, in acting on said representations, were ignorant of the falsity of the said representations, and reasonably believed them to be true; that the plaintiffs had expended $416.70 in the care of the farm; that they were not negligent in the care of said premises and property during the time they were in possession of the same; that the defendants did not suffer any damages therefrom; that plaintiffs were not familiar with fruit growing, or with fruit trees, or with the kind of property which was the subject of the agreement in question; that this was known to the defendants during the time the negotiations were pending, and that as soon as plaintiffs ascertained that the representations made to them were false, they served notice upon the defendants of the rescission of the contract. Upon these findings, conclusions of law were found, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs for recovery of the money paid, for a rescission of the contract, for the sum of $416.70, with interest from and since the 1st day of March, 1909, and for costs. From this judgment this appeal is taken.

The testimony shows that the plaintiff William J. Best examined this farm in September; that at that time he stayed upon the farm about two days, in company with the defendant James W. Offield; that a great deal of the time it was raining hard, so that it was difficult to get around on the premises; that between that time and before the final execution of the contract, Emma L. Best visited the farm, her testimony being that she stayed there two days, and other testimony of the defendants being to the effect that she was there some days longer; that the contract was finally entered into in November, and that the parties plaintiff took possession of the farm about the 25th of November, and proceeded to go to work upon the orchard; that some time after taking possession, the plaintiffs began to suspect that misrepresentations had been made as to the number of acres embraced in the orchard, as to the quality of fruit trees, and as to the alleged representations that there was sufficient water to irrigate the premises; that in February, so strong had this conviction grown, that William J. Best, aided by an employee, undertook to survey the orchard by using a rude pole of some kind, and from such survey became satisfied that ally inspects it before buying, and questions the vendor's accuracy of statement as to the number of acres of cleared land thereon, and himself makes an estimate thereof, he cannot say that he relied and acted upon the representations of the vendor in reference thereto. Port v. Williams, 6 Ind. 219.

So, where parties are dealing at arm's length, and the means of knowledge are as open to one as to the other, one of them, purchasing a farm from the other, and personally inspecting it before buying, cannot thereafter complain that the number of acres under cultivation and tillable were misrepresented to him. Van Horn v. O'Connor, 42 Wash. 513, 85 Pac. 260.

But the doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply to misrepresentations by a vendor of land as to the amount thereof susceptible of irrigation, although the purchaser examined the land, where the fact that a portion thereof could not be irrigated could only be ascertained by an accurate survey, which was not made by the purchaser, and which the vendor had caused to be made. Under such circumstances it is for the jury to say whether the purchaser acted with that degree of prudence and circumspection which would mark the conduct of a reasonably prudent man under similar circumstances. Woody v. Benton Water Co. 54 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

It is a question for the jury whether a purchaser of real estate relied upon and was deceived by fraudulent representations as to the value of a farm, the amount of land under cultivation, the amount of orchard, and the net income therefrom, where he personally examined the farm before purchasing. Evans v. Duke, 140 Cal. 22, 73 Pac. 732. Representations as to area complained of in this case were that not less than 80 acres of land were under cultivation, 40 acres with fruit and 20 in hay.

False representations as to the number of acres of bottom land and the number in crops may be actionable if believed and relied upon, although the purchaser personally inspects the land. Thus, where he alleges that he was not competent to form an opinion as to the size of different parcels of the land, of which fact the vendor had knowledge, and of which he took advantage, it becomes a question for the jury whether the purchaser actually believed and relied upon the representations made to him, and it is error for the court, upon the admission by the purchaser that he personally inspected the land, to hold as a matter of law that the representations were not actionable. Speed v. Hollingsworth, 54 Kan. 436. 38 Pac. 496.

there was not the amount of land in orchard that had been represented, and gave notice to the defendants that he would rescind the contract; that subsequently to this, and prior to the trial of the action, a survey was made under the supervision of a competent surveyor, and it was ascertained and proven, we think, beyond a question, that the amount of land in controversy, instead of being 70 acres, was in reality 48.41 acres, which included the grapes and the orchard generally.

Without reviewing in detail this testimony, which we have particularly examined, we are satisfied that the special findings of the jury were justified, and that the findings made by the court were justified by the testimony; that, to say nothing of the representations concerning the quantity of water available for irrigation, and the quality of the trees, it was represented to the plaintiffs that there were 70 acres set out in orchard, and that they acted on this representation. This is positively sworn to by the plaintiffs and other witnesses who were present at the time the representations were made, and is in reality not denied by the defendant James W. Offield. But his contention is that he did not state as a positive fact that there were 70 acres, but that he believed there were; that he was solicited by the plaintiffs to guarantee to them that there were 70 acres, and refused to do so, but told them that there were 70 acres, or about 70 acres. This statement in relation to the guaranty is emphatically denied by the plaintiffs and by other witnesses who were present at the time of the conversation spoken of, and the jury evidently believed, and were justified, we think, in believing, that there was no such conversation had at that time, and that there was in effect a positive representation, upon which the parties plaintiff acted, that there were 70 acres cultivated to orchard.

In regard to the right of plaintiffs to act upon this representation there is quite a diversity of authority, and it is difficult to lay down a general rule, because there are particular circumstances controlling almost every individual case. Van Horn v. O'Connor, 42 Wash. 513, 85 Pac. 260, a case which is cited and relied upon strongly by the appellants, and which, in some of its circumstances, it must be said, is similar to the case at bar, was where O'Connor represented to Van Horn that there were 240 acres of land in cultivation in the half section which Van Horn was purchasing, that there were some 30 acres more which could be cultivated, and that there would be not over 50 or 60 acres of waste land. These statements proved to be not exactly correct, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) and it was shown that there was not as much land under cultivation as had been represented. The trial court found that Van Horn had no cause of action, and that judgment was affirmed by this court, the court saying: "It is clear from appellant F. M. Van Horn's evidence that he obtained all the land which was shown him, and some which was stated did not go with the half section purchased. But the important and controlling question in the case is whether, after examining the land, appellant may complain because there is not as much tillable land as was represented by the respondents. This court has frequently held that, where representations are made as a matter of opinion, there is no liability for misrepresentations, where the parties are dealing at arm's length, and the means of knowledge are as open to one party as to the other. . . . But where the representations made are of material facts within the knowledge of the vendor, and entirely without the knowledge of the vendee, and where the circumstances are such as reasonably call for a reliance thereon, the rule is that the vendee may rely upon the representations of the vendor." The court was of the opinion in that case that there was no confidential relation existing between Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Van Horn; that the representations made were expressions of opinion about facts which were as open and obvious to the appellants as to the respondents, and that appellants had an opportunity to obtain the facts about which representations were made, and for that reason dismissed the action.

Conceding here the correctness of the principles of law laid down in that case, we think this case falls within the second principle announced, viz., that the representations made were material facts within the knowledge of the vendor, and entirely without the knowledge of the vendee, and where the circumstances reasonably called for a reliance upon such representations. It makes no difference whether the representations made were known by the vendor, as found by the court in this instance, to be false, or not. The effect on the purchaser would be the same, and if he had a right, under all the circumstances, to rely upon them, and did rely and act upon them, he can recover. There is a difference between the right of a vendee to rely upon the representations of the vendor where the means of determining the truth of the representations are at hand and it is easily determined, as in the case just cited, and a case of this kind, where, as shown by the testimony, these plaintiffs were entirely unfamiliar with the fruit business, having come from a locality where orchards were not grown. They stated to the defendant at the time of the transaction that they knew nothing about the business, and when they were down examining the orchard, told him that they did not know a peach tree from a cherry tree, and in many instances he pointed out to them the difference in the trees.

This case falls more squarely within the rule of law announced in Woody v. Benton Water Co. 54 Wash. 124, 132 Am. St. Rep. 1102, 102 Pac. 1054. There the action was instituted to recover damages for false representations made by the defendants in the negotiations leading up to the contract of sale, both as to the quantity of land to be conveyed and the number of acres susceptible of irrigation from the water company's canal by gravity flow. The defendants represented that the tract to be conveyed by the water company contained 60 acres in all, and that the 60 acres were so situated in reference to the water company's canal that the entire tract could be irrigated therefrom by gravity flow. It eventuated that in fact the tract contained only 52.64 acres, and 28.24 acres of this were above the level of the canal, and could not be irrigated therefrom. It also appeared that the purchaser visited the land, accompanied by certain of the grantors, and viewed the premises in a general way. But it appeared that the portion of the land which could not be irrigated from the canal could only be ascertained by an accurate survey, as, we think, it appears in this case that the area of this orchard could only be obtained by an accurate survey. The court, in the trial of that case, upon the close of the plaintiff's testimony, granted a nonsuit to the defendant. In reversing the judgment of the court, it was said: "Nor can we agree with the court below that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to the representations made by the respondents, to the effect that the entire tract was under the level of the canal, and susceptible of irrigation therefrom. Strong language has been used by this and other courts in defining the duties of purchasers, from which it might be inferred that vendors have an unbridled license to lie and deceive, but such has never been the law, and the tendency of the more recent cases has been to restrict rather than extend the doctrine of caveat emptor,"—citing Strand v. Griffith, 38 C. C. A. 444, 97 Fed. 854, and Noyes v. Belding, 5 S. D. 603, 59 N. W. 1069, where it was said: "The unmistakable drift is towards the doctrine that the wrongdoer cannot shield himself from liability by asking the law to condemn the credulity of his victim." Also citing 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 120, 80 L.R.A. (N.S.)

where the rule is stated as follows: "By the overwhelming weight of authority, ordinary prudence and diligence do not require a person to test the truth of representations made to him by another as of his own knowledge, and with the intention that they shall be acted upon, if the facts are peculiarly within the other party's knowledge or means of knowledge, though they are not exclusively so, and though the party to whom the representations are made may have an opportunity of ascertaining the truth for himself." The opinion concludes: "All the cases agree that the purchaser may rely upon representations of the vendor where the property is at a distance, or where, for any other reason, the falsity of the representations is not readily ascertainable."

It appears that the orchard in this case was in an irregular or zigzag shape, and that it was a very difficult matter to determine its area. It is claimed that it was easily within the power of the plaintiffs to ascertain whether there were 70 acres in the orchard; but such ascertainment could have been made only by scientific survey. It plainly appears from the testimony that either the representations made by the defendants were false, and were known by them to be false when made, or else it was a matter difficult of ascertainment, for the defendants had owned and operated this farm for thirty years, setting out in different years different portions of this orchard, and if they, in this long period of operation, were not aware of this discrepancy, it is unreasonable to hold these plaintiffs, who were entirely new to the business, to a speedy determination of the area. It was not a slight discrepancy in representation. The planting and rearing of an orchard to a bearing age is a costly business, and the difference between 70 acres of land planted to fruit trees and 48.40 is almost a third difference in area. When it is admitted that the purchase price of this land was $35,000, and that practically all the value of the land was in the orchard, it is seen that the plaintiffs were deprived of nearly one third of the value of their purchase as they understood it. So that the only debatable question in this case is whether they acted with due diligence in ascertaining the falsity of the representations. An orchard of forty-odd acres of growing fruit, especially when it is in the irregular shape that this orchard was shown to be, is liable to mislead an inexperienced person concerning its area, and, under all the circumstances of this case, we think that there was no such laches on the part of the plaintiffs as would prevent them from bringing this action for rescission upon the grounds alleged.

The judgment will therefore be affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

MARY LUNT, Plff. in Err.,
v.
POST PRINTING & PUBLISHING COMPANY.

(— Colc. —, 110 Pac. 203.)

Negligence — safe condition of property — sounding fire alarm — invitation.

1. An owner of property upon which indications of fire are present does not, by turning in a fire alarm, extend an invitation

Note. — Liability of owner of property for injury to fireman or policeman in discharge of duty.

In the absence of statutory provisions, the cases involving the liability of a property owner for injury to a fireman or policeman on the premises in the discharge of his public duties turn upon the question as to the status of such officer. If he is held to be an invitee, the case is within the rule regarding the property owner's responsibility to invitees for the safe condition of the premises; but if a mere licensee, as most of the cases hold, unless the case is within some statutory provision, the general rule as to liability to licensees applies. For the rule as to the duty of an owner of premises to protect a licensee against hidden dangers, see note in 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 916.

Firemen.

The cases seem to hold unanimously that a member of a public fire department who enters a building in the exercise of his duties is a mere licensee under a commission to enter given by law, even though he is responding to an alarm turned in by the property owner himself; and, in the absence of any statutory provision, the owner or occupant of the building owes such fireman no duty to keep it in a reasonably safe condition. Many of the authorities are reviewed, and the reasons for this rule as to the status of a fireman in the discharge of his duty are fully set forth, in the opinion to LUNT v. POST PRINTING & PUB. CO.

In Gibson v. Leonard, 143 Ill. 182, 17 L.R.A. 588, 36 Am. St. Rep. 376, 32 N. E. 182, affirming 37 Ill. App. 344, a member of a fire insurance patrol, authorized by statute to enter buildings that are burning or in danger, to save property, who had responded to an alarm, and broken into a to the members of the fire department to enter the premises, within the rule regarding property owner's responsibility to invitees for the safe condition of the property.

Same — duty to warn of acid.

2. An owner of property owes no duty to firemen summoned to extinguish a fire which appears to have started upon it to warn them of the presence of quantities of acid in the room where the fire seems to be, the fumes from which may be dangerous to life.

Same — negligent breaking of acid container.

3. The negligent breaking by a property owner of a carboy of acid upon such property, which causes in the room where it is kept conditions indicating the presence of fire, is not such recklessness, wantonness, or willfulness with respect to firemen who are summoned to extinguish the supposed conflagration, as to render him liable for injury to them from the acid fumes.

Pleading — allegation of knowledge.

4. An allegation that a property owner building which was on fire, and was engaged in protecting property therein, and who was injured by the fall of a counterweight on a freight elevator, between the main floor and basement, because of a defect in the rope, and a failure to box or guard the weight, was held to be a mere naked licensee under a license given by law, to whom the owner of the building owed no duty in respect to the condition of such elevator. The court said: "The owner of land and of buildings assumes no duty to one who is on his premises by permission only, as a mere licensee, except that he will refrain from wilful or affirmative acts which are injurious."

Other cases to the same effect as to the status of firemen responding to an alarm, and sufficiently set out on that point in LUNT v. POST PRINTING & PUB. CO., are Woodruff v. Bowen, 136 Ind. 431, 22 L.R.A. 198, 34 N. E. 1113, and Beehler v. Daniels, 18 R. I. 563, 27 L.R.A. 512, 49 Am. St. Rep. 790, 29 Atl. 6, on second appeal, 19 R. I. 49, 31 Atl. 582,—the latter case holding that the owner of a building is not liable to members of a fire department for a failure to guard an elevator well, or for so packing merchandise as to conduct them to such well, when entering under a license conferred by law to extinguish a fire. And see also Hamilton v. Minneapolis Desk Mfg. Co. 78 Minn. 3, 79 Am. St. Rep. 350, 80 N. W. 693, set out in the opinion to LUNT v. POST PRINTING & PUB. CO.

had knowledge, either actual or implied, of a certain fact, amounts merely to an allegation that he had implied knowledge thereof.

Negligence — unsafe premises — fire — acid fumes — duty of owner.

5. One summoning the municipal fire department to extinguish a fire which appears to have started on his property is under no obligation to its members to acquaint himself with the character of the smoke issuing from a room, whether it is caused by fire or is the fumes of acid which he keeps there.

Nuisance — acid fumes — liability to firemen.

6. The keeping by a printer of a quantity of nitric acid in carboys upon his premises, for use in his business, is not such a nuisance as to render him liable for injuries to a fireman, summoned to extinguish a fire which seems to have started in the room where it is kept, through the breathing of the acid fumes.

(July 5, 1910.)

the court, after reviewing authorities, said: "The cases seem to establish that, in the absence of any statute or ordinance prescribing a duty towards firemen on the part of the owner of premises, the latter is not liable for anything short of a designed injury."

And to same effect is Eckes v. Stetler, 98 App. Div. 76, 90 N. Y. Supp. 473, where a city fireman in a building for the purpose of extinguishing a fire therein was injured by reason of an elevator shaft not having been properly guarded, and the hatchway thereof not properly closed.

And in Baker v. Otis Elevator Co. 78 App. Div. 513, 79 N. Y. Supp. 663, it was held that, in the absence of any statute requiring elevator wells in factories to be guarded, the owner of a factory in a city is not liable to a city fireman who, while fighting a fire in the factory in the early morning, while it was still dark, stepped into an unguarded elevator well, especially where it does not appear that the fireman entered the building by any way which it was reasonable for the owner to anticipate anyone would enter, nor that the dangerous condition was not created by other firemen, who had entered the building ahead of the plaintiff.

In Woods v. Miller, 30 App. Div. 232, 52 N. Y. Supp. 217, where a city fireman went upon the roof of a burning building in the discharge of his duty, and while groping his way in the dense smoke and darkness, stepped over the parapet of the party wall between the burning building and the adjoining premises, and fell into an opening constituting the back yard or air shaft of the adjoining premises, it was held that the owner of such adjoining premises was not liable for the fireman's injuries by reason of its failure to cover its entire lot with a roof, or to fence along the top of the party wall adjoining the vacant portion of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ERROR to the District Court for the City and County of Denver to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stephen W. Ryan and Richardson & Hawkins, for plaintiff in error:

The owner of premises owes a duty to a member of the fire department whom he invites onto said premises in the line of his duty, with respect to latent dangers existing in the said premises, known to such owner, and not to the person so invited.

Cameron v. Kenyon-Connell Commercial Co. 22 Mont. 312, 44 L.R.A. 508, 74 Am. St. Rep. 602, 56 Pac. 358.

As against a danger inimical to human life, the owner of property, with knowledge, owes to the guest, the licensee, and the trespasser alike, the duty of imparting informaits lot, to prevent anyone falling into such portion.

—violation of duty enjoined by a statute or ordinance.

In some of the above cases the property owner's violation of some statute has been alleged as an element of negligence for which he should be liable to a fireman injured as a result of such violation. Thus, in Gibson v. Leonard, supra, it appeared that there was an ordinance requiring elevators and other things "so located as to endanger the lives and limbs of those employed" in factories, etc., to be, so far as practicable, so covered or guarded as to insure against any injury to such employees. But it was held that such ordinance did not create any liability for noncompliance therewith in favor of a fire patrolman who was a mere licensee on the premises, as he was not within the class of persons for whose protection the ordinance was passed.

So, in Woodruff v. Bowen, supra, it was held that an ordinance requiring the owner of a dangerous or insecure wall or building to make it safe upon notice does not apply to a building which is safe for the purposes of commerce and trade, but falls by reason of the large quantities of water thrown into and upon it in extinguishing a fire, thus putting it to an extraordinary strain.

In Hamilton v. Minneapolis Desk Mfg. Co. supra, it was also held, as noted in the opinion in LUNT v. POST PRINTING & PUB. CO., that the statute there involved imposed no duty as to firemen.

And in Eckes v. Stetler, supra, it was held, in regard to the alleged breach of statutory obligations, that the fireman injured was not a party authorized by the express terms of the statute to sue thereunder.

A mere passive acquiescence on the part

Light Co. v. Anderson, supra, it was held that an ordinance requiring those owning and operating overhead wires in time of fire to send one or more linemen to the scene of the fire, who should report to the chief of the fire department or the city electrician, and disconnect and remove any dangerous wires, imposed no further duty as to such wires than merely to furnish such linemen, who then became subject to the control of the city authorities.

In Kelly v. Henry Muhs Co. 71 N. J. L. 358, 59 Atl. 23, where a city fireman sought compensation from the owner of a factory for injuries received by the former while in the performance of his duties, by falling through an unguarded elevator shaft in the latter's factory, and the liability of such owner was predicated solely upon a statute relating to factories, etc., and the safety, etc., of operatives, and requiring, among other things, that all hoistways and elevators in factories should be protected by trapdoors or guard rails, it was held that the statute was exclusively for the benefit of the class named, and that accordingly the fireman could not recover thereunder.

The case of Cameron v. Kenyon-Connell Commercial Co. 22 Mont. 312, 44 L.R.A. 508, 74 Am. St. Rep. 602, 56 Pac. 358, in which the plaintiff was allowed to recover, is sufficiently set out and distinguished, and the ground of such recovery shown, in the opinion in LUNT v. POST PRINTING & PUB. CO.

Policemen.

"There is no logical distinction between the rights of a fireman and a policeman on private premises in the performance of duty, and I am of opinion that they are both licensees by operation of law, but may not be said to be upon the premises by invitation of the owner, express or implied." Racine v. Morris, 136 App. Div. 467, 121 N. Y. Supp. 146.

"It is now well settled that where a police officer or fireman enters upon premises in order that he may better perform his duties as such, but without any express or implied invitation of the owner of the premises, he is a mere licensee, and such owner owes him no duty except to refrain from inflicting wilful or wanton injury upon him. The doctrine applies equally to cases where the license is given by law." Thrift v. Vandalia R. Co. 145 Ill. App. 414.

of the owner or occupant, in the use of real property by others, does not involve him in any liability to them for its unfitness for such use, unless the act is committed with notice of the fact that strangers are likely to approach, and without any effort to warn them of the danger, under circumstances which justify a belief that the owner was indifferent to the injuries which might happen to them.

So, a police officer who accompanies an express wagon, to protect it from strikers, to a building, and who, upon its backing up to the elevator opening, to receive its load, steps into the opening, either to get out of the way of those loading the goods, or to protect the employees of the express company in taking possession of them, is either a trespasser or a licensee, to whom the owner of the building owes no duty except to refrain from wilfully or wantonly injuring him; and such owner is not, therefore, liable for the officer's death by falling down the shaft, although the opening was unlighted and unguarded, and the elevator not at the opening. Casey v. Adams, 234 Ill. 350, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 776, 123 Am. St. Rep. 105, 84 N. E. 933, affirming 137 Ill. App. 404.

And in Creeden v. Boston & M. R. Co. 193 Mass. 280, 79 N. E. 344, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1121, a police officer who entered defendant's train merely for the purpose of looking for and arresting certain "criminals" who, as he was informed and believed, were escaping on said train, was held to be at most a mere licensee, to whom defendant owed no duty to keep his premises in a safe condition, and was liable only for reckless or wanton misconduct on the part of itself or its servants; and accordingly defendant in this case was held not liable for the death of such officer, due to its alleged negligence.

But in Learoyd v. Godfrey, 138 Mass. 315, where a policeman who had entered upon premises at the request of a tenant, to arrest a person, was injured in consequence of the defective condition of the approach, the owner of the premises, in possession of the part where the defect existed, was held liable on the ground that the officer was an invitee. The last case is distinguished as to the nature of the place where the injury occurred in Berry v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 188 Mass. 536, 74 N. E.

It is the duty of those who use hazardous agencies to control them carefully, to adopt every known safeguard, and to avail themselves, from time to time, of every approved invention to lessen their danger to others.

Frankford & B. Turnp. Co. v. Philadelphia

933, where it was held that a street railway company was not liable for injuries to a police officer, caused by his stepping through a hole in the platform of an old, discarded car, used merely as a shelter for conductors when off duty, where he was called by a conductor, acting outside the scope of his employment, and as a practical joke, to arrest "two crooks."

Where a police officer who was in the habit of visiting a railroad station at the time of the arrival and departure of trains was negligently struck and injured by one of defendant's trucks while at such station, it was held in Ingalls v. Adams Exp. Co. 44 Minn. 128, 46 N. W. 325, that the defendant was bound to use reasonable care in the exercise of its business so as not to injure persons lawfully on the premises, and that plaintiff's evidence of defendant's negligence should have been submitted to the jury.

This holding, however, similarly to that of Learoyd v. Godfrey, supra, seems to be based upon the public nature of the premises and defendant's negligent breach of a duty to the public to exercise due care, and would apply to any other person as well as to a police officer.

So, in Bradburn v. Whatcom County R. & Light Co. 45 Wash. 582, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 526, 88 Pac. 1020, the defendant was held liable for injuries to a policeman riding on one of its cars on strictly city business, free of charge, in accordance with a municipal ordinance, but this holding was on the ground that plaintiff was a passenger, and would apply to any other passenger as well as to a policeman.

—violation of duty enjoined by statute or ordinance.

Most of the cases of injuries to policemen, however, involve statutory provisions. Thus, in Ryan v. Thompson, 6 Jones & S. 133, where a policeman on duty, seeing a window in defendant's store open at night, and suspecting something wrong, entered and was injured by falling through an open hoistway, the court said: "The city ordinance providing for railings around hoistways, and for their being closed on the completion of the business of each day, would seem to be a wise precaution in favor of policemen, firemen, and others who are often obliged to enter at night stores and warehouses, with which they are not familiar, to arrest burglars, extinguish fires, or for other lawful occasions, and the omission by the owner or occupant of a building to use the precaution indicated in the ordinance would reasonably subject him to an action for damages in favor of one lawfully on the premises, who should sustain injury through such omission. A breach of the ordinance under such circumstances would be negligence." But in that case the officer failed to recover, as the evidence did not establish that the defendant violated the ordinance in question.

E. 523.

Messrs. Waldron & Thompson and John T. Bottom, for defendant in error:

An allegation of knowledge, either actual or implied, of the deadly nature of the fumes and vapors, amounts in law merely to a charge that the defendant ought to have known, and not that it did in fact know, what the noxious properties of such fumes and vapors were.

Racine v. Morris, supra, while holding that an action would not lie at common law to recover for the death of a police officer who, on discovering the door of a building ajar at night, entered, in the performance of his duty, and fell down an unguarded elevator shaft, further held that a statute providing, among other things, that the guards and trapdoors of freight elevators shall be closed at the close of business each day, "was intended for the protection of policemen, firemen, and others lawfully on the premises," and that while no recovery could be had on account of the mere violation of the statute, such violation was prima facie evidence of negligence, which, while not conclusive, was sufficient to take the case to the jury, and to sustain a recovery upon the theory of negligence.

And the case of Parker v. Barnard, 135 Mass. 116, 46 Am. Rep. 450, cited in Racine v. Morris, supra, conceding that a police officer who, in the performance of his duty, enters a building the doors of which are found open at night, is a mere licensee, held that a general statute providing that the openings of any hoistway, elevator, or well hole in any building in a certain city

The deceased was a mere licensee upon defendant's premises, and as it does not appear that the defendant had any notice or knowledge that the members of the fire department then present were not cognizant, by the use of their senses of the nature of the conditions then existing, and the dangers incident thereto, he was under no active duty to such members of the fire department to impart any warning in their behalf.

Musser, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action there was a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant. The demurrer was sustained. The plaintiff elected to stand upon the complaint, whereupon the complaint was dismissed, and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant for costs. From this judgment the plaintiff brought the action here on error, assigning as error the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, dismissing the same, and rendering the judgment in favor of the defendant.

The complaint first alleges the corporate capacity of the defendant; that Frank P. Lunt was the husband of the plaintiff, and a member of the fire department of the city and county of Denver, and acting in that capacity on the 20th day of September, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1904; that the defendant was occupying a portion of the building, particularly a room in the second story thereof, known as an etching room, near the corner of Sixteenth and Curtis streets, in the city of Denver. The complaint then proceeds as follows:

"Fourth. That at or about 3:30 o'clock in the afternoon of said day, the defendant company caused an alarm of fire to be turned in from the fire box at the corner of Sixteenth and Curtis streets, and thereby invited the fire department of the city and county of Denver, and its members, including the said Frank P. Lunt, to come to, upon, and in the premises so occupied by the said defendant, as aforesaid, as an etching room, for the supposed purpose of putting out the fire therein.

"Fifth. That in pursuance to said invitation, and in obedience to and in conformity with his duties as a member of the fire department of said city and county of Denver, said Frank P. Lunt did forthwith proceed to said etching room, at the place aforesaid, so occupied as aforesaid, from which said room large volumes of supposed smoke were issuing.

"Sixth. That there was no fire upon or in said premises, but the said supposed smoke was caused by the liberation of a large amount of nitric acid, then and there kept in the said etching room by the defendant company.

"Seventh. That the said Frank P. Lunt, supposing and believing that a fire existed in the said etching room, did enter the same in his capacity as a member of the fire department, and did seek for and attempt to put out the supposed fire therein contained, without any knowledge on his part of any dangers of any kind or character, other than those which were usually incident to his calling as a fireman in places where fire would be actually raging.

"Eighth. That while he was so engaged as aforesaid, he did breathe the said supposed smoke, so described as aforesaid, as it was necessary for him to do, in order to remain in the said room and assist in putting out the supposed fire therein contained.

"Ninth. That by reason of the said breathing, his eyes, mouth, throat, lungs, and stomach were filled with the said supposed smoke, repeatedly.

"Tenth. That the said supposed smoke was not in reality smoke at all, but consisted of fumes and vapors from the said nitric acid, so liberated as aforesaid, in the said etching room, all of which fumes and vapors were a deadly poison, inimical to human health and life, and disastrous in the highest degree to the mucous membranes and lung tissues of the human body; of all of which the said Frank P. Lunt was wholly and absolutely ignorant at the time mentioned."

The complaint then proceeds and alleges that, within an hour after the said Lunt entered the said room, he was seized with a deadly nausea and paroxysms of vomiting, and within twenty-four hours he became afflicted with a violent case of traumatic pneumonia, and continued ill until the 12th day of October, when he died, and that his death was caused by the injuries which he had received from breathing the fumes. The complaint then further proceeds as follows:

"Fourteenth. That the said injuries were brought about solely by reason of the negligence of the defendant company, and without fault or negligence upon the part of the said Frank P. Lunt, and the said negligence consisted in each and every of the following particulars, to wit: (a) The defendant company negligently invited the said Frank P. Lunt onto its premises, by sending in, or causing to be sent in, a general alarm of fire, when in truth and in fact there was no fire in or upon the said premises. (b) The defendant company kept and maintained a large carboy of nitric acid, containing several gallons, in the said room, well knowing that the same was exceedingly dangerous, and further knowing that if anything should cause the carboy to become cracked, which contained said nitric acid, that the said nitric acid would then escape, no matter how slight the crack might be in the first instance. (c) In negligently and improperly so opening or attempting to open the said carboy of nitric acid that the same would be liable at any time to become, and the same did become, cracked, and the acid therein contained thereby became liberated, to the danger of those who might be called upon to enter the said room. (d) In failing to give the said Frank P. Lunt any warning of any kind or character of the deadly nature of the said nitric acid when liberated. (e) In failing to warn the said Frank P. Lunt, or cause him to be warned, that the fumes and vapors of the said nitric acid, if breathed into the human body, would destroy the mucous membranes and tissues, and result in the sickness and probably the death of anyone who breathed any considerable quantity of such fumes and vapors, with full knowledge upon the part of the said company, either actual or implied, of the deadly nature of such fumes and vapors."

The complaint then concludes with the allegation that the plaintiff is the widow of said Frank P. Lunt, and that by reason of the said negligence of the defendant, plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $5,000, and prays judgment for that amount.

It appears from the complaint, nothing being alleged to the contrary, and the statutes of the state requiring that the name of a corporation shall indicate its business, that the defendant was engaged in the printing and publishing business. It is alleged that the room in which the deceased was injured was known as an etching room and occupied by the defendant. It is nowhere alleged in the complaint, directly or by implication, that the nitric acid was unlawfully, wrongfully, or unnecessarily in that room. It is alleged that there were several gallons of the acid in the carboy. The word "several" means "more than two, but not very many." Webster's International Dictionary. From this it appears that there were at least 3 gallons, and, in any event, not very many. It is not alleged that there was an unreasonable quantity of the acid, and, without such an allegation, that fact cannot be presumed. Unless conditions that are not alleged in the complaint to have existed be presumed, the acid, for aught that appears in the complaint, was lawfully and rightfully present in the carboy in a reasonable quantity and in proper form for legitimate use by the defendant in the etching department of its business of printing and publishing, and that it was not inherently dangerous to the public, nor to occupants of adjacent premises. These observations at once remove the question of actionable nuisance from the field of discussion, and the action appears, as is directly alleged, to be an action based solely on negligence.

It is apparent from the complaint that an endeavor is therein made to state a cause of action that would be within the rule announced in many authorities, and which is well stated in Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 102 U. S. 577-580, 26 L. ed. 235, 236, as follows: "The owner or occupant of land who, by invitation, express or implied, induces or leads others to come upon his premises, for any lawful purpose, is liable in damages to such persons—they using due care—for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition of the land or its approaches, if such condition was known to him and not to them, and was negligently suffered to exist, without timely notice to the public, or to those who were likely to act upon such invitation."

While various other rules of law are referred to in plaintiff's brief, and attempts made to apply them to this complaint, it is apparent from the complaint that the position of plaintiff may be stated briefly to be: That the defendant, by turning in an alarm of fire, thereby extended an invitation to the deceased, and by such invitation induced, or led, or lured the deceased to come upon the premises, to wit, the etching room, for a lawful purpose, to wit, to put out the supposed fire, and that the defendant is liable in damages for the injury inflicted by the unsafe condition of the premises, to wit, the presence thereon of the poisonous fumes, which condition was known, or ought to have been known, to the defendant, and was not known to the deceased, and was negligently suffered to exist without timely notice to the deceased, who acted upon such invitation. It must be admitted that if the complaint brings the cause of action sought to be alleged within the rule announced above, then the complaint is good; and it must be confessed that from a mere cursory reading of the complaint, one is inclined to believe that the alleged cause of action falls within the rule. However, from an analysis of the rule and the allegations of the complaint, in the light of the authorities, it appears that the complaint does not state a cause of action within the rule. It will be noticed that the rule itself, as announced in the case of Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. supra, and in other cases cited by plaintiff (Atlanta Cotton-Seed Oil Mills v. Coffey, 80 Ga. 145, 12 Am. St. Rep. 244, 4 S. E. 759; Beck v. Carter, 68 N. Y. 283, 23 Am. Rep. 175; Lowe v. Salt Lake City, 13 Utah, 91, 57 Am. St. Rep. 708, 44 Pac. 1050; Learoyd v. Godfrey, 138 Mass. 315; Beehler v. Daniels, 18 R. I. 563, 27 L.R.A. 512, 49 Am. St. Rep. 790, 29 Atl. 6; Hart v. Cole, 156 Mass. 475, 16 L.R.A. 557, 31 N. E. 644), bases the question of recovery primarily upon the fact that an invitation, express or implied, was given to the injured party, by which invitation he was induced, or led, or lured, or enticed by the defendant upon the premises where the injury occurred.

Was the deceased induced, or led, or lured, or enticed into that etching room by any invitation, express or implied, of the defendant? In the fourth paragraph of the complaint it is alleged that the defendant caused an alarm of fire to be turned in from a fire box, and thereby invited the fire department, including the deceased, to come into the etching room, for the purpose of putting out the supposed fire therein. In subdivision "a" of the fourteenth paragraph, it is alleged that the defendant negligently invited the deceased onto its premises by sending in, or causing to be sent in, a general alarm of fire. While the pleader uses the word "invite" in the complaint, it is clear that this is but a conclusion of the pleader from the fact that the company turned in an alarm of fire. Schoepflin v. Coffey, 162 N. Y. 12, at page 16, 56 N. E. 502. So that whether or not the deceased was upon the premises by invitation of the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) defendant depends not upon any direct allegation of the complaint, but upon whether or not the turning in of a general fire alarm, or of any fire alarm, by the owner of premises, when indications of fire are present, constitutes an invitation for the fire department to come upon the premises and be there in the status of invited persons within the rule announced. What is the status of a fireman on premises in the discharge of his duty?

In 2 Cooley on Torts, 3d ed. p. 648, the learned writer says: "The third class of licenses comprehends those cases in which the law gives permission to enter a man's premises. This permission has no necessary connection with the owner's interest, and is always given on public grounds. An instance is where a fire breaks out in a city. Here the public authorities, and even private individuals, may enter upon adjacent premises as they may find it necessary or convenient in their efforts to extinguish or to arrest the spread of the flames. The law of overruling necessity licenses this, and will not suffer the owner of a lot to stand at its borders and exclude those who would use his premises as vantage ground in staying the conflagration." On page 1268 it is said: "Firemen who enter a building in case of fire are licensees merely, and the owner or occupant is not liable for their injury by reason of any defects or unguarded pitfalls, or other dangers." That a fireman who enters on premises in the discharge of his duty is a licensee is also held in Gibson v. Leonard, 143 Ill. 182, 17 L.R.A. 588, 36 Am. St. Rep. 376, 32 N. E. 182; Woodruff v. Bowen, 136 Ind. 431, 22 L.R.A. 198, 34 N. E. 1113; Eckes v. Stetler, 98 App. Div. 76, 90 N. Y. Supp. 473; Beehler v. Daniels, supra; New Omaha Thomson-Houston Electric Light Co. v. Anderson, 73 Neb. 84, 102 N. W. 89; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 705.

If firemen are licensees, as these authorities say, then firemen are not invited persons, as the word "invited" is used in the rule announced in Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. In all instances the firemen respond to a notice, call, or alarm of some nature, either by or from the occupant of premises, his servants, or another. This alarm apprises the firemen of the existence and location of conditions indicating fire, and the law, when such conditions exist, creates their right and imposes upon them the public duty to enter upon the premises. The right to enter exists before the alarm is sounded, and indeed exists without an alarm if the conditions are present. The right thus created extends not only to the particular premises upon which the conditions exist, but to adjacent premises which, in the opinion of the firemen, it may be necessary to enter in order to facilitate the discharge of their duty. When the right to enter is dependent upon an invitation, it is the invitation, express or implied, that creates the right to enter, and without the invitation the right does not exist. Hence, as an alarm does not create the right to enter, and the right exists independent of the alarm, it cannot be an invitation. It is true the complaint alleges that the defendant turned in the alarm, or caused it to be turned in. In such a case, as in any other, the right of the firemen to enter when conditions indicating fire are present exists before the alarm. How, then, can the sounding of the alarm, in such a case, create the right to enter any more than though the alarm was given by a stranger to the premises?

When the alarm of fire is given, the department responds as readily when it is given by a stranger as by the occupant of the premises, and the powers and duties of the fire department are the same whoever may send in the alarm. Indeed, the occupant of the premises may object to the sending in of the alarm, yet it may be sent in over his objections. The occupant may stand at the boundary of his premises and forbid the entrance of firemen thereon, and he may attempt to keep the firemen therefrom, yet the firemen may brush him aside and with impunity enter the premises over his protests, in discharge of their duty. So that the occupant has no more to do with permitting the firemen to enter than any other of the public. The firemen are on the premises, not in discharge of any private duty due from them to the occupant, but of a public duty which they owe to the public. Indeed, it may be said that in populous cities the firemen are more concerned to keep a fire confined to the one premises, and prevent its spreading into a general conflagration, than they are in the preservation of the property of the occupant, although the latter also concerns them. The alarms are but a part of the general system of a fire department, designed to apprise the department of the existence and location of conditions indicating a fire. The general system of the department is one of service, to the public, and the turning in of the alarm is but a detail in this public service. The occupant of premises, observing a condition indicating fire therein, owes it to the public to turn in an alarm, and a stranger to the premises, observing a like condition, owes it to the public to turn in an alarm. In either event, the occupant or the stranger performs the same public service. Of course, the occupant, in addition to performing a public service, likewise performs a personal one; but this difference cannot make the right of the firemen to enter dependent on the will or act of the occupant, when that right already exists by force of law.

In the case of Baker v. Otis Elevator Co. 78 App. Div. 513, 79 N. Y. Supp. 663, it appears that an alarm was sent in from the special fire box of the defendant; but that fact did not change the relation of the firemen.

In the case of Woodruff v. Bowen, supra, the complaint alleged that the defendant, "as a resident of the city, and as a constituent part of this government, and as entitled to the protection of the fire department, invited the decedent and his comrades, in their capacity as firemen, into and onto the building." And with respect to this allegation the court said: "The pleader evidently intended, we think, to charge that there existed a general implied invitation from the citizens of the city, including the appellee, to the firemen belonging to the fire department, to enter their houses in case of a conflagration, for the purpose of extinguishing the fire." The court, notwithstanding the allegation of the complaint, held on demurrer that the fireman was on the premises as a licensee, and not by invitation.

The case of Beehler v. Daniels reached the supreme court a second time and is again reported in 19 R. I. 49, 31 Atl. 582. Speaking with regard to averments of an invitation in the complaint, the court said: "The fourth count seeks to state a case of legal liability by averring an invitation to the plaintiff to enter the premises in question; but, as it is an implied invitation, the declaration, accurately drawn, sets out the facts as stated above, from which the invitation is to be implied. The idea is that the plaintiff is in the employ of the taxpayers collectively, and so of the defendants individually; that the relation sustains the invitation; and that he is thus invited to enter the premises of his employers in the discharge of his duty. This presents the same question which we considered in our former opinion; the only difference being that now the invitation is averred which was then claimed to be implied from the facts, and there is also now added the fact that the defendants are taxpayers in Providence. The question, however, is the same, and the answer must be the same, that the facts do not amount to an invitation. There is no relation between a fireman and a taxpayer to raise it. There is no individual employment nor responsibility in respect to public officers or servants on the part of taxpayers, and so no basis for an implication of service and invitation. Of course, firemen have a right to enter premises to stop a fire; but it is under the same law which allows others to enter, called by Judge Cooley, "the law of overruling necessity."

The inevitable conclusion is that the turning in of the alarm by the defendant was not an invitation to enter the premises. The pleader seemingly endeavored to overcome this by alleging that the alarm was turned in "when in truth and in fact there was no fire in or upon the said premises." It will be noticed that nowhere in the complaint is it alleged that the defendant or its servants knew there was no fire in or upon the premises. The complaint alleges that large volumes of supposed smoke were issuing from the etching room, and that there was a supposed fire in the room. The word "smoke" in the complaint and in the opinion is used as it is ordinarily understood. The firemen supposed it was smoke, and it must be taken from the complaint, as nothing appears therein to the contrary, that the servants of the defendant, in good faith, also supposed it was smoke. If there were great volumes of supposed smoke present, the servants of defendant were certainly justified in believing with the old saying that, "where there is so much smoke, there must be some fire," even though that fire was occasioned by some unknown chemical action of the acid. If the supposed fire was occasioned by the acid, or something else, it called for investigation and action by the fire department, so that if fire was present, not only should the property of the defendant be saved, if possible, but, what was of more importance to the public, a general conflagration be prevented. Unless the contrary be assumed to have existed, it must be concluded that the servants of the defendant, in good faith, believed, and had the right to believe, that there was a fire, and in such a case they ought to turn in an alarm, or cause it to be turned in. It would not be a salutary rule to announce that a person, be he the occupant or a stranger, is bound, at his peril, to know that a fire in truth and in fact exists, when all indications point that way, before he turns in the alarm. In cities, especially, every equipment of a fire department is chosen, and every act thereof is done, to the end that every minute shall be utilized in order that the shortest possible time shall intervene between the breaking out of a fire and the arrival of the firemen. Ofttimes a few minutes will put a fire beyond easy control and convert it into a general conflagration. It is best, therefore, that a person be permitted to act quickly upon indications presented to him, and not lose what might be precious minutes in investigating, so as to be absolutely sure that a fire exists. Certainly when great volumes of supposed smoke issue out of a room, any person is justified in believing that a fire exists, whether occasioned by nitric acid or otherwise, and is justified in acting upon that belief, and in turning in an alarm of fire without losing more time in investigation. It is therefore concluded that the servants of the defendant in good faith believed that a fire existed in that etching room, and that under these circumstances they turned in an alarm of fire, as they ought to have done, and that the alarm so turned in was not an invitation in the sense of the rule announced in Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co., and that the deceased came upon the premises in the character of a licensee, under circumstances and conditions requiring his presence in the discharge of his duties.

In the case of Watson v. Manitou & P. P. R. Co. 41 Colo. 139, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 916, 92 Pac. 17, this court said that it was not the duty of a licensor to give a licensee notice of hidden dangers. No doubt the court in that case wished to limit the language used to cases where the failure to give such notice would not amount to wilfulness or wantonness, for the court quotes with apparent approval from § 1251, vol. 3, Elliott on Railroads, as follows: "We have endeavored to show in the preceding section that there is, ordinarily, no duty to a licensee except to refrain from wilful or wanton injury to him, and to use reasonable care to prevent injury to him after discovering his danger. If there is no duty to the plaintiff, or no violation of such duty, there is, of course, no liability."

While some of the authorities use stronger language in their expression of the rule than Mr. Elliott, the quotation from that author, for the purposes of this case, very well expresses the general conclusion of the authorities with regard to the duty which the owner of premises owes to a licensee thereon, and this rule is applied to firemen.

In the case of Hamilton v. Minneapolis Desk Mfg. Co. 78 Minn. 3, 79 Am. St. Rep. 350, 80 N. W. 693, the plaintiff was a member of the fire department at Minneapolis, and he entered a building in the discharge of his duty, in response to a call, and while engaged in extinguishing the fire, he fell through an unguarded elevator shaft, and was injured. The court said: "By the rules of the common law, a fireman going upon the premises of another, under the circumstances appearing in this record, could not recover damages for such an injury. However hard such a rule may seem, it appears to be settled that the owner or occupant of a building owed no duty to keep it in a reasonably safe condition for members of a public fire department who might the opinion of the firemen, it may be necessary to enter in order to facilitate the discharge of their duty. When the right to enter is dependent upon an invitation, it is the invitation, express or implied, that creates the right to enter, and without the invitation the right does not exist. Hence, as an alarm does not create the right to enter, and the right exists independent of the alarm, it cannot be an invitation. It is true the complaint alleges that the defendant turned in the alarm, or caused it to be turned in. In such a case, as in any other, the right of the firemen to enter when conditions indicating fire are present exists before the alarm. How, then, can the sounding of the alarm, in such a case, create the right to enter any more than though the alarm was given by a stranger to the premises?

When the alarm of fire is given, the department responds as readily when it is given by a stranger as by the occupant of the premises, and the powers and duties of the fire department are the same whoever may send in the alarm. Indeed, the occupant of the premises may object to the sending in of the alarm, yet it may be sent in over his objections. The occupant may stand at the boundary of his premises and forbid the entrance of firemen thereon, and he may attempt to keep the firemen therefrom, yet the firemen may brush him aside and with impunity enter the premises over his protests, in discharge of their duty. So that the occupant has no more to do with permitting the firemen to enter than any other of the public. The firemen are on the premises, not in discharge of any private duty due from them to the occupant, but of a public duty which they owe to the public. Indeed, it may be said that in populous cities the firemen are more concerned to keep a fire confined to the one premises, and prevent its spreading into a general conflagration, than they are in the preservation of the property of the occupant, although the latter also concerns them. performs a personal one; but this difference cannot make the right of the firemen to enter dependent on the will or act of the occupant, when that right already exists by force of law.

In the case of Baker v. Otis Elevator Co. 78 App. Div. 513, 79 N. Y. Supp. 663, it appears that an alarm was sent in from the special fire box of the defendant; but that fact did not change the relation of the firemen.

The court, notwithstanding the allegation of the complaint, held on demurrer that the fireman was on the premises as a licensee, and not by invitation.

The case of Beehler v. Daniels reached the supreme court a second time and is again reported in 19 R. I. 49, 31 Atl. 582. Speaking with regard to averments of an invitation in the complaint, the court said: "The fourth count seeks to state a case of legal liability by averring an invitation to the plaintiff to enter the premises in question; but, as it is an implied invitation, the declaration, accurately drawn, sets out the facts as stated above, from which the invitation is to be implied. The inevitable conclusion is that the turning in of the alarm by the defendant was not an invitation to enter the premises. It will be noticed that nowhere in the complaint is it alleged that the defendant or its servants knew there was no fire in or upon the premises. Louisville & N. R. Co.*, and that the deceased came upon the premises in the character of a licensee, under circumstances and conditions requiring his presence in the discharge of his duties.

In the case of Watson v. Manitou & P. P. R. Co. 41 Colo. 139, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 916, 92 Pac. 17, this court said that it was not the duty of a licenser to give a licensee notice of hidden dangers. No doubt the court in that case wished to limit the language used to cases where the failure to give such notice would not amount to wilfulness or wantonness, for the court quotes with apparent approval from § 1251, vol. 3, Elliott on Railroads, as follows: "We have endeavored to show in the preceding section that there is, ordinarily, no duty to a licensee except to refrain from wilful or wanton injury to him, and to use reasonable care to prevent injury to him after discovering his danger. If there is no duty to the plaintiff, or no violation of such duty, there is, of course, no liability."

While some of the authorities use stronger language in their expression of the rule than Mr. Elliott, the quotation from that author, for the purposes of this case, very well expresses the general conclusion of the authorities with regard to the duty which the owner of premises owes to a licensee thereon, and this rule is applied to firemen.

In the case of Hamilton v. Minneapolis Desk Mfg. Co. 78 Minn. 3, 79 Am. St. Rep. 350, 80 N. W. 693, the plaintiff was a member of the fire department at Minneapolis, and he entered a building in the discharge of his duty, in response to a call, and while engaged in extinguishing the fire, he fell through an unguarded elevator shaft, and was injured. The court said: "By the rules of the common law, a fireman going upon the premises of another, under the circumstances appearing in this record, could not recover damages for such an injury. However hard such a rule may seem, it appears to be settled that the owner or occupant of a building owed no duty to keep it in a reasonably safe condition for members of a public fire department who might in the exercise of their duties, have occasion to enter the building." In that case it also appears that there was a statute of Minnesota requiring that elevators be guarded; but the court held that it appeared from the act that it was intended to protect employees, and imposed no duty to firemen.

The cases cited above from Illinois, Indiana, New York, Rhode Island, and Nebraska, all of which deal with injuries sustained by firemen while in the discharge of their duties, are to the same effect. It is not necessary in this case to go to the length of some of these authorities, but they fully sustain the doctrine as announced by Judge Elliott in his work on railroads, and apply it to firemen.

In the case of Woodruff v. Bowen, supra, determined on demurrer to the complaint, it appeared that, on account of the weakness and insecurity of the walls and foundations of a building, the roof fell in during a fire, and precipitated the deceased and eleven other firemen into the basement, killing them. The defendant knew of the insecure and dangerous condition of the wall, while the firemen did not. There was also an ordinance of the city of Indianapolis declaring it to be unlawful for any person to construct or maintain any unsafe, insecure, and dangerous wall or building within the city limits. To illustrate how strongly some courts express their ideas of the law, in evolving an application of it to firemen, the following quotation is taken from that case, on page 441 of 136 Ind.: "In the case of Reardon v. Thompson, 149 Mass. 267, 21 N. E. 369, it was said: 'No doubt, a bare licensee has some rights. The landowner cannot shoot him.' He cannot lawfully set spring traps for him. The licensor is liable, even to a licensee, if he is guilty of what the civil law termed dolus. But beyond this the licensor owes the licensee no duty, certainly not the duty of active diligence to see that no harm comes to him, and when the latter, without any invitation, and pursuant to a mere license, enters the former's premises, he takes the risk of whatever dangers may be there. The law is so laid down in the text-books, and is established by a multitude of decisions." And on pages 442 and 443 of 136 Ind., the court said: "We are of the opinion that the owner of a building in a populous city does not owe it as a duty at common law, independent of any statute or ordinance, to keep such building safe for firemen or other officers who, in a contingency, may enter the same under a license conferred by law." The court further held that the ordinance did not apply to firemen in case of a fire, nor to the kind of a wall described in the complaint. The cracking of the car-boy containing the acid, if caused by the negligence of the defendant, happened before the firemen were on the premises, and such negligence was not a breach of a duty which the defendant owed to the firemen, and the act which occasioned the cracking of the carboy, even if it was negligence on the part of the defendant or its servants, cannot reasonably be characterized as reckless, wilful, or wanton.

The authorities, in announcing the rule of nonliability to firemen, do not consider the origin of the fire at all. They announce the law, regardless of whether the fire was started by the negligence of the occupant or not. Some fires originate without the intervention of human negligence. Nearly all fires originate through somebody's negligence, and as, in the nature of things, the occupant or his servants have more to do with the premises than anyone else, it is fair to conclude that the majority of fires are caused by the negligence in some way of the occupant or his servants; yet the authorities do not mention this element of negligence in considering the liability of the occupant for injury to a fireman.

It is alleged in subdivision "e" of the fourteenth paragraph of the complaint that the defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to warn the deceased of the direful effect of breathing the fumes and vapors of the nitric acid, "with full knowledge on the part of the said company (defendant), either actual or implied, of the deadly nature of such fumes and vapors." It has been seen that, under the allegations of the complaint, the servants of defendant, in good faith, believed that the vapor in the etching room was smoke, whether such smoke came from fire started by some unknown chemical action of nitric acid or otherwise. It is not alleged that the defendant or its servants knew that this vapor was the fumes and vapors of nitric acid, and not smoke. Does the allegation of the complaint, that the defendant had knowledge, either actual or implied, of the deadly nature of the fumes and vapors, charge the defendant with actual knowledge thereof? Strictly speaking, this is no allegation of knowledge, for it neither says that the one kind nor the other was possessed. This strictness, however, is not to be applied, under the Code. The language of the allegation indicates that in the mind of the pleader it was immaterial whether the defendant actually knew or not, and makes paramount the idea of duty to know, and therefore the law raises an implication of knowledge. The intent and sense, therefore, to be drawn from the allegation, is that the defendant ought to have known.

In O'Keefe v. National Folding Box &

Paper Co. 66 Conn. 38, 33 Atl. 587, the complaint alleged that the plaintiff was negligently put to work in placing colored paper, saturated with poison, into a box greatly heated with steam, and then taking it out again, when softened, for more easy folding; that he did not know the paper was poisoned; that the steam and heat of the box caused the poison to exhale and mingle with the steam, which poisoned steam the plaintiff was compelled to breathe, while at work; that the poison also worked into his body, through the pores of the skin; that the defendant failed to give plaintiff notice of the poisonous nature of the paper, or of the danger that might result to his health from such work. With respect to the knowledge of the defendant, it was alleged that "the defendant knew, or ought to have known, the effect and result the placing of colored paper into a box greatly heated by steam, and then taking it out again, would have, or might have, upon the person employed in such work, to wit, the plaintiff." With respect to this allegation, the court said: "The plaintiff alleges that the defendant knew, or ought to have known, the effect that steaming colored paper in a hot box would or might have on the health of those who conducted the process. This (construed, as it must be, most strongly against the pleader) amounts simply to a charge that the defendant ought to have known the effect the work might have on those engaged in it." Though its language so declares, the court, in fact, did not construe the pleading against the pleader, but gave to the allegation the only intent and meaning it could have.

In Durell v. Hartwell, 26 R. I. 125, 58 Atl. 448, the plaintiff, while engaged in decorating a building, was knocked from a staging, on which he was standing, by an elevator. The staging projected into the elevator well. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was ignorant that the staging projected into the well; but the defendants knew, or, by the exercise of due care, could have known, that it so projected, and that they, without warning to the plaintiff, so operated the elevator that it was driven against the staging. Referring to the allegation concerning knowledge, the court said: "The declaration states that the defendants 'knew, or, by the exercise of reasonable care, could have known, that a portion of the staging projected into the elevator well.' This is not an allegation that the defendants knew, but only that they might have known by the exercise of due care."

amounts simply to an allegation that the defendant had implied knowledge of such fact, and not actual knowledge. The pleader attempts to impose upon the defendant the duty of exercising due care to acquaint itself with the deadly nature of the fumes and vapors. Under the authorities cited, no such duty to firemen is imposed, and it is not even made to appear that defendant knew that the vapor was the fumes and vapors of nitric acid, and not smoke. It follows, therefore, that there is not presented for determination the question whether or not the failure to apprise the deceased of the deadly nature of the fumes and vapors, when that fact was actually known to the defendant, was such recklessness, wilfulness, wantonness, or lack of reasonable care to prevent injury to the deceased, who was on the premises, as to subject the defendant to liability for the injury. A failure to communicate such knowledge, when it was not actually possessed by the defendant or its servants, as appears from the complaint, is not such recklessness, wilfulness, wantonness, or lack of reasonable care to prevent injury to the deceased on the premises, as to render the defendant liable. No intimation is intended to be given as to what facts would indicate recklessness, wilfulness, or wantonness. The facts present do not indicate such.

It is alleged in subdivision "b" of the fourteenth paragraph that the defendants knew that the nitric acid was exceedingly dangerous; but in what particulars it was dangerous is not stated. That allegation is qualified as to the danger arising from breathing the fumes and vapors, and as to that danger the knowledge is not actual, but implied.

On behalf of the plaintiff, it is urged that the case of Cameron v. Kenyon-Connell Commercial Co. 22 Mont. 312, 44 L.R.A. 508, 74 Am. St. Rep. 602, 56 Pac. 358, announces the law applicable to this case. In that case the defendant company kept in its warehouse, within the corporate limits of the city of Butte, a large amount of Hercules powder; that there was a law of the state of Montana forbidding the storing of such powder within the corporate limits of a city in excess of 50 pounds. It was shown that an amount of powder greatly in excess of that permitted by statute was stored in the warehouse; that the warehouse took fire; that the firemen responded to an alarm, and while they were at the warehouse, actually engaged in endeavoring to put out the fire, the powder exploded, and many persons were killed, including the plaintiff's intestate, who was the chief of the fire department. The court, after stating the facts, and discussing the relation of directors to a corporation, says: "Now, bearing in mind that this case presents itself upon a motion for nonsuit, and that we must accordingly consider as true everything which the evidence tended to prove on the trial, we have before us a corporation guilty of a nuisance, by having kept in a frame warehouse within the limits of an incorporated city, in the vicinity of railroad depots and other buildings, an amount of Hercules powder in excess of the quantity—50 pounds—allowed to be stored therein by the laws of the state." And further on the court says: "The corporation, therefore, by maintaining this nuisance, became the subject of indictment for misdemeanor . . . as well as liable in civil action for injury to person or property caused by the nuisance. . . . These propositions are too plain for extended comment. They demonstrate a liability to this plaintiff—assuming always the evidence is uncontradicted."

No further comment is necessary to show that in that case the company was held liable because the injury was occasioned by a nuisance maintained contrary to the laws of the state of Montana. Under the circumstances present in that case, if it had been necessary, no quarrel could have been had with the court, if it had held that the company was guilty of maintaining a common-law nuisance, or that the company was guilty of such reckless, wilful, and wanton conduct as to render it liable to any person injured upon or off the premises, either as an invited person, a licensee, or a trespasser. There are no such conditions of nuisance or reckless, wilful, or wanton conduct present in the case at bar, nor any article whose dangerous qualities are so obvious and well understood as the explosiveness of Hercules powder.

The known ability of counsel for plaintiff warrants the assertion that the complaint, upon which it was elected to stand in this case, is as strongly drawn in favor of the plaintiff as the evidence at hand to prove its allegations would permit. Under the authorities, it does not state a cause of action. The rules announced may seem harsh; but they are founded in a public policy for populous districts to which the rights of individuals ought to bend. Fire departments are for the public. The service of its members is purely a public one. It must be so to assure the most effective work in fighting fire. In times of conflagration, or indications thereof, ordinary people lose their power of judgment and are not qualified to direct. Owners of property whereon are indications of fire will and should be, for the time, suspended from control, and the trained firemen, as the representatives of the public, be in absolute command, unhampered by the wishes or directions of any individual. Firemen must form their judgment quickly from appearances before them, and they must swiftly execute this judgment if the best result be reached. Their time ought not be spent in determining what duties they owe to this man or that man. Hence, generally speaking, the law is that, in the discharge of their public duties, they owe no duty to individuals. Their business is to put out fires in the best and quickest way. When they have done this, they have performed their duty to the public, to whom alone is any duty due from them. If it be held that duties are due the firemen other than as stated in the quotation from Mr. Elliott's work, this would call for reciprocal duties from the firemen, and thus their work would be hampered and their minds diverted by the consideration of their private duties. The help of a fireman is always needed in times of stress and excitement, when danger surrounds the fireman on every hand, when quick destruction of life and property is threatened, when the necessities of the case call for cool, quick judgment and swift, untrammelled action. It is better that the situation be not further confused by the consideration of reciprocal private duties. The life of the fireman is an heroic one. Daily, in the discharge of his duties, he performs acts of the truest heroism, which go down unheralded and unsung. He consecrates his life to his work, and, when it becomes necessary, unflinchingly offers up, as a sacrifice to the public, his own well-being, his life, and the future welfare of his wife and children. The public, to whom he owes this duty and for whom he performs it, owes to him the reciprocal duty of providing generously, in some proper way, by public taxation, for the care and comfort of the fireman and those dependent on him, when, in the discharge of his duties, he becomes disabled, and for the care and comfort of his wife and children when he gives up his life for the public.

From what has been said, it appears that the demurrer should have been sustained, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

HUGH F. DAVIS

v.

MARIE A. DAVIS, Plff. in Err.

(134 Ga. 804, 68 S. E. 594.)

Divorce — grounds — condoned acts — subsequent acts.

1. If a husband is guilty of cruel treatment toward his wife, or of adultery, and with full knowledge thereof she condones the offense and cohabits with him, and he is not guilty of any further misconduct, she cannot thereafter, at her mere will, desert him, and, if suit is brought against her for a divorce on the ground of wilful and continued desertion for three years before the filing of the suit, set up the condoned acts, and thereby prevent the granting of a divorce.

(a) If, after the condonation, the conduct of the husband is such as to revive the condoned acts and give her a right to assert them, she is not debarred from so doing; nor is she prevented from setting up misconduct on his part after the condonation, for the consideration of the jury in determining whether a divorce should be granted.

Same — alimony — to divorced wife — question for jury.

2. Under the statutes of this state (Civil Code 1895, § 2435), although a husband may obtain a divorce from his wife on the ground of wilful and continued desertion for more than three years before the filing of the suit, it is not an inflexible rule of law that the wife shall not be allowed alimony. On the other hand, it does not follow that the divorced wife would be entitled to alimony as of course, when her conduct has been grossly improper, and caused her husband to obtain a total divorce from her.

(a) Under the facts of the present case, the judge should have submitted to the jury the question of whether alimony should be allowed to the wife, if a divorce should be granted to the husband.

Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.

Note. — Right of wife against whom an absolute divorce is granted to permanent alimony.

The earlier cases on this question are discussed in a note to Ecker v. Ecker, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 421. Since the date of that note, but few cases on this question have come before the courts.

It will be observed from the earlier note that, under a statute directing a court, upon a decree of divorce being granted, to make such order touching alimony of the wife as, under the circumstances and nature of the case, shall be reasonable, it has been generally held that the court, if the circumstances in its opinion call for its allowance, has the power to grant the wife alimony, although the divorce was granted against her.

In Pryor v. Pryor, 88 Ark. 302, 129 Am. St. Rep. 102, 114 S. W. 700, where a statute provided that when a decree (of divorce) shall be entered, the court shall make such order touching the alimony of the wife and care of the children as, from the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the case, shall be reasonable, the court said that, whether dependent upon enlarged powers conferred by the statute or not, it is well settled that a court has the power to allow alimony to a wife against whom a divorce is granted on account of her misconduct.

Under a similar statute, a wife was granted permanent alimony in Vigil v. Vigil (Colo.) — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 111 Pac. 833, although the divorce was granted against her for desertion. It appeared in this case that the wife's desertion was caused by the husband's extreme and repeated acts of cruelty, and further, that the husband was able to pay, and that the wife was old, helpless, penniless, and almost blind.

So, in Pederson v. Pederson (Neb.) 128 N. W. 649, it was held that, under the Nebraska statute, sufficiently set out in the earlier note, the court, when the divorce is granted the husband, may allow the wife permanent alimony on any ground except where she is guilty of adultery. In this case the divorce was obtained on the ground of extreme cruelty, such cruelty consisting of repeated malicious accusations by the wife that the husband was guilty of incest. It appeared in this case that the husband had considerable property, and the wife, who was a dressmaker prior to the marriage, had but very little, and besides, on account of the marriage, her business had been broken up.

And where alimony is permitted to be granted the husband, under a statute providing that the court, on granting a divorce, may make such order in reference to the property as shall be right, he may be entitled thereto, although, so far as the record appears, at least, he was the guilty party, and the wife secured the decree of divorce. McDonald v. McDonald, 117 Iowa, 307, 90 N. W. 603.

The right of the wife to recover alimony upon a divorce being granted against her seems, in effect, at least, also to have been recognized in Cevene v. Cevene (Wis.) 127 N. W. 942, where the husband secured a divorce from his wife because of alleged cruel and inhuman treatment.

In Dailey v. Dailey, Wright (Ohio) 514, a wife against whom a divorce was granted for adultery was also granted alimony, it appearing that the property was earned by ERROR to the Superior Court for Chat-ham Count to review a judgment granting plaintiff a divorce. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Oliver & Oliver for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Robert L. Colding for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Hugh F. Davis brought suit against his wife, Marie A. Davis, for divorce on the ground of wilful and continued desertion for more than three years. She denied the allegation of the plaintiff, and, by way of cross libel, alleged that the plaintiff had deserted her, had cruelly treated her, and had been guilty of adultery. She prayed that a divorce be granted to her, and that she have a judgment for alimony. The jury found for the plaintiff a total divorce. In the second verdict they declared: "We fix the rights and disabilities of the parties as follows: That neither of the parties be at liberty to marry again." The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and she excepted.

1. "Condonation" has been defined to be the forgiveness, either express or implied, by a husband of his wife, or by a wife of her husband, for a breach of marital duty, with an implied condition that the offense shall not be repeated. Webster's Dictionary; Odom v. Odom, 36 Ga. 286. Voluntary condonation and cohabitation subsequently to the acts complained of, and with notice thereof, prevents the grant of a divorce on account of them. Civil Code 1895, § 2429. But if the implied condition be broken, the right to set up such wrongful acts is revived, and the innocent party is not prevented from obtaining a divorce. What character of misconduct will serve to revive the right to rely upon acts previously condoned, and whether it is necessary that such reviving acts shall be sufficient to furnish a ground for divorce, is not here involved. Ozmores v. Ozmores, 41 Ga. 46; 14 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 642. If, however, there is no breach of the condition after condonation and cohabitation, the forgiveness stands as complete and absolute. The condoning party cannot forgive the acts, and cohabit voluntarily with the forgiven one, and at the same time reserve the right to assert them as a means of obtaining a divorce, if there be no further misconduct, or as a screen to prevent a divorce being obtained on account of subsequent breaches of marital duty by such condoning party. To permit this would be to attach a different condition to condonation from that which the law attaches, and to make forgiveness such only in name. Condonation is not revocable at will.

It was argued that § 2429 of the Civil Code 1895, above cited, closes with the words: "And in all cases, the party sued may plead in defense the conduct of the party suing, and the jury may, on examination of the whole case, refuse a divorce." This statement follows certain provisions to the effect that "if the adultery, desertion, cruel treatment, or intoxication complained of shall have been occasioned by the collusion of the parties, and with the intention of causing a divorce, or if the party complaining was consenting thereto, or if both parties have been guilty of like conduct, or if there has been a voluntary condonation and cohabitation subsequent to the acts com-them jointly, and, as the court said, she must not be turned out to prostitution or starvation.

In Squire v. Squire [1905] P. 4, a woman against whom a divorce was granted for adultery was granted an allowance, the object being, as the court said, to protect her from temptation, and induce her to lead a respectable life. In this case, for the reason that the husband should not be compelled to support a woman who is immoral, and also for the woman's own protection, the allowance was made only while she should remain chaste and unmarried.

Similar cases, and holding to the same effect, are Edwards v. Edwards [1894] P. 33, and Bent v. Bent, 2 Swabey & T. 392.

Lander v. Lander [1891] P. 161, is a similar case, though the court, because it was not a question of large income, but of a bare allowance for the wife's support and maintenance, did not think it necessary to insert a dum sola et casta clause.

But where the wife is the recipient of an income sufficient for her support, in fact, much larger than the income that could be derived from the husband's property, and he, shortly before their separation, paid to her the entire amount of the income derived from her property during the existence of the marriage relation, it is not error to refuse her alimony in a suit for divorce granted the husband for her desertion. Wilkins v. Wilkins, 84 Neb. 206, 133 Am. St. Rep. 618, 120 N. W. 907.

So, where the husband in a cross complaint secures the divorce, and the findings show no equities whatever in favor of the wife, and it appears that by her marriage she designedly undertook to put herself in a legal position where she believed she could demand at the hands of the law a share of the husband's property, that there is no property requiring division, and that she is not in necessitous circumstances, it is error on the part of the trial court to allow her alimony. Van Gelder v. Van Gelder, (Wash.) 112 Pac. 86. G. V.

plained of, and with notice thereof, then no divorce shall be granted." The last clause of the section (quoted first above) was not intended to destroy entirely the effects of the condonation, so that a person, after condoning a ground for divorce, and cohabiting with the offender, could, at some later period, and with no further reason, desert the person so forgiven, persist in such desertion for the statutory period, and yet prevent a divorce by reason of the condoned acts. If there were a breach of the implied condition on the part of the person whose offense had been condoned, or if there were other acts or grounds authorizing the refusal of the divorce, this could be pleaded and proved for the consideration of the jury. The charge of the court on this subject was not erroneous.

2. The court charged the jury that, if they found a total divorce for the plaintiff, they would put their verdict in a certain form, "and, in that event, you would not allow the defendant alimony." This in effect instructed the jury, as a rule of law, that, if they should find a total divorce in favor of the husband against the wife, they would allow the latter no alimony. At common law (including in that term the canon or ecclesiastical law) the ecclesiastical courts did not grant total divorces except for such cause as rendered the marriage void ab initio. This was rather an adjudication that there had never been a binding marriage than a dissolution of one originally valid. Partial divorces were granted on account of adultery and cruel treatment. Prior to 1858, in England no judicial divorces dissolving the bonds of matrimony, if originally valid, were allowed. Parliament exercised that authority. In its origin, alimony was the method by which the spiritual courts enforced the duty of support owed by a husband to his wife during such time as they were legally separated. It was not an incident to declaring the marriage void ab initio, since, if there were no marriage, the duty of maintenance had not been undertaken. The question of awarding alimony upon the dissolution of a valid marriage for a postnuptial cause could not therefore have been decided in England prior to the time when the common law was adopted in this state. In regard to partial divorces, it has been declared that where the wife, by her fault, forfeited all claim upon her husband for necessities or other support, and he obtained a divorce from her on that ground, she could not, after this fact had been adjudged against her, have alimony from him. Thus, where a divorce was granted to a husband on account of the adultery of the wife, she was held to be entitled to no alimony. 3 Bl. Com. 94. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

As late as 1859, in White v. White, 6 Jur. N. S. 28, upon the granting of a petition for a judicial separation, presented by a man against his wife, on account of her violent and cruel conduct towards him, Cresswell, Judge Ordinary, held that the wife was entitled to no permanent alimony, saying that he found no precedent for granting it in such case. But in 1864, in Prichard v. Prichard, 10 L. T. N. S. 789, Wilde, Judge Ordinary, overruled the decision in the White Case and another similar case, saying: "I am aware of the cases to which you allude, but I think if there is no precedent, I ought to make one."

It has been decided by a number of courts that, in the absence of any statute, if a divorce be granted to a husband against the wife, she is not entitled to alimony. This at times worked a great hardship on the wife, especially under the common law, where the marital right of the husband attached to her property; and, while it was said to be strict justice, it was also said that it sometimes drove the wife to starvation or a life of shame. The English Parliament adopted a practice, when granting to a husband a total divorce, of requiring him to make some provision for his wife. In England, and in a number of the United States, statutes have been enacted which authorize the courts to grant alimony to wives against whom judgments of divorce are rendered, or to require some other provision to be made by the husbands, when the courts deem it best. In some of these statutes the provision is express; in others the terms are general; but the courts have construed them to have the effect above indicated. Where, under the statute, discretion is vested in the court, it is to be exercised with care. In such jurisdictions it has been said to be the exception, rather than the rule, that the wife shall cause the matrimonial tie to be sundered by reason of her own conduct, and still have alimony; but, on the other hand, that the wife may have collaborated with her husband in acquiring the property held by the latter, that she may have greatly aided in establishing his fortune, that her conduct may not have been justifiable, so as to prevent a divorce, and yet the conduct of the husband may not have been exemplary. She may have no property, and be broken in health. In other words, under such statutes, while the law does not hold out to a wife who deserts the matrimonial domicile the promise of a right to alimony, but rather discourages divorces coupled with pecuniary claims upon the part of the party at fault, yet there may be circumstances which may render it just and proper that some alimony should be allowed to the wife, although the divorce should be granted against her. In such instances the judge or the jury, as the case may be, in passing upon the question of alimony, should take into consideration the situation and circumstances of the parties, the property owned by them respectively, the conduct of each, and all the facts which would throw light on the proper exercise of the discretionary power. 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. §§ 861 et seq., and citations.

The question is: Where does Georgia take position on this subject? At first the legislature granted total divorces. The first general rule in regard to the matter which the writer has found laid down is contained in the Constitution of 1798 (art. 3, § 9), where it was declared: "Divorces shall not be granted by the legislature, until the parties shall have had a fair trial before the superior court, and a verdict shall have been obtained, authorizing a divorce upon legal principles. In such cases, two thirds of each branch of the legislature may pass acts of divorce accordingly." Marbury & C. Dig. 29. By the act of December 5, 1806 (Cobb's Dig. p. 224), it was declared that in all cases where the jury "shall determine in favor of a conditional divorce, they shall by their verdict or decree make provision, out of the property of which the husband may be possessed, for the separate maintenance and support of the wife and the issue of such marriage, which verdict or decree the said court shall cause to be carried into effect according to the rules of law, or according to the practice of chancery, as the nature of the case may require." By amendment to the Constitution, divorces were made final and conclusive upon the concurrent verdicts of two special juries, authorizing a divorce upon such legal principles "as the general assembly may by law prescribe." The last of these amendments doubtless resulted from the decision in Head v. Head, 2 Ga. 191. See also Cobb's Dig. 1123. By the act of February 22, 1850 (Cobb's Dig. p. 226), the grounds of divorce, both total and partial, were declared. These are now embodied in Civil Code 1895, §§ 2426 et seq. The Constitution of 1861 contained the following provision; "The superior court shall have exclusive jurisdiction in all cases of divorce, both total and partial; but no total divorce shall be granted except on the concurrent verdicts of two special juries. In each divorce case, the court shall regulate the rights and disabilities of the parties." Code 1863, § 4974. Thus the entire subject of granting divorces and alimony became fixed by constitutional provision in the superior court, and ceased to be a matter of legislative grant. By the act of 1806 (Cobb's 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Dig. p. 225), requirement had been made that the party applying for a divorce should file a schedule of the property owned by the parties respectively, and that, after all just debts had been paid, it should be subject to a division or equal distribution between the children of such parties, unless the jury should think proper to allow either party a part thereof. When the first Code was adopted, instead of providing for a division of the property, it was declared that "in all suits for divorce, the party applying shall render a schedule, on oath, of the property owned or possessed by the parties at the time of the application,—or at the time of the separation, if the parties have separated,—distinguishing the separate estate of the wife, if there be any, which shall be filed with the petition, or pending the suit, under the order of the court. The jury rendering the final verdict in the cause may provide permanent alimony for the wife, either from the corpus of the estate or otherwise, according to the condition of the husband and the source from which the property came into the coverture." Code 1863, § 1676. This language, "in all suits for divorce . . . the jury . . . may provide permanent alimony for the wife," has been preserved and again adopted in § 2435 of the Civil Code of 1895, although the husband's marital right no longer attaches to the wife's property. Perhaps the possibility that the labor and services of the wife may have contributed to build up the fortune of the husband may have been in the legislative mind. Thus it will be seen that the trend of legislation in Georgia has not been to restrict the powers of the jury, or to confine them rigidly to the rule that, if a divorce shall be granted to the husband against his wife, no provision for her support shall be made. The authority given to the jury by the act of 1806 to divide the property among the children, but to make an allowance to either party, should they think proper, and the later provisions in regard to the powers of the jury, negative the idea of an absolute limitation in regard to alimony if a divorce should be granted to the husband.

In Campbell v. Campbell, 90 Ga. 687, 16 S. E. 960, Mr. Justice Simmons said: "A wife is entitled to support by her husband until the right is forfeited by her own misconduct; and in some cases alimony has been allowed her even where the divorce was in favor of the husband." He also said that in this state the right of a wife to a provision by the husband in her favor is the same, whether the divorce is from bed and board only or a total dissolution of the marriage,—at least, if a valid marriage has subsisted. In that case the divorce was granted on the application of the wife. We have not overlooked the fact that § 2462 of the Civil Code 1895 says that "if the jury, on the second or final verdict, find in favor of the wife, they shall also, in providing permanent alimony for her, specify what amount the minor children shall be entitled to for their permanent support, . . . and this they may also do if, from any legal cause, the wife may not be entitled to permanent alimony, and the said children are not in the same category." We do not think that the expression, "if the jury, on the second or final verdict, find in favor of the wife," means that in no event can alimony be awarded unless the wife shall obtain a divorce. In such a case, the law provides, in awarding alimony to her, for specifying the amount to which the minor children should be entitled; and also for finding alimony for the children, should she be debarred from obtaining it for any legal reason. That section was derived from the act of October 28, 1870 (Acts 1870, p. 413). Its title was, "An Act to Extend the Provision for Alimony to the Family of the Husband; to Provide for the Custody of the Children, and for Other Purposes Connected Therewith." Under § 2478 of the Civil Code, the husband is bound for necessities furnished to his wife when living separate from him; but, if she voluntarily abandons him without sufficient provocation, notice by the husband shall relieve him of all liability for necessities furnished to her. This deals with the authority of the wife, as matter of right, to charge her husband with necessities, when living separate from him. It does not deal with divorce cases, or the power of the judge to award temporary alimony, or absolutely prevent a jury from allowing permanent alimony in a proper case. They may allow it or refuse it, or may allow less than full maintenance, according to circumstances.

The construction of statutes of one state often throws little light on the construction of those of another, as a slight difference in language may make a great difference in construction. But an examination of the statutes of other states and their construction by the courts show that the trend of authority is in harmony with this decision. In Deenis v. Deenis, 79 Ill. 74, a statute was under consideration which declared that, "when a divorce shall be decreed, it shall and may be lawful for the court to make such order touching the alimony and maintenance of the wife, the care, custody, and support of the children, or any of them, as, from the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the case, 30 I.R.A. (N.S.)

shall be fit, reasonable, and just." It was held that alimony might be allowed, notwithstanding the divorce was granted for the fault of the wife. The opinion of Mr. Justice Scholfield strongly presents the grounds of equity and justice for such a construction. In Spitler v. Spitler, 108 Ill. 120, the former ruling was adhered to; but it was said that it was not the object of the legislature, in adopting the provision of the statute relating to alimony, to abrogate the general principles or policy of the law relating to that subject, but rather to clothe the court with power to mitigate occasional hardships that might otherwise occur. In Graves v. Graves, 108 Mass. 314, 317, a somewhat similar statute of Massachusetts was construed, and it was held that alimony might be awarded to the wife upon granting to the husband a divorce for her fault. Gray, J., clearly stated the reason for giving such a construction to the statute.

An application for temporary alimony is made to the presiding judge pending the litigation. He is vested with considerable discretion on the subject. It is sometimes granted where permanent alimony is ultimately refused, on the ground that the wife must be maintained and furnished reasonable opportunity for pressing her suit or defending herself against charges made against her. If she wilfully deserts her husband without cause, this may furnish a ground for refusing temporary alimony, in the discretion of the judge; and in some cases, where the separation was clearly shown to have resulted from the adultery of the wife, or to have been without any shadow of excuse, and there were other circumstances of hardship in requiring the husband to thus support her, it has been held to be an abuse of discretion to allow her alimony. Vinson v. Vinson, 94 Ga. 492, 19 S. E. 898; Kendrick v. Kendrick, 105 Ga. 38, 31 S. E. 115; Williams v. Williams, 114 Ga. 772, 40 S. E. 782.

In this case the evidence of the wife tended to show bad conduct on the part of the husband; that she had always helped support the family by sewing; that her eyesight was failing, and her health was becoming so poor that she was scarcely able to do any work, and was not able to support herself without assistance; and there was evidence tending to show that the husband was able-bodied and earned about $18 per week. It was admitted in the pleadings that neither the husband nor the wife had any property. We do not mean that courts or juries should make matrimonial dissensions attractive as a source of profit. The reverse is true. It was declared by McCay, J., as long ago as 1872 (Hill v. Hill, 47 Ga. 332, 336), that "suits for divorce and alimony ought not to be encouraged."

The jury might perhaps have found against the present plaintiff's application for alimony; but, under the evidence, the judge erred in declaring, as a fixed rule of law, that, if the jury found a divorce for the husband on the ground of desertion, the wife would be entitled to no alimony.

4. The verdict was somewhat unusual in form; but it is unnecessary to deal with that point, as the case is to be tried again on its merits.

Judgment reversed.

Fish, Ch. J., and Atkinson, J., dissent. The other Justices concur.

Fish, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am constrained to dissent from the proposition announced in the second head-note to the opinion of the majority of the court. I understand the rule to be that, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, permanent alimony will not be awarded a wife when a decree for divorce is rendered against her. 14 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 767; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 118 (3). The provisions of §§ 2435, 2462, and 2478 of the Civil Code of 1895, quoted in the opinion, when construed in pari materia, do not, in my opinion, change the rule. If, under the law of this state, a husband is not bound for necessities furnished his wife if she be living in adultery with another man (Civil Code 1895, § 2478), and if temporary alimony cannot be awarded a wife where the separation has been caused solely by adultery on her part (Williams v. Williams, 114 Ga. 772, 40 S. E. 782), I am unable to understand why the husband should be required to support her by the payment of permanent alimony when he procures a divorce from her because of her adultery, or because of her guilt in any other respect authorizing a divorce. I am authorized by Justice Atkinson to state that he concurs in this dissent.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

FLORA E. HAMMOND, Admr., etc., of Harold E. Martin, Deceased,

v.

LEWISTON, AUGUSTA, & WATERVILLE STREET RAILWAY.

(106 Me. 209, 76 Atl. 672.)

Action — for death — right to bring.

Under a statute creating a right of action for wrongful death, to be brought by an administrator, for the exclusive benefit of the widow, children, or heirs at law of decedent, no action can be maintained in case he dies childless, leaving a widow, who dies before action brought.
30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Note. — Failure of beneficiary first entitled under death statute to bring action, as giving such right to beneficiary next entitled.

The great weight of authority and the reasoning of nearly all the cases seems to be in accord with the rule announced in HAMMOND v. LEWISTON, A. & W. STREET R. Co., that the failure of the beneficiary first entitled under the death statute to bring the action will not transfer such right of action to other persons for whose benefit the action might have been maintained if the person first entitled had not been living when the right or action accrued.

The reason for the rule is that the statutes giving a right of action for wrongful death for the benefit of specified persons are construed to create a single cause of action, which accrues immediately upon the death of the decedent, and exists for the exclusive benefit of the beneficiary in whom the action vests, so that it cannot be transferred to any other beneficiaries by the death or failure of the first beneficiary to sue, since there never was any right of action for their benefit, in the absence of statute providing for such contingency. Belding v. Black Hills & Ft. P. R. Co. 3 S. D. 369, 53 N. W. 750; Snyder v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 9 Pa. Dist. R. 3; Carden v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 37 S. W. 839; Waldo v. Goodsell, 33 Conn. 432; Lehigh Iron Co. v. Rupp, 100 Pa. 95.

So, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Jones, 45 Fla. 407, 34 So. 246, it was held that in actions for the recovery for death by wrongful act, the defendant may show in bar to the plaintiff's right to recover that there is in esse a person who is given by the statute a precedent right of action over the plaintiff. This case follows the reasoning of the court in Duval v. Hunt, 34 Fla. 85, 15 So. 876, where it was said, in construing the statute, that the existence or nonexistence of anyone having the precedent right of action under the statute enters into the very substance of the right of action itself when instituted by any one of the named classes of persons after the first.

The reasoning of the court in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bean, 94 Tenn. 388, 29 S. W. 370, holding that an action brought by the administrator of the deceased, for the benefit of the widow of the deceased, who, under the statute, was the sole beneficiary, abated as a consequence of her death pending a writ of error, was that the right of recovery, having once vested in the widow, could not revert in the next class of beneficiaries named in the statute, for the reason that no provision was made in the stat-

R EPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Kennebec County for the opinion of the full bench of an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Plaintiff nonsuited.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williamson & Burleigh for plaintiff.

Messrs. Heath & Andrews, for defendant:

The statute is exclusive and in derogation of the common law. It is to be strictly construed, and an action thereunder cannot be prosecuted for the beneficiaries next in order.

Woodward v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 23 Wis. 400; Loague v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 91 Tenn. 458, 19 S. W. 430; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bean, 94 Tenn. 388, 29 S. W. 370.

Cornish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought under Rev. Stat. chap. 89, §§ 9, 10, by the administratrix ute for such contingency, but that the cause of action, on the death of the person to whom it survived, or for whose benefit it might have been prosecuted, was thereby extinguished.

So, also, in Woodward v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 23 Wis. 400, it was held, under a similar statute, that, upon the death of the decedent, the right of action vests solely and exclusively for the benefit of the survivor first entitled, and that the action abates upon his death, he being the real party in interest, although the administrator is the nominal plaintiff, and there are persons living for whose benefit the action might have been maintained if the persons first entitled had not been living when the right of action accrued.

To the same effect are Dillier v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 34 Ind. App. 52, 72 N. E. 271; Doyle v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 81 Ohio St. 184, 90 N. E. 165; Loague v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 91 Tenn. 458, 19 S. W. 430.

But in Morris v. Spartanburg R. Gas & Electric Co. 70 S. C. 279, 49 S. E. 854, it was held that an action brought by an administrator of a son, for his wrongful death, for the alleged benefit of his father and brothers and sisters, did not abate on the death of the father, although he was the sole beneficiary under the statute when the action was commenced, but that, on the death of the father, the action might be carried on for the benefit of whoever might be entitled to participate in the recovery. The court said: "The statute is remedial, and should be liberally construed, so as to accomplish its object. It was designed to remove the common-law rule, founded on the maxim, Actio personalis moritur cum persona, as an obstacle to the recovery of of the estate of Harold E. Martin, for the benefit of herself, as his sole heir at law at the date of the writ. Plaintiff's intestate was instantaneously killed by being struck by a car of the defendant at the date alleged in the declaration. He left a widow, but no children. Subsequently the widow died, no administration then having been taken out upon her husband's estate, and no suit having been brought for her benefit. After the death of the widow, the plaintiff, the sister of said Martin, and his sole heir at law, was appointed administratrix of his estate, and began this action. The case comes to the law court on report, and the single question presented is whether, on the foregoing facts, this action, if maintainable on the merits, can be maintained for the benefit of the plaintiff as such sole heir. If it can be maintained, the action is to stand for trial; if not, the entry of "plaintiff nonsuit" is to be made.

The language of Rev. Stat. chap. 89, §§ 9, 10, which is the basis of this action, is as follows:

"Sec. 9. Whenever the death of a person damages for death of a party by a wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, and to create a right of action in the administrator of the deceased for the benefit of the persons named in the statute. . . . We think it would be too narrow a construction of the statute to hold that an action thereunder could abate as long as any beneficiary, person or class, named in the statute, existed. In this case, while it is true that the father would have been sole beneficiary in the event of his being alive at the time of recovery of damages, still, the statute had other beneficiaries in contemplation in the event of his death. The brothers and sisters of the deceased, named in the complaint, are his heirs at law, and, since they fall within the class of beneficiaries, while the action is still pending, the action should not abate for want of a statutory beneficiary."

As shown in HAMMOND v. LEWISTON, A. & W. STREET R. Co., under the provisions of the English statute and some of the state statutes of this country, the right of action vests at once, for the benefit of all the persons entitled to receive any part of the money recovered, and may be maintained so long as any of such persons survive. Woodward v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra.

Upon the general question as to survival of the statutory action to personal representatives of original beneficiary, see note to Gilkeson v. Missouri P. R. Co. 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 844.

In Scott v. Central R. Co. 77 Ga. 450, it was held that the children could not maintain an action for the homicide of their mother during the lifetime of their father, under a statute giving a prior right of action to their father, although he had shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who, or the corporation which, would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the persons injured and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as shall amount to a felony.

"Sec. 10. Every such action shall be brought by and in the names of the personal representatives of such deceased person, and the amount recovered in every such action shall be for the exclusive benefit of his widow, if no children, and of the children, if no widow, and if both, then of her and them equally, and if neither, of his heirs. The jury may give such damages as they shall deem a fair and just compensation, not exceeding $5,000, with reference to the pecuniary injuries resulting from such death to the persons for whose benefit such action is brought, provided, that such action shall be commenced within two years after the death of such person."

It is conceded that at common law no remedy by action existed for loss of life. The right of action set up by the plaintiff is a pure creature of statute, and upon the fair construction of that statute this case stands or falls. The plaintiff's contention is that § 9 creates a new right, and therefore should be construed strictly, as this court has heretofore interpreted it, limiting its scope to cases of immediate death, including cases of both instantaneous death and of total unconsciousness following immediately upon the accident and continuing until death. Perkins v. Oxford Paper Co. 104 Me. 109, 71 Atl. 476. But the plaintiff further contends that § 10, determining in whose name and for whose benefit the action should be brought, should be construed liberally, and, applying such liberal construction, it may be said to have been the intention of the legislature in this action, first to vest a right of action in the administrator of the deceased, absolutely, and secondly, and of less importance, to provide for the distribution of the damages so recovered. In other words, the plaintiff's position is that the administrator is given a right of action in any event, and the beneficiaries should be determined, not as of the date of the death, but of the recovery. Such a construction cannot be adopted, as it strains the language of the statute beyond its tensile strength. Sections 9 and 10 are not independent acts of the legislature, but allied sections of one and the same act, passed originally as chapter 124 of the Public Laws of 1891. One is not to be construed strictly and the other liberally, but both are to be construed together, and as they create a liability unknown to the common law, their effect is to be limited to cases clearly within the terms of the act. No right of action is to be inferred, and no remedy is to be given except as specified in the statute. "It is a general principle [of construction] that, where a right is given by statute and a remedy provided in the abandoned his children, and was totally insolvent and without property.

And in Cole v. Mayne, 122 Fed. 836, it was held that no action could be maintained by the children of the deceased where there was a widow de jure living, where the statute gave a separate and alternate right of action first to the widow, if there be one; that the allegation that the widow of the deceased was, at the time of the death of the decedent, separated from him, and living in open adultery with another man, did not show a right of action in the children, since, even if proof of such facts might defeat the recovery of damages by the widow, it would not destroy her right of action.

In Webb v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 88 Tenn. 119, 12 S. W. 428, it was held that an amendment to a statute giving the widow a right of action, to be brought in her own name, for the wrongful death of her husband, did not take away the right of the personal representative to sue for the benefit of the widow and children when deceased left a widow, and that if the widow waived her right to sue, the right remained in the personal representative, since the object of the amendment was to entitle the widow and children to bring the action in their own names, and without making out a case of declination on the part of the administrator, as they were compelled to do in the earlier statute.

In some of the states, the statute provides that if the beneficiary first entitled does not exercise the right of action within a given time, the next class may be substituted. As pointed out in HAMMOND v. LEWISTON, A. & W. STREET R. Co., this seems to emphasize the necessity of a positive statute in order to effect such substitution.

Under such a statute, it was held in Packard v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 181 Mo. 421, 103 Am. St. Rep. 607, 80 S. W. 951, that the election to sue by the beneficiary first entitled, whether successful or not, forever cuts off the right of action of those next entitled. In that case it was held that the election of the widow to sue one person, within the time limited, under the mistaken impression that he was the sole wrongdoer, though unsuccessful, was a bar to the right of the children to maintain suit against another person, on the ground that he was the real wrongdoer.

same act, the right can be pursued in no other mode." Flatley v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 230; Loague v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 91 Tenn. 458, 19 S. W. 430.

The language of the statute under consideration is plain and unambiguous. Some beneficiary named therein must exist at the time of the death of the deceased, otherwise no right of action arises. The suit is not for the benefit of the estate, and creditors have no interest in it. True, such suit is brought in the name of the administrator, but he is merely the nominal party, and acts as trustee. The legislature could have given the right directly to the widow or children or heirs, had it seen fit to do so, as the legislatures of some states have done. But if none of the beneficiaries exist at the time of death, no right of action is created. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Lilly, 90 Tenn. 563, 18 S. W. 243; Cooper v. Shore Electric Co. 63 N. J. L. 558, 44 Atl. 633; Topping v. St. Lawrence, 86 Wis. 526, 57 N. W. 385.

Under § 10, the party for whose benefit the action is brought depends upon the nature of the family that is left, and four different conditions are provided for,—widow without children, children without widow, widow and children, heirs at law. But, in any event, the immediate, absolute, and final vesting of the right occurs at the time of the decease, not at the time of bringing suit or of recovery. The beneficiaries have a right of action then or not at all, and the facts of each particular case determine which beneficiaries have the right. If there is a widow, as here, she has the sole and exclusive right. It belonged to her immediately upon the death of her husband, and could not be transferred to any other beneficiary, either by her death or failure to bring suit. The statute provides for several possible claimants, but the facts in each case determine which of them is the actual and sole claimant. There is no life interest in the widow, with a remainder over to the heirs at law. One action is granted, not several. When the husband died, the sister had no cause of action, and the death of the widow has not given her one. It is well settled that the writ must show for whose benefit the action is brought. Oulighan v. Butler, 189 Mass. 287, 75 N. E. 726; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Pitt, 91 Tenn. 86, 18 S. W. 118. The same was true of an indictment when that was the statutory remedy (State v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 60 Me. 145), because the judgment must follow the writ in the one case, and the indictment, in the other, and the amount recovered passes to the beneficiary named, the administrator in the one form of procedure and the state in the other acting merely as a trustee or conduit.

Again, the cause of action accrues at death by the very terms of the statute. The last clause of § 10 makes the two-year limitation within which suit can be brought begin at that time. Whoever has a cause of action under this statute has two years within which to bring it. Can it be that if a widow is left who survives her husband one year and eleven months, the heirs would then have a right of action, but only one month in which to enforce it? The absolute vesting of the right in some beneficiary at time of death is further apparent from the fact that the damages vary according to the relationship of the deceased to the beneficiary, and the dependence of the latter upon the former. "The injury for which damages can be recovered must be wholly to the beneficiaries themselves, and it is limited to the pecuniary effect of the death upon them." McKay v. New England Dredging Co. 92 Me. 454, 43 Atl. 29. The pecuniary effect of the death of a husband upon his widow, and therefore the damages recoverable in an action for her benefit, would differ materially from the pecuniary effect of his death upon remote heirs at law, and from the damages recoverable by them.

Authorities from other states are helpful only as they are based on statutes similar to ours, but the principle of the exclusive right in the first taker is followed under analogous statutes in Woodward v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 23 Wis. 400; Schmidt v. Menasha Wooden Ware Co. 99 Wis. 300, 74 N. W. 797; Loague v. Memphis & C. R. Co. supra; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bean, 94 Tenn. 388, 29 S. W. 370; Sanders v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 49 C. C. A. 565, 111 Fed. 708, in all of which it was held that a pending action for the benefit of the widow abated at her death, under the statutes of those states, governing survival of actions; and in Cooper v. Shore Electric Co. supra, where it was held that such action did not abate, but the injury sustained would be limited in duration and extent to the lifetime of the beneficiary. The question of survival or abatement, however, is not under consideration at this time.

Under the peculiar provisions of Lord Campbell's act in England, which, in its general scope, is the foundation of the legislation in the various states of this country, the right of action vests at once for the benefit of each and all of the persons entitled to receive any part of the money recovered, and may be maintained so long as any one of such persons survives, the amount recovered being apportioned among the various parties "in such shares as the jury, by their verdict, may direct." Blake

v. Midland R. Co. 18 Q. B. 93; Woodward v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra. In the case last cited, which arose under a statute providing that the amount recovered should be paid over to the husband or widow, if such relative survived, if not, then to lineal descendants, and if none, then to lineal ancestors, the deceased left a husband and a child. The court notes the clear distinction between actions under that statute and the statute of Wisconsin, which, in this respect, is similar to the statute in Maine, as follows:

"While it is apparent, under the English and New York statutes, that the right of action vests at once, for the benefit of each and all of the persons entitled to receive any part of the money recovered, and may be maintained so long as any one of such persons survives, it is equally apparent by our statute that it vests only for the benefit of the husband or widow, in case the deceased leaves such surviving relative; and if no such relative survives at the time of the death, the action may be prosecuted for the benefit of the lineal descendants of the deceased; and in default of these, then for the benefit of his or her lineal ancestors.

"The language of the statute is so plain that there seems to be no room for argument as to its meaning.

"In this case, the deceased, who was a married woman, left a husband, who survived until some time after this action was commenced. Upon her death, therefore, the right of action, by the statute, vested solely and exclusively for the benefit of her husband. He alone was entitled to the amount to be recovered, and could hold and dispose of the same at pleasure. The lineal descendants and ancestors of the deceased had no interest whatever in the action, and the damages to be recovered could not be estimated with reference to the pecuniary injury, if any, resulting to them, or any of them."

The statutes of New York and Pennsylvania and some other states follow Lord Campbell's act closely in the same respect. In some of the states, as in North Dakota and Colorado, the statute provides that if the beneficiary first entitled does not exercise the right of action within a given time, the next class, after due notice to the former, may be substituted. Harshman v. Northern P. R. Co. 14 N. D. 69, 103 N. W. 412; Hopper v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 84 C. C. A. 21, 155 Fed. 273. This emphasizes the necessity of a positive statute in order to effect such substitution.

Our attention has been called to only one case as sustaining the contention of the plaintiff. Morris v. Spartanburg R. Gas. & 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Electric Co. 70 S. C. 279, 49 S. E. 854. That case was based upon a statute more nearly resembling that of England, New York, and Pennsylvania, above referred to, and, suit having been brought for the benefit of all the beneficiaries, the court held that the action did not abate because of the death of the father, pendente lite, although, had he survived, he would have been the sole beneficiary. It may therefore properly be distinguished from the case at bar.

Further discussion is unnecessary. The construction contended for wrenches too violently the plain language of the statute, while that adopted follows its natural and reasonable meaning. It is therefore the opinion of the court that this action cannot be maintained, and, according to the stipulation, the entry must be: Plaintiff nonsuit.

Mechanics' lien — fitting material.

No lien exists against a building for labor performed for one who has contracted to furnish fitted stone for it, where the statute provides that whoever performs labor in erecting a building, by virtue of a contract with, or by the consent of, the owner, has a lien thereon.

(September 28, 1910.)

Note. — Right to a lien for labor in preparing materials in manufactured form, under a statute giving a lien for work or labor performed on the building or structure.

This note, of course, does not include cases arising under statutes specifically giving a lien for materials, nor cases dealing with the right to a lien under any form

REPORTS by the Supreme Judicial Court for Somerset County for the opinion of the full bench of suits to enforce certain alleged mechanics' liens on real estate. Judgments for defendants.

The facts are state in the opinion.

Messrs. Butler & Butler, for plaintiffs:

The contract of J. Palmer Merrill with Clark and Sawyer, requiring them to take the stone from the quarry, and to fit it according to minute specifications and drawings, was a contract for labor as well as for material.

Scannell v. Hub Brewing Co. 178 Mass. 288, 59 N. E. 628; Webster v. Real Estate Improv. Co. 140 Mass. 526, 6 N. E. 71.

The plaintiffs were laborers within the meaning of that word as used in the Maine statute, and, as such, are entitled to their lien, although their employers may not have had a lien.

Littlefield v. Morrill, 97 Me. 505, 94 Am. St. Rep. 513, 54 Atl. 1109; Pluredé v. Levasseur, 89 Me. 172, 36 Atl. 110; Atwood v. Williams, 40 Me. 409; Dewing v. Congregational Soc. 13 Gray, 414; Clark v. Kingsley, 8 Allen, 543.

The labor, while not performed upon the premises, was performed with Merrill's knowledge and consent, in preparing material which was intended for use, and actually used, in the construction of his building, and entitles the plaintiffs to a lien.

Daley v. Legate, 169 Mass. 257, 47 N. E. 1013; Wilson v. Sleeper, 131 Mass. 177; of statute, for materials as such, apart from the labor of preparing them. Nor does it cover cases, if any, where the lien is claimed for work in preparing material supplied by the owner or principal contractor.

It was held in Re Montmorency Cotton Mills Co. Rap. Jud. Quebec, 10 B. R. 158, that a manufacturer who undertook to furnish to a contractor certain completed cupboards for a structure which the latter was erecting was not a workman, within the meaning of a statute creating a lien. It was further held that to acquire a lien upon the premises, the work must be done upon the premises; and that therefore a workman engaged in fashioning the materials intended to be incorporated into the edifice was not entitled to a lien.

In Arnold v. Budlong, 11 R. I. 561, one who furnished sash and doors for a house was denied a lien as a laborer expending labor upon the improvement, the court saying that whatever labor he caused to be bestowed upon the improvement was as a seller of sash and doors.

And one who worked in making bricks for one who was furnishing them for a building was regarded in Haynes v. Holland (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 400, as not entitled to a lien as one employed "to work on the building."

And it was held in St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Mathews, 75 Tex. 92, 12 S. W. 976, that one who, at the instance of a contractor, furnished ties for a railroad, could not, because of the labor expended in preparing the ties for delivery, claim a lien upon the railroad, under a statute giving a lien to mechanics and laborers who should perform labor in the construction of a railroad, the court saying that the plaintiff was not a laborer, but a seller of ties. This case was indorsed and followed in St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Lyle, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 753, 26 S. W. 264.

While some language employed in Bennett v. Shackford, 11 Allen, 444, is to the effect that labor in one's planing and sawmill upon materials for a building is not labor performed in the erection of a building, the real decision is that the contract between the owner of the mill and the building contractor did not disclose that it was agreed that the materials were to be appropriated to the particular building, and that the latter, in the absence of such agreement, would be entitled to use them as he chose.

It was held in Donaher v. Boston, 126 Mass. 309, that a statute providing that, under specified conditions, a lien could be maintained for labor performed under an entire contract for labor and materials, was not intended to reach cases in which finished articles were sold at a fixed price, and that therefore no lien for labor in hammering granite existed in favor of one undertaking to furnish hammered granite for a building, at an entire price.

Following Donaher v. Boston, the Massachusetts court said that a contract to furnish and deliver certain articles "all prepared," even if it necessitated special manufacture, and called for things not to be found in the market, would have been satisfied by a delivery of such articles, by whomsoever prepared; that however likely it may have been that the materialman would have to prepare them himself, the contract did not require him to do so; and that therefore the contract was not for labor and materials. Tracy v. Wetherell, 165 Mass. 113, 42 N. E. 497 (followed in Eisnor v. Dinand, 165 Mass. 116, note 42 N. E. 498).

But the Massachusetts court held that a contract to "cut granite in buildings and set same in place" was expressly for labor and material, and that therefore a lien might be acquired for labor performed in a stone yard, upon the material furnished under such contract. Daley v. Legate, 169 Mass. 257, 47 N. E. 1013.

So, where the contract is for furnishing all the labor for constructing, erecting, and finishing certain appliances for a brewery, a lien thereon may include the value of labor in another city, employed in the construction of the appliances. Scannell v. Hub Brewing Co. 178 Mass. 288, 59 N. E. 628.

Dewing v. Congregational Soc. supra; Jones v. Keen, 115 Mass. 170.

Messrs. Merrill & Merrill, for defendants, and J. Palmer Merrill, owner:

Labor in preparing material does not give a lien on the completed structure and the land upon which it stands, for labor in erecting the building.

Baker v. Fessenden, 71 Me. 292; Shaw v. Young, 87 Me. 274, 32 Atl. 897; A. L. & F. F. Goss Co. v. Greenleaf, 98 Me. 442, 57 Atl. 581; Donaher v. Boston, 126 Mass. 309.

Even though the material furnished is specially designed for the building, it is a sale of goods, and not a contract for labor on the building, and the person so furnishing cannot maintain a lien for furnishing labor in the erection of the building.

Tracy v. Wetherell, 165 Mass. 113, 42 N. E. 497; Eisnor v. Dinand, 165 Mass. 116, note, 42 N. E. 498; Scannell v. Hub Brewing Co. 178 Mass. 288, 59 N. E. 628; Evans Marble Co. v. International Trust Co. 101 Md. 210, 109 Am. St. Rep. 568, 60 Atl. 667, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 831.

Savage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These five suits are brought to enforce liens against the building and land of J. Palmer Merrill, under Rev. Stat. chap. 93, § 29, which provides that "whoever performs labor or furnishes labor or materials in erecting, altering, moving, or repairing . . . a wharf or pier, or any building thereon, by virtue of a contract with or by consent of the owner, has a lien thereon, and on the land on which it stands, . . . to secure payment thereof." The case comes up on report.

The defendants contracted with Mr. Merrill to furnish all the cut stone required for a building which he proposed to erect, and which he afterwards did erect, for the sum of $900. The plaintiffs labored for the defendants in the various processes in preparing and fitting the stone for the building, according to specifications furnished. Part of the labor sued for was quarrying in a quarry used by the defendants, part was cutting stone in their stone yard, and part was sharpening drills. The liability of the defendants is admitted in all the cases. The only question presented for our determination is whether the plaintiffs, or any of them, have mechanics' liens on the building and land of Mr. Merrill to secure the payment for their labor.

We think the plaintiffs have no liens. To bring the cause within the statute, it must appear that the laborer performed labor in erecting the building. The defendants were contractors. They contracted not to erect the building, or to do the granite work upon the building, but to furnish cut and fitted stone for the building. They were not to set it. Their contract was completed when they delivered the cut stone to the owner. They had nothing to do with the building itself. They did not even engage to cut the stone themselves, though doubtless that was contemplated. They engaged to furnish the cut stone. They would have satisfied their contract had they purchased the stone, all fitted, and then delivered it to the owner of the building.

The distinction is clear. Where one engages to erect a building, or to do certain things in the erection of the building, as, for example, the carpenter work, or the painting, or the plumbing, or the granite work, his employees have liens for their labor in doing these things. And if, in connection with doing these things, he agrees to furnish, and does furnish, the materials, the result is the same. It is not necessary that all of the labor should actually be done on the structure itself. To illustrate: The doors and windows may be made at the shop, the boards may be sawed and planed at the mill, or the iron work done at the blacksmith shop. These processes are all a part of the erection of the building. The work so done, in the contemplation of the statute, is done "in the erection of a building." Webster v.

In Evans Marble Co. v. International Trust Co. 101 Md. 210, 109 Am. St. Rep. 568, 60 Atl. 667, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 831, where one furnished cut and carved marble for a building, it was held that he was entitled to a lien for the work done in his own shops, under a statute giving a lien for the payment of all debts contracted for work done on or about a building. Here the plaintiff's contract was not only to cut, carve, and furnish the marble, but completely to put it in place, and finish all the exterior marble work.

It was held in Emery v. Hertig, 60 Minn. 54, 61 N. W. 830, that the plaintiff was 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

entitled to a lien for labor furnished and performed in polishing marble which his employer was furnishing for a building, under a contract with the owner, where the statute gave a lien to persons performing labor or furnishing skill for the erection of any building, by virtue of a contract with, or at the instance of, the owner of the building.

On food furnished contractor for employees and teams as materials giving lien on railroad, see the note to Carson v. Shelton, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 509.

Real Estate Improv. Co. 140 Mass. 526, 6 N. E. 71.

But where one contracts to furnish completed articles for a building, and is to have no part in the erection of the building, his employees have no lien for their labor in preparing and completing the articles. Their labor is in no proper sense performed "in the erection of the building."

It would seem that these plaintiffs, or some of them, had a lien which they might have enforced, under Rev. Stat. chap. 93, § 27, which gives a lien for quarrying or cutting and dressing granite in a quarry. But that is immaterial in this discussion.

The plaintiffs are entitled to judgments against the defendants, but not to judgments for liens.

The entry in each case will be:

Defendants defaulted. Judgment that plaintiff has no lien. Judgment for J. Palmer Merrill against the plaintiff for his costs.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

INDIANAPOLIS NORTHERN TRACTION COMPANY, Impleaded, etc., Appt.,

v.

JAMES J. BRENNAN et al.

(— Ind. —, 87 N. E. 215.)

Mechanics' lien — contractor.

1. A title, "An Act Concerning Liens of Mechanics, Laborers, and Materialmen," is not broad enough to cover legislation extending the lien to contractors who do not themselves perform the labor.

Same — provision for laborer.

2. A statute conferring a right to a lien upon laborers does not include contractors who do not themselves perform some labor.

Appeal — evidence — equity case — duty to weigh.

3. The appellate court will not, under a statute requiring it to weigh the evidence in equity cases, do so where the testimony is oral, and there is a substantial conflict in it.

Building contract — hindering contractor — damages.

4. One who contracts for the performance of the labor upon his property, to be completed by a certain day, and obligates himself to furnish the necessary material, and prepare the property for the performance of the work, is liable to the contractor for the reasonable worth and value of the work which he performs, and for any loss sustained by him if he is delayed beyond the time specified in the performance of the work by the default of the owner.

Same — estimates — binding effect.

5. The engineer's estimates, which, by the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

terms of a construction contract, are to be binding in case of dispute, are not binding if he misinterprets or misconstrues the provisions of the contract.

Same — construction — material which cannot be plowed.

6. In an excavation contract providing that loose rock, which is not to be removed at the ordinary price, shall comprise hard shale, coarse boulders in gravel, cemented gravel, hardpan, or any other material which cannot be plowed in a specified manner, a provision that it is to be understood that the plowing test shall apply to all materials named herein does not apply to the substances specified, but only to "any other material" which cannot be plowed.

Same — definition.

7. A provision in an excavation contract taking material that cannot be plowed out of the class of ordinary earth, for purposes of compensation, means that cannot be plowed with reasonable facilities, and in-

Note. — Are contractors or subcontractors within the protection of statutes giving liens to "laborers," "mechanics," "workmen," and the like.

It should be noted at the outset that this note is confined to cases arising under mechanics' lien statutes, to the exclusion of decisions turning on the use of the words "laborers," "labor," and the like, in statutes giving preferences in assignments for creditors or insolvency proceedings, or creating exemptions generally, or their use in bonds of contractors and others. It is but consistent also to exclude English decisions construing and applying the truck acts. The foregoing statements apply particularly to that portion of this note which has to do with the matter of teams and teaming.

A contractor or subcontractor who causes labor to be performed by persons employed by him is not a laborer, within the meaning of the mechanics' lien laws. Vane v. Newcombe, 132 U. Same — compensation — absence of provision.

8. In the absence of a provision in an excavation contract for the price at which a certain class of materials shall be moved, the contractor is entitled to the reasonable value of the work.

Same — use of plow — effect.

9. That the most feasible and available method of loosening material to be excavated under a contract which takes material that cannot be plowed out of the class of ordinary earth, for purposes of compensation, is the plow, does not require compensation at the rate paid for ordinary earth, if it cannot be plowed in the ordinary manner.

On Rehearing.

Trial — jury — right — raising question.

10. The question of the right to a jury trial cannot be raised by a demurrer to the complaint, which merely raises the question whether or not it states a cause of action, or by objection to the introduction of evidence.

Appeal — jury — waiver — presumption.

11. The appellate court will, when the record recites that the parties came and submitted the cause to the court for trial, without the intervention of a jury, presume that a jury trial was expressly waived.

A statute giving a lien to laborers or mechanics for labor performed has reference to persons by whom the labor is actually performed, and does not give one a lien for the labor performed by others. Savannah & C. R. Co. v. Callahan, 49 Ga. 506; Wooten v. Archer, 49 Ga. 388; Cochran v. Swann, 53 Ga. 39; Ely v. Stanton, 120 Pa. 532, 14 Atl. 441; Henry v. Sheaffer, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 237; Diller v. Frantz, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 306; Hoffa v. Person, 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 367.

A statute giving a lien to mechanics, laborers, and operatives does not entitle a contractor or subcontractor to a lien for the labor performed by those employed by him (Krakauer v. Locke, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 446, 25 S. W. 700; Parks v. Locke [Tex. Civ. App.] 25 S. W. 702; Eastern Texas R. Co. v. Foley, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 129, 69 S. W. 1030); but it has been held to entitle him to a lien for the value of such labor as is actually performed by him personally (Eastern Texas R. Co. v. Davis, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 342, 83 S. W. 883).

Mr. Justice Grier, writing for the United States Supreme Court, said in Winder v. Caldwell, 14 How. 434, 14 L. ed. 487: "The title to this act shows its policy and intention. It is to secure, to mechanics and others, payment for labor done and materials found; and the persons enumerated in the 1st section are plainly those mechanics and tradesmen whose personal labor or property have been incorporated into the building, and not the agents, supervisors, undertakers, or contractors who employed them. The act contemplates two conditions under which such labor and materials may have been furnished: First, on the order of the owner, who may act without the intervention of any middleman, and thus become indebted directly to his mechanics and tradesmen. Or, secondly, when they have been furnished on the order of a contractor 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or undertaker. In such cases, the mechanic, or materialman, if he intends to look to the credit of the building, and not to that of the contractor with whom he deals, must give notice to the owner of the building, within thirty days, of his intention to claim this security. The contractor, though mentioned in the act, is not enumerated among those entitled to its benefit. The aim and policy of this act is also obvious. Experience has shown that mechanics and tradesmen who furnish labor and materials for the construction of buildings are often defrauded by insolvent owners and dishonest contractors. Many build houses on speculation, and after the labor of the mechanic and the materials are incorporated into them, the owner becomes insolvent, and sells the buildings, or encumbers them with liens; and thus, one portion of his creditors are paid at the expense of the labor and property of others. Or, the solvent owner, who builds by the agency of a contractor or middleman, pays his price and receives his building, without troubling himself to inquire what has been the fate of those whose labor or means have constructed it. These evils required a remedy, and such a one as is given by this act. Its object is not to secure contractors, who can take care of themselves, but those who may suffer loss by confiding in them. It is not the merit of the contractor that gave rise to the system, but the protection of those who might be wronged by him, if the owner were not compelled thus to take care of their interests before he pays away the price stipulated. But the contractor is neither within the letter nor the spirit of the act."

Under a statute giving a lien upon a building for labor actually performed therein, it was held in Parker v. Bell, 7 Gray, 429, that a plasterer was entitled to a lien for his own services and those of his apprentices, but not for the labor of journeymen employed by him. The court said: "The object of the provisions of the statute is to create and preserve to the laborer security for the payment of the wages which he earns. It is manifest, from a consideration of the provisions of the successive stat-

Jury — failure to demand — equity suit — formality.

12. Defendants cannot avoid the effect of their neglect to demand a jury trial on the theory that, the suit being to enforce a lien, and therefore of equitable jurisdiction, a demand for a jury would have been an idle formality and of no avail.

Appeal — —failure to demand jury — wrong theory of case.

13. One who consents to the trial of a cause by the court without a jury cannot insist on appeal that it was, because of that fact, tried on a wrong theory, to his injury.

Mechanics' lien — contractor.

14. A statute giving a lien to one who performs work and labor for a railroad does not apply to one who contracts to do construction work by means of employees, but who does not himself perform any work or labor.

(February 18, 1909.)

A PPEAL by defendant Indianapolis Northern Traction Company from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Howard County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a contract for services rendered, and to foreclose a mechanics' lien to secure the payment of such amount, and from a judgment in favor of defendant Jacob N. Bick, upon his cross complaint, for similar relief. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. A. Van Osdel, Blackledge

utes in relation to the lien of mechanics upon the estates upon which their labor has been expended, that the legislature have regarded it as a sound and just principle that all those who have, by consent of the owner, or in pursuance of contracts with him for that purpose, contributed to increase the value of his property, should have an interest in it until their respective claims for such services shall have been paid and discharged. The apprentice earns no wages for himself, and therefore he can have no lien; for, having no claim for personal compensation, he has no occasion for security; but the labor which he performs belongs to his master, in whose favor the lien arises the same as if he had himself executed the work. It is otherwise with the journeyman. He earns wages; he is entitled to payment for labor performed; and therefore he may have, in his own behalf, a lien upon the land upon which he has wrought."

A statute giving to persons who labor on cutting or hauling logs a lien for their personal services does not apply to a contractor, except to the extent to which he personally performs manual labor. Hale v. Brown, 59 N. H. 558, 47 Am. Rep. 224.

It was held in Rogers v. Dexter & P. R. Co. 85 Me. 372, 21 L.R.A. 528, 27 Atl. 257, that a subcontractor was not a laborer within the meaning of the statute, so as to be entitled to a lien even for his own personal labor in working with those employed by him.

On the other hand, it has been held that where he performed labor under his contract, he was, to that extent, entitled to a lien. Klondike Lumber Co. v. Williams, 71 Ark. 334, 75 S. W. 854.

Although the court does not expressly say so, the language of the decision in Littlefield v. Morrill, 97 Me. 505, 94 Am. St. Rep. 513, 54 Atl. 1109, seems to suggest that the test is not whether the contractor actually performs labor, but whether the contract requires that he do so. Here the plaintiff contracted to haul logs for another, and performed the contract largely through the services of men and teams hired by him. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Referring to the statute providing that whoever labors at hauling logs shall have a lien, the court said: "It is now settled that the statute is designed solely for the protection of laborers performing physical labor with their own hands, and with their teams, under the direction of an employer, and for fixed wages, and that the subject matter of that protection is solely the wages earned by such laborers. . . . It is true, these plaintiffs performed some physical labor and also used their own teams to some extent on these logs and lumber, but they did not so do under the direction of an employer, and for mere wages. They had not merely hired out their personal labor. They had taken a contract to cut and haul all the logs on the tract, and were independent in their method of doing it, and were carrying out their contract largely through the labor of others employed by them. They were contractors engaged in a business enterprise from which they expected profits which might be more or less, according to circumstances. They were not mere laborers, working for fixed wages, the rate of which would not be varied by circumstances. When they labored themselves, it was not for wages, but to increase profits by saving wages. Had the enterprise proved profitable they could, and undoubtedly would, have retained all the profits, however much in excess of the customary wages in such work, and would have allowed no rebate to the owners of the logs. Hence, if the enterprise has proved unprofitable, they should not, and cannot, repudiate their position as contractors and recover wages as laborers."

Contractors for the work of loading of sugar cane onto cars at a certain price per ton are not workmen or laborers employed on a plantation, within the meaning of a statute giving preference to their wages. Fortier v. Delgado, 59 C. C. A. 180, 122 Fed. 604.

And a contractor for mining is not a laborer or employee within the meaning of an act giving a lien on the output of mines. Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills, 85 Fed. 907.

forms his contract through the labor of others, employed by him, is not entitled to invoke a statute giving a lien to persons who do labor upon any farm. Mohr v. Clark, 3 Wash. Terr. 440, 19 Pac. 28.

So, a statute giving a lien to one who performs labor upon logs and timber does not apply to one who personally performs no labor, but causes it to be performed by persons employed by him. Campbell v. Sterling Mfg. Co. 11 Wash. 204, 39 Pac. 451.

And one who contracted to furnish board to loggers at a stipulated price was held in Bradford v. Underwood, 80 Wis. 50, 48 N. W. 1105, not to be entitled to invoke the statute giving a lien to persons who should perform services in cooking food for loggers.

Distinguishing between "bestowed" and "performed," the court in Macomber v. Bigelow, 126 Cal. 9, 58 Pac. 312, seemed to think that a statute giving a lien on property upon which labor should be bestowed operated to give a lien to a subcontractor for labor that he caused his employees to perform.

It was held in Carver v. Bagley, 79 Minn. 114, 81 N. W. 757, that a contractor was within the meaning of an act giving a lien to persons who perform labor or services in cutting, hauling, and banking logs.

And in Barrett-Hicks Co. v. Glas (Cal. App.) 111 Pac. 760, it was held the lien for labor in favor of a subcontractor furnishing labor and materials for a building could not be confined to such labor as he personally performed.

Invoking the maxim, Qui facit per alium, facit per se, the court in Shaw v. Bradley, 59 Mich. 199, 26 N. W. 331, held that a contractor for running logs was entitled to liens under the log lien act giving such right to any persons that should perform labor in running logs. In this decision considerable stress was laid upon the fact that it was shown that the parties did not contemplate that the contractor should personally perform the services. Without expressly overruling this case, the Michigan court in Kieldsen v. Wilson, 77 Mich. 45, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Baker, 165 Ind. 90, 74 N. E. 619.

The constitutional provision that the subject of an act shall be expressed in the title does not apply in all its vigor where an act has remained on the statute books for sixteen years, and been incorporated into a subsequent statute without change, as a section thereof, because no legislator, 43 N. W. 1054, held that a contractor for hauling logs was not entitled to a lien under a statute which, it seems, gave a lien for labor and services performed. The Kieldsen Case, however, was overruled and the Shaw Case adhered to in Phillips v. Freyer, 80 Mich. 254, 45 N. W. 81, where the owner of a sawmill was held entitled to a lien for the sawing of lumber under a contract calling for compensation by the thousand feet, by virtue of the statute giving a lien to persons performing labor or services in manufacturing lumber. This statute is the same as the one involved in the Kieldsen Case.

Under a statute giving a lien to every workman, laborer, or other person who should do or perform any labor by virtue of a contract with any incorporated company, it was held that a corporation was entitled to a lien for the performance of its contract to supervise, by the services of its officers and employees, a part of the construction of a railroad, to furnish labor, and become primarily responsible for the wages, to furnish tools, and to be at all times under the supervision of the railroad's supervising engineer. Wetzel & T. R. Co. v. Tennis Bros. Co. 75 C. C. A. 266, 145 Fed. 458, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 426.

Ordinarily, however, a contractor with a corporation is not an employee thereof within the meaning of an act giving a lien to employees for work and labor done or performed for the corporation. Vane v. Newcombe, 132 U. S. 220, 33 L. ed. 310, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 60.

Contractors who do not personally labor or work upon a railroad are not entitled to a lien, under a statute giving a lien to every mechanic, builder, artisan, workman, laborer, or other person who shall do or perform any work or labor upon the road. Little Rock, H. S. & T. R. Co. v. Spencer, 65 Ark. 183, 42 L.R.A. 334, 47 S. W. 196.

So, contractors for building a railroad are not employees or laborers within the meaning of a statute giving liens to laborers and employees for their services in carrying on the business of the railroad, although the contract is to furnish laborers, in voting for the latter act, could have been tricked into voting for something of which he was ignorant.

Where a statute has remained on the books for many years, been acquiesced in, property rights acquired thereunder, and sanctioned by repeated decisions of the supreme court, the failure of the legislature to observe mere forms in its enactment will be cured by such lapse of time and acquiescence.

tools, and teams by the day, for which certain sums per day are to be paid, with 10 per cent additional for superintendence and the use of tools. Tod v. Kentucky Union R. Co. 18 L.R.A. 305, 3 C. C. A. 60, 6 U. S. App. 186, 52 Fed. 241.

The case of Couper v. Gaboury, 16 C. C. A. 112, 30 U. S. App. 325, 69 Fed. 7, is sometimes cited as deciding that a statute giving a lien to persons performing labor upon, or for the benefit of, any railroad, extends to a contractor for construction work. It really does not so hold. The precise ground of the decision is shown by the following language of the district court, whose position was upheld in a per curiam affirmation: "The only question in this case that seems to demand a very careful investigation is whether or not § 2 of chapter 3747 of the Laws of Florida (the act of June 3, 1887), which gave a lien to any person performing any labor upon or for the benefit of any railroad, gave a lien to a contractor who performed such labor by others. At the time the contract in this case was made, this act was in force. Subsequently, by a special act, legislative commissioners were appointed to prepare and cause to be printed the laws of Florida then in force, and they prepared and caused to be printed and published what is known as the 'Revised Statutes of the State of Florida,' which were finally approved June 8, 1891. In this revision, the commissioners, in § 1727 of such revision, provided that any person performing, by himself or others, any labor upon any railroad, should have a lien upon the property of said road. It is under this provision that petitioner Couper claims a lien, his contention being that, as the law stood before the revision, no contractor had a lien, but under the revision such right was given. There was no legislation upon his subject in order to effect the change of right given under the statute, and, if such change was made, it must be held to be in violation of the intention of the legislature. The presumption is, therefore, that there was no change in the force and effect of the former statute, but the revision only more clearly and plainly expressed the intention in enacting the law of 1887. This revision and construction was approved by the legislature, very many members of which had been members of the legislature which had passed the original statute. This construction is supported by the language of the 8th section of the act of 1887, which provides that contractors or subcontractors shall furnish a list of all persons employed to the person having the work done, under the penalty of having such contractors' or subcontractors' lien barred. It is an elementary principle in the construction of statutes that the entire statute shall be considered together, and not one particular section of it; and, examining the 2d section of this law in the light of the language of the 8th section, it is impossible to conclude that it was the intention of the legislature to confine the benefits of such act to the wage workers, excluding contractors, although the courts of numerous other states have given such construction to somewhat similar statutes."

The provisions that the judgment of the chief engineer of the company should be final and conclusive as to the classification of material, and that his construction of the contract should be final and conclusive, are not binding on plaintiff, because against public policy.

A contractor for the construction of a section of railroad cannot look to the stockholders, under a provision rendering the latter individually liable for all labor performed for the corporation (Peck v. Miller, 39 Mich. 596); the contractor is not a laborer, within the meaning of an act of this kind (Aikin v. Wasson, 24 N. Y. 482).

Teams and teaming.

A claim for the use of teams hired to haul lumber does not come within the meaning of an act giving "to laborers on lumber a lien thereon." McCrillis v. Wilson, 34 Me. 286, 56 Am. Dec. 655; Coburn v. Kerswell, 35 Me. 126.

It was held in Sparks v. Crescent Lumber Co. 40 Tex. Civ. App. 222, 89 S. W. 423, that under a statute giving a lien to laborers who should perform any services in a mill, one who hauled lumber with his team, at a certain rate per thousand feet, was not entitled to a lien for the use of his team, because, in that respect, he was a contractor, and he was not entitled to a lien for the services rendered by him personally, where the contract furnished no means of determining the separate value of such services.

So, one letting his team for hauling logs, but not performing any labor himself, cannot invoke a statute giving a lien to persons who labor at hauling logs. Richardson v. Hoxie, 90 Me. 227, 38 Atl. 142.

And such a person was denied a lien for the use of the horse, in McMullin v. McMullin, 92 Me. 336, 69 Am. St. Rep. 510, 42 Atl. 500, although he subsequently worked for the person to whom he hired the horse, where such labor was unconnected with the labor of the horse.

A statute providing a lien for the wages of persons employed as laborers on threshing machines gives a lien to one so employed for his personal services, but not for the value of the use of his horses, although the contract is entire. Clark v. Brown, 141 Cal. 93, 74 Pac. 548.

A statute making railroads liable to laborers for work done under the employment of its contractors does not protect a person who furnishes wagons and drivers for hauling materials. Groves v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 57 Mo. 304; Atcherson v. Troy & B. R. Co. 1 Abb. App. Dec. 13; Cummings v. New York & O. M. R. Co. 1 Lans. 68.

Possibly, if he personally labors with one of the teams, he may assert his claim for such personal services. Balch v. New York & O. M. R. Co. 46 N. Y. 521.

And it has been held that although a teamster was a laborer, he was not entitled to a lien for the work of teams owned by him, whether they were furnished in connection with his services or not. To the same effect is Wilson v. Whitcomb, 100 Pa. 547, where a lien for hauling materials was claimed under a statute giving a lien for labor performed on or about an engine house, derrick, etc. Mann v. Burt, 35 Kan. 10, 10 Pac. 95.

Teamsters have been held to be within the meaning of an act concerning the liens of mechanics and laborers. McElwaine v. Hoesy, 135 Ind. 481, 35 N. E. 272. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Under a statute giving a lien to laborers, and declaring that the word "laborers" should be construed to include all persons doing labor or service of whatever character, as workmen or employees, it was held in Watson v. Watson Mfg. Co. 30 N. J. Eq. 588, that a drayman contracting to do all the carting for a manufactory was entitled to a lien not only for his personal services, but for the value of the use of his team and wagon.

It is held in Klondike Lumber Co. v. Williams, 71 Ark. 334, 75 S. W. 854, that a contractor for cutting and hauling timber is not entitled to a lien for the labor of others employed by him, under a statute giving a lien to laborers who perform work and labor, but that he is entitled to a lien for his own actual labor, and for the value of the use of a team and wagon used by him therein.

And a lien for the value of the use of horses, as well as for personal services rendered under an entire contract, was allowed in First Nat. Bank v. Kirkby, 43 Fla. 376, 32 So. 881, under a statute giving a lien to clerks, agents, porters, and other employees of corporations. And see also Klondike Lumber Co. v. Williams, supra.

The court in Hogan v. Cushing, 49 Wis. 169, 5 N. W. 490, is of opinion that one may have a lien for the services of his teams and servants under a statute giving a lien for services and labor, where it is further provided that the lien may be claimed by any company or corporation, which provision, the court thinks, indicates that the statute was intended to embrace services not personally and manually performed. But the court subsequently refused further to extend the construction of the act, holding that a person who let his ox or horse to another, to be used by the latter, and not by himself or his servant, was not entitled to a lien. Lohman v. Peterson, 87 Wis. 227, 58 N. W. 407; Edwards v. H. B. Waite Lumber Co. 108 Wis. 164, 81 Am. St. Rep. 884, 84 N. W. 150. L. A. W.

The legislature used the words "laborers and materialmen" to embrace those who furnished labor as well as those who furnished material.

Continental Improv. Co. v. Phelps, 47 Mich. 299, 11 N. W. 167; Cincinnati, R. & M. R. Co. v. Spera, supra.

Jordan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellees James J. Brennan and Arthur B. Hogue, as plaintiffs below, commenced this action to recover a money judgment, and to enforce a lien against appellant, which is alleged and shown to be a railroad company, duly incorporated and organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of constructing and operating an electric railroad extending from the city of Indianapolis, through several intervening counties to the city of Peru, with certain lateral railroads or lines extending from the city of Kokomo, in Howard county, to the city of Logansport, in Cass county, and also the construction and operation of other electric traction lines from the city of Anderson, and embracing a series of other cities and towns, as mentioned in the amended complaint filed by the aforesaid parties. The complaint is based on a working contract executed by the Indianapolis Northern Traction Company (appellant herein) and the firm of Brennan & Nelson, contractors. By this contract, that firm agreed to install and to complete what is denominated as the "overhead construction" of the railroad in question along that portion of appellant's line which extends from the city of Tipton to the city of Logansport. This work consists of placing poles and trolley wires, and also other wires for the proper transmission of electricity as a motor power, together with all the equipment connected therewith. At the time this action was commenced, Brennan and Hogue had acquired and succeeded to whatever rights the firm of Brennan & Nelson originally had under the contract in question. The plaintiffs, Brennan and Hogue, alleged and claimed that there was due to them, on the contract in suit $15,000. This included certain extra work and labor mentioned in the complaint, and they demanded judgment for that amount, together with a foreclosure of a mechanics' lien, notice of which had been previously filed, as required by law, in the recorder's office of the several counties through which the road extended. Other persons, in addition to appellant, were made codefendants, to answer in respect to their several interests in the lien against the railroad property involved. Among these parties was appellee Jacob N. Bick. He appeared to the action, and on September 16, 1904, filed a cross complaint, consisting of three paragraphs, to which cross complaint the plaintiffs, Brennan and Hogue, and all of Bick's codefendants, were made cross defendants. Bick was the contractor for the construction of the grade of the railroad in question under two working contracts with the Indianapolis Northern Traction Company. One of these contracts bore date of December 6, 1902, and embraced or included that part of the road's grade designated as section 1, station 20, to section 16, station 980. This part extended from a point near the city of Kokomo to the city of Peru. The other contract, known as No. 2, bore date of March 1, 1903, and covered that part of the road between points mentioned as section station 1,100 and section station 1,740, all in Hamilton county, Indiana. Bick, by his cross complaint, sought to recover a remainder alleged to be due to him from appellant, the Indianapolis Northern Traction Company, under contract for the construction of the railroad bridge, as well as other damages alleged to have been sustained by him. He also sought to enforce or foreclose a mechanics' lien to secure the payment of the amount due him. It will be noted that the action was in two branches; one branch based on the complaint of Brennan and Hogue, and the other founded upon the cross complaint of Bick. Under the issues joined, the two branches were tried together. The cause was submitted to the court for trial and a general finding; there being no request by either party for a special finding. Upon evidence given in the cause, the court found that appellees Brennan and Hogue should recover upon their complaint against the Indianapolis Northern Traction Company in the sum of $5,044.88, and further found that they were entitled to be allowed the sum of $1,200 for attorneys' fees, in the aggregate $6,244.88, and that this amount was a lien upon the property described in the complaint, and a foreclosure of the lien was awarded. On the issues joined upon the cross complaint of appellee Bick, the court found that said cross complainant was entitled to recover from the Indianapolis Northern Traction Company the sum of $57,969.02, together with attorneys' fees, making a total amount of $61,969.02. Of the total amount awarded in favor of Bick, the court found that he was only entitled to hold and enforce a lien to the amount of $52,539.34 upon the property described in the cross complaint and that he was entitled to a foreclosure in payment of said sum of $52,539.34, but denied his right to a lien upon the remainder,

$9,429.68. Over a separate motion for a new trial by the Indianapolis Northern Traction Company, wherein it assigned statutory grounds and other reasons, the court rendered its judgment against said traction company in favor of the respective appellees on the above-stated findings. To review this judgment appellant prosecutes this appeal. The Indianapolis Northern Traction Company, separate and apart from its codefendants, assigns errors.

The two branches of the case herein may be said to present two questions in common with each other: First, whether or not, under the statute of the state of Indiana, appellees Brennan and Hogue, and Bick, the cross complainant, could acquire any lien upon appellant's electric railroad; second, whether we will yield to the contention of counsel for appellant, and weigh conflicting evidence given at the trial upon the issues tendered in each branch of the case.

We here state, in substance, what is averred in the three paragraphs of the amended complaint of Brennan and Hogue, upon which their branch of the case was tried.

The first paragraph discloses that, in order for the said contractors successfully to prosecute the work undertaken by them, it was necessary that the railroad company should have all poles and overhead material on hand, ready for use, and the grade prepared, not later than the month of March, 1903; that immediately after entering upon the performance of their contract, these plaintiffs arranged to begin work on or before the aforesaid month of March, and so notified the company; that the latter did not, however, have its poles, grades, and other material in condition for said contractors to proceed until about the 1st of May, 1903, at which time they were notified to have their men at work on the job; that although said contractors complied promptly with the request of the company to begin work, they were constantly impeded, hindered, and interfered with in the performance of their contract by reason of the failure of the company to furnish the necessary poles and materials at the storehouse agreed upon, and by reason of the grade not being finished, and because of the fact that the company's engineer capriciously required the work to be reconstructed after it had been completed in a proper manner; that because of the incomplete condition of the grade, absence of stakes, and other alleged failures on the part of the traction company to put its property in condition for the work of overhead construction, these contractors were put to unreasonable and unnecessary expense in breaking camp from time to time, and moving from one place to another in order to complete the work in fragments, instead of completing it as one continuous line. It is also alleged that the company's engineer in charge of the work "fraudulently" failed to give the contractors estimates on the amount of work performed at the time prescribed by the contract, and that he did so with the intention thereby of compelling these contractors to abandon the work; that finally, on the 27th day of November, 1903, the company served notice upon them (said contractors) that on the 1st day of December, 1903, it would take possession of the uncompleted portion of the work, because the contractors had been negligent in carrying the same forward, and that on said last-mentioned date the company did in fact take charge of and complete the work, excluding the contractors from the performance thereof. It is further averred that from time to time it was developed that there was much of the construction required which was not included under the provisions or terms of the contract, for which said contractors would be entitled to extra compensation; that in view of these conditions, and in view of the necessity of promptly performing said extra work, it was mutually agreed that the performance of the working contract, requiring all orders for such extra work to be reduced to writing, and requiring the contractors to give notice in writing of the amount of extra compensation claimed, should be mutually waived, and that in lieu thereof the engineer in charge would, from time to time, give verbal directions concerning such extra work, which the contractors should thereupon proceed to do, and that the company would pay a fair and reasonable price for the performance of such work; that under the contract as modified the engineer required much extra work to be done, and required statements of its value to be rendered from time to time to the traction company and allowed; that the entire value of the work done under the contract by the contractors amounted to $11,786, of which payment to the amount of $5,583 had been made before the commencement of the action. It is shown that the extra work done for which no compensation had been received was of the value or worth of $2,048.80, and that said company had refused to pay any part of the balance due. It is further disclosed that notice to hold a mechanics' lien upon the property was filed in the offices of the recorders of Howard, Tipton, and Cass counties within the time prescribed by the statute. An additional amount of $5,000 damages is shown as resulting from the delay of the company in failing to have the material on hand, etc., whereby the cost of the work actually done in the completion of the overhead construction was increased to the latter amount. Judgment against the Indianapolis Northern Traction Company was demanded in the sum of $15,000, including attorneys' fees and a foreclosure of the lien in question.

The second paragraph of the complaint alleges substantially the same facts as the first, but does not count upon a mechanics' lien.

The third paragraph is based upon a quantum meruit, charging the performance of certain work and the construction of the overhead system, as shown by a bill of particulars filed, and it is alleged that there is still due plaintiffs for this work $9,000 in addition to $2,000 attorneys' fees. A foreclosure of the lien against the property is prayed for, as in the first paragraph of the complaint.

The three paragraphs of the cross complaint of Bick may be summarized as follows:

The first is based on the working contract of December 6, 1902. Among other things, it is averred that it was stipulated in the contract that the work in question should commence on or before the first week in March, 1903, and be completed on or before the 1st day of July of the same year. It was provided that if there should be any delay on account of the failure of the traction company to procure all necessary rights of way, said contractor should have a reasonable time to complete the work after the necessary rights of way had been acquired; that said contractor was put in possession of the same, and that he commenced his work in season, and carried the same forward vigorously until its completion on the 1st day of January, 1904. It is charged that, by reason of the neglect and default of the company in procuring the rights of way, and in failing to put him in possession of portions thereof until the middle of November, 1903, he was put to additional expense in having to use picks, shovels, and dynamite to explode and excavate large quantities of frozen earth; that it became necessary to, and he did, clear 25.37 acres of land, which work was worth $20 per acre; that he grubbed 22.30 acres, which was reasonably worth $35 per acre, and that it became necessary for him to use, and that he did use, as authorized under the contract, certain quantities of tile of different sizes, all of which are duly set forth in the pleading; that he performed certain other extra work, known as the "force account," the aggregate value of which was $2,051.64, and it was necessary in the completion of his work to, and he did, excavate material classified by said 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

contract as earth to the amount of 134,341 cubic yards; that the "overhaul" necessary to be done, and which was done by him, amounted to 1,867,543 cubic yards, aggregating, at the contract price, the sum of $18,675.43; that he excavated 16,616.3 cubic yards of material which was classified as loose rock under the contract, the excavation of which was worth $1 per cubic yard, and he excavated 75,168 cubic yards, classified under said contract as loose rock, which was worth 70 cents per cubic yard; that the total sum accruing to him by reason of doing said work is $122,851.13, a part of which has been paid, leaving a remainder or balance of $61,513.28 due and unpaid. It is further shown that the partial estimates which were made from time to time during the progress of the work, as provided by the contract, were grossly erroneous in this: That the overhaul was estimated only at 1,347,380 cubic yards, for which he was allowed only $13,473.08; that the chief engineer of the traction company, during the progress of the work was a stockholder in, and an officer and employee of, said company; that said engineer, in estimating the quantity of, and in determining what was, "overhaul" within the meaning of the tests and terms agreed upon in the contract, acted erroneously, fraudulently, arbitrarily, and with great abuse of judgment and discretion. It is further shown that such engineer failed and neglected, "in determining the overhaul," to apply the test prescribed by the contract, but that he arbitrarily, purposely, and with intent to injure said contractor, failed to classify as overhaul that which clearly was such by the terms of the contract; that he grossly erred and underestimated the quantity of overhaul made by plaintiff; that he also neglected and refused to carefully and honestly estimate the loose rock excavated; that he purposely and wrongfully estimated the quantity of loose rock to be only 5,505 cubic yards, and only allowed 35 cents per cubic yard for excavating the same. The provisions of the contract under which it is charged in the complaint plaintiff was entitled to the classification insisted on by him are set forth and embodied in the complaint. It is further shown that the classification made by said engineer, as well as the computation of overhaul, was so made over the protest of said contractor, and that because of the bias, interest, ignorance, fraud, mistake, and dishonesty of the engineer, as charged, such classification and estimates are void, and in no manner binding upon the contractor. It is further shown that notice of said cross complainant's intention to hold a lien upon the railroad in the several counties mentioned was filed in the manner and at the places prescribed by the statute. The prayer is for judgment against the traction company in the sum of $75,000 and a foreclosure of the lien.

The second paragraph of the cross complaint relies upon the same contract, and is quite similar to the first, except that it is alleged therein that part of the contract is reduced to writing, and that part remained in parol.

The third paragraph recites the history of the traction company's organization substantially as in the other paragraphs, but is founded upon the contract of March 1, 1903, which is denominated contract No. 2. This contract embraces certain grade construction of appellant's road in Hamilton county, and it is averred that by its terms the cross complainant, as contractor, agreed to furnish all the materials, except bridges, and prepare the grade for the construction; that he was to receive 20 cents per cubic yard for all earth excavated between certain stations therein mentioned, and 32½ cents for the earth excavated between certain other stations therein named. It is charged that in case it became necessary to haul the earth or other material excavated more than 500 feet, then said contractor was to receive the additional sum of 1 cent per cubic yard for every 100 feet such material was hauled in excess of 500 feet, that he was to receive $20 per acre for grubbing, and that for all tile he was to receive the prices therein named. It is shown that it was stipulated in this contract that the work was to be commenced in fifteen days from the date of notice of the chief engineer, and was to be completed on or before July 1, 1903, provided, that if there was any delay due to the failure of the traction company to procure necessary rights of way in time for the performance of the work, the period should be extended a reasonable time after such rights of way were procured. It is further alleged that such contractor commenced his work at the proper time, prosecuted the same vigorously, but, by reason of the numerous delays on the part of the traction company, he was unable to complete such work before January 1, 1904, at which time such work was completed and accepted by the company; that in the necessary completion thereof he was required to, and did, clear and grub a certain amount of land therein mentioned, and that he used certain quantities of tile of various sizes, and that he was compelled to perform certain extra amounts of work in excavating the pole lines for the traction company, which work was worth $934. It is alleged that he excavated 57,959 cubic yards of material classified as earth, at the price of 32½ cents per cubic yard, and 61,626 cubic yards of earth at 20 cents per cubic yard. That the amount of overhaul necessary to be done was 311,904 cubic yards, which aggregated, under the contract, a price of $3,119. That he performed certain other extra work at the Atlanta overhead station, amounting to 1,722 cubic yards at 20 cents per cubic yard, and that he performed other extra work known as "force account" to the amount of $92.30. It is shown that he performed all of the conditions of the contract upon his part. The total value of the work done amounted to $35,901.18, upon which he has been paid $26,744.15, leaving a balance of $9,157.03, due and unpaid. That the partial estimates made from time to time, as provided by the contract, were erroneous in this: That he was only allowed $2,252, for the overhaul, estimated at 225,222 cubic yards. That the estimates made were further wrong, in that the engineer of the company estimated the earth excavated at 56,581 cubic yards at 31½ cents per cubic yard, and 47,783 cubic yards at 20 cents per cubic yard, instead of the true amount as hereinbefore alleged. It is charged, as in the other paragraphs, that the engineer was a stockholder and officer and employee of the traction company, and that all of the errors of which the cross complainant complains were the result of gross negligence, fraud, and abuse of discretion; that these estimates and classifications were made over the protest of such contractor, and are not binding upon him by reason of their fraudulent character as therein alleged. 'It is further shown that the filing of he cross complainant's intention to hold the statutory lien was duly filed and recorded as provided by law. The prayer is for judgment for $10,000 and attorneys' fees and foreclosure of the lien.

Among the first points or propositions advanced by appellant's counsel for a reversal of the judgment is that § 12 of the mechanics' lien act of 1883 (Acts 1883, chap. 115, p. 143), as amended in 1889 (Acts 1889, chap. 123, p. 258; Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, § 8305), so far as it attempts to create a lien against railroad property in favor of contractors who neither furnish material nor personally perform any labor, is, under article 4, § 19, of the state's Constitution, invalid, because contractors cannot be said to be embraced in the title of the original act of 1883, supra. What is known as the "mechanics' lien act of 1883," supra, is entitled, "An Act Concerning Liens of Mechanics, Laborers, and Materialmen." Section 12 of the above-entitled act, as originally enacted, declares that "all persons who, by contract with any railroad corporation . . . shall perform labor or furnish material for any such corporation . . . in the way of grading, building embankments, or making excavations for the construction of any such railroad or railroads, or who shall build or repair bridges, etc., shall have a lien," etc. The latter section appears to have been twice amended, once in 1885 (Acts 1885, chap. 99, p. 236), and again in 1889 (Acts 1889, chap. 123, p. 258), but there has been no amendment to the title of the statute, and, whatever attempts the legislature may have made by subsequent amendments to extend or broaden the provisions of the act as it was originally enacted, all appear to have been made without any change or amendment of the original title. This section, as it appears in the amendatory act of 1889, which is § 8305, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, and upon which appellees in this case seek to base their right to a lien upon the railroad property in question, reads as follows: "All persons who shall perform work or labor in the way of grading, building embankments, making excavations for the track, building bridges, trestlework, works of masonry, fencing, or any other structure, or who shall perform work of any kind in the construction or repair of any railroad, or part thereof, in this state; and all persons who shall furnish any material for any such bridge, trestlework, work of masonry, fence, or other structure, or who shall furnish any material for use in the construction or repair of any railroad, or part thereof, in this state, whether such work or labor be performed or such material furnished in the pursuance of a contract with the railroad corporation building, repairing, or owning such railroad, or whether such work or labor be performed or material furnished in pursuance of a contract with any person . . . engaged as . . . contractor, subcontractor, . . . [etc.], may have a lien to the extent . . ."

The question, as raised and presented by counsel for appellant, is that the title of the mechanics' lien statute of 1883 is not broad enough, under the constitutional provision to which we have referred, to authorize thereunder legislation providing a lien in favor of "contractors," who do not personally perform the labor in the construction of a railroad, and that therefore the provisions of § 12, hereinbefore set out, must be confined or limited to persons who themselves actually perform such labor, and that the term "laborers," as employed in the title, cannot be held to extend to or embrace contractors who undertake the work of building or constructing a railroad. This question, so far as we are able to discover, appears to be raised and presented for the first time in this appeal. Each of the contracts in this case executed by the railroad company and appellee Bick, reads in part as follows: "This agreement, made and concluded [here the date is stated] by and between J. N. Bick of the first party, hereinafter called 'contractor,' and the Indianapolis Northern Traction Company, of the second party, hereafter called 'company,' bear witness as follows: First. The contractor, in consideration of the prices hereinafter agreed to be paid to him by the company, hereby undertakes and agrees to do and perform, to the satisfaction and acceptance of the chief engineer of the company, all of the grubbing, clearing, grading, and to furnish all materials, and to do and supply all other things requisite and necessary to complete the roadbed, with the exception of the permanent bridges and masonry, and prepare the same ready for receiving the superstructure upon that portion of the railroad known and designated as section, etc. Such work shall be finished in the best and most workmanlike manner, and shall be constructed of the best materials of their several kinds, and all in conformity with the annexed specifications and conditions and proposals, which are hereby expressly made a part of this contract," etc. The contract for the overhead line construction of appellant's road, as entered into between it and Brennan & Nelson, is as follows: "This agreement made this 15th day of December, 1902, between the Indianapolis Northern Traction Company, hereinafter referred to as the 'company,' and Brennan & Nelson, hereinafter referred to as 'contractor,' witnesseth. The contractor does hereby covenant promise, and agree, for the consideration hereinafter named, to do all work, deliver all materials, for erecting, complete in place, the work described, all in accordance with the specifications and drawings referred to herein and hereunto attached, in a proper, thorough, and workmanlike manner, and under the direction and to the satisfaction of the company's engineer," etc. As shown by these contracts and the evidence in this case, appellees undertook to perform the construction of the parts of appellant's railroad as provided by the contracts, not merely as laborers, but wholly as contractors, the work of such construction being let to them by the railroad company under the aforesaid mentioned contracts; such work being performed by persons whom appellees hired or engaged as their employees to carry out their contracts.

An examination of the title in controversy discloses that it advises or indicates that the object of the legislation proposed by the legislature is to deal only with liens pertaining to three classes of persons, viz., "mechanics, laborers, and materialmen." The title is expressed or stated in explicit language, and it is quite evident that thereby it was the intention of the legislature to tie down or limit the proposed legislation thereunder to the liens of mechanics, laborers, and materialmen. It so explicitly expresses the whole purpose of the legislation as to bring it within the maxim that the expression of one thing excludes all others. Under the circumstances, therefore, it is not within the province of a court to extend the legislation under such a title so as to embrace liens in favor of persons who do not fairly come within the meaning or scope of the title in controversy. Mewhert v. Price, 11 Ind. 199; Voss v. Waterloo Water Co. 163 Ind. 60, 66 L.R.A. 95, 106 Am. St. Rep. 201, 71 N. E. 208, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 978; State ex rel. Western Constr. Co. v. Clinton County, 186 Ind. 162, 198, 76 N. E. 986; State v. Dorsey, 167 Ind. 199, 78 N. E. 843. In considering the question as to whether appellees' right to the liens herein involved can be upheld under § 8305, Burns's Anno. Stat. supra, we must first determine whether the legislature, in enacting the mechanics' lien law of 1883, intended to extend its protection to contractors of the class to which appellees belong, or, in other words, to persons who, under their contracts, furnish the labor and services of others in performing or carrying out the work which they have contracted to do. The act herein in question, being remedial in its character, should, as to all persons who come within its provisions, be accorded a liberal construction. But, as it is in derogation of the common law, the liberal rule of construction does not apply in determining what persons come within the statute, but, in respect to this question, a court must indulge in a strict construction; for, as said in Morris v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 123 Ind. 489, 24 N. E. 335: "Courts must construe and enforce the statute as a remedial one, but they cannot extend it to meet cases not within its scope, however meritorious they may be." See 2 Jones, Liens, 2d ed. § 1554; Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, 3d ed. §§ 18, 19; Boisot, Mechanics' Liens, § 34, 37; Cincinnati R. & M. R. Co. v. Spera, 36 Ind. App. 315, 319, 73 N. E. 293, and authorities there cited.

The next inquiry is, What is meant or intended by the term "laborer," as employed in the title of the act? While this term is found in the title, nevertheless its meaning must be tested and determined by the same rule which would be applicable if it were contained in the body of the statute. It is a well-settled canon of construction in this state that words or terms employed in an act of the legislature will be interpreted or construed in their plain, popular, and usual meaning, unless such a construction will manifestly result to defeat the intent of the legislature. Massey v. Dunlap, 146 Ind. 350, 44 N. E. 641. It is evident, we think, that if we are guided by this well-recognized rule in the interpretation of the term "laborers," as used in the title, we will not, in so doing, defeat the legislative intent. It certainly may be asserted, as there is nothing appearing to the contrary, that the word "laborers" was used by the legislature in the common or popular meaning usually accorded to it by lexicographers as well as by the courts in their interpretation of such term contained in statutes of similar import as the one herein involved. The policy of the legislation enacted under the title in question was to protect a class of persons commonly known as "mechanics" and "laborers," who themselves, generally speaking, perform the work or labor which they have contracted to do; or, in other words, persons who, by the force of their circumstances, depend for their daily or present support upon the wages or compensation received by them for their labor, and to whom for that reason, among others, the legislature deemed it proper to award a lien to secure the payment of the wages or compensation earned by them. It is clear, we think, that by the term "laborers" in the title of this act, the legislature did not contemplate or intend to extend the legislation so as to include a class of persons known as "contractors," who usually perform or carry into effect the work which they have undertaken, not by their own labor, but by means of the services of employees, from whose labor they expect to, and generally do, make or secure a profit. In § 1630, 2 Jones on Liens, the author says: "The right conferred by a lien in favor of laborers is personal, and cannot be availed of by one who furnishes labor." In respect to the definition of the term "laborer," see Century Dictionary, under the caption of "laborer," and vol. 2, Bouvier's Law Dictionary, p. 99. That statutes conferring lien rights upon laborers cannot be held to apply to or include contractors, such as appellees in this case appear to be, is well sustained by the following cases: Raynes v. Kokomo Ladder & Furniture Co. 153 Ind. 315, 318, 54 N. E. 1061; McElwaine v. Hosey, 135 Ind. 481, 35 N. E. 272; Anderson Driving Park Asso. v. Thompson, 18 Ind. App. 458, 459, 48

In Aikin v. Wasson, supra, the court of appeals in New York held that a contract or for the construction of a part of a railroad was not a laborer or servant within the provisions of the statute making stockholders of a railroad corporation personally liable for the debts due or owing to any of its laborers or servants for services performed for such corporation. In Wakefield v. Fargo, supra, the court held that a person employed by a corporation at a yearly salary as a bookkeeper and general manager was not a laborer within the provisions of the same statute in New York. The view entertained by the court of appeals in this latter case is quoted with approval in Raynes v. Kokomo Ladder & Furniture Co. 153 Ind. 315, 54 N. E. 1061. The question there was whether appellant, who was the general manager of appellee company, was entitled to the lien secured by the provisions of §§ 7058, 7255, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1894. The court, in considering the provisions of those sections, said: "The persons to whom such liens and preferences are secured . . . are mechanics and laborers employed about any shops, etc., who perform manual and mechanical labor. A general manager is not included either in the letter or spirit of these enactments. In speaking of the kind of services which entitled the laborer to the benefit of a similar statute, it is said in Wakefield v. Fargo, supra, 'that he who performs them must be of a class whose members usually look to the reward of a day's labor or service for immediate or present support, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

from whom the company does not expect credit, and to whom its future ability to pay is of no consequence.' " Rogers v. Dexter & P. R. Co. supra, involved the construction of a statute which imposed a liability on the railroad companies to pay for the work of "laborers" employed in the building of railroads of such railroad companies. The court in that appeal held that the provisions of this statute did not apply to a subcontractor who personally performed labor along with other men employed by him in the construction of a railroad section which he had contracted to build. The court, in considering the application of the statute, among other things in its opinion, said: "In the language of the business world, a laborer is one who labors with his physical powers, in the service and under the direction of another, for fixed wages. This is the common meaning of the word, and hence its meaning in the statute. The plaintiff in this case performed his labor in his own business. He was responsible only for the performance of his contract. The means for such performance were of his own choice. He need not personally have performed physical labor at all. He could have employed all, as well as a part, of the necessary labor. What physical labor he did perform was not for wages, but to reduce the expenses and increase the hoped-for profits of his contract. He clearly was not a laborer within the common and statute meaning of the term." In Wentroth's Appeal, supra, the questions arose whether Frederick Snyder, who had performed a certain contract by hiring teams and drivers, but who did no hauling himself, was a laborer within the meaning of a statute which gave a preference to "miners, mechanics, laborers, or clerks for labor or services rendered by them." The court, in that appeal, held that, within the contemplation of the statute, laborers were those who performed, with their own hands, the contract they make with their employers. The court, in passing upon the question, said: "What class of persons was intended to be comprehended by the word 'laborer'? We think this question has been very accurately answered by this court in Seiders's Appeal, 46 Pa. 57. 'By laborers,' says Mr. Justice Woodward, in delivering the opinion of the court, 'we mean those who perform with their own hands the contract they make with the employer.'" The court further said: "It is clear that Frederick Snyder does not fall within this description. The act meant to favor those who earned their money by the sweat of their own brows, not those who were mere contractors to have the work done, and whose compensation was the profit they would realize on the transaction."

Quotations in support of our conclusion might be made from many of the other authorities hereinbefore cited, but to do so is unnecessary, and would only serve to extend this opinion. It must follow, and we so hold, that the term "laborers," as used in the title of the act in question, cannot be interpreted or construed to apply to a class of persons denominated and known as "contractors," and was not so intended by the legislature. Consequently, the provisions of § 8305, Burns's Anno. Stat. supra, must be considered as applying only to, and including, mechanics, laborers, and materialmen, and do not embrace contractors. To construe it so as to include contractors would render it, to this extent, violative of § 19, art. 4, of the Constitution, for the reason that this class of persons is not within the scope of the act of which it forms a part. Counsel for appellees, however, insist that the liens of their clients can be upheld under the provisions of § 8295, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, which is § 1, as amended, of the original mechanics' lien act of 1883, supra. But, so far as this section can be said to have been enlarged by amendment in the attempt to make it apply to and include contractors, it is open and subject to the same constitutional objections. We conclude, for the reasons stated, that appellees are not entitled to the lien and attorneys' fees awarded in their favor by the lower court, and the decree or judgment, to this extent, is erroneous.

Under appellant's second proposition it is argued that, as this is a case of equitable jurisdiction, therefore it is made the duty of this court, by the provisions of the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, chap. 193, pp. 338, 340), to weigh the evidence upon which the case was determined by the trial court. This evidence is embraced in a bill of exceptions, and was given by witnesses who testified ore tenus before the trial court. There appears to be quite a conflict in the evidence upon many of the material points or facts in issue. In fact, it may be said that the testimony of appellant's own witnesses upon some material matters is not fully impressed with harmony, but, to an extent, at least, is conflicting. Appellant's counsel admit in their brief that "there was much conflict in the oral testimony introduced on the trial in the Brennan branch of the case, upon certain incidental questions of fact."

In Parkison v. Thompson, 164 Ind. 609, 73 N. E. 109, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 677, we construed the statute of 1903, and therein held that, in a case in which questions of fact depended for their support upon conflicting oral evidence, we will not, under such circumstances, undertake to reconcile the conflict, and decide upon which side lies the weight of the evidence. It was further affirmed in the latter case that, under the old practice in chancery, before the procedure in cases of law and equity was united by our Civil Code, no oral testimony was heard in equity or chancery cases at the trial, as the testimony in such cases was in the form of depositions taken before a master or some other duly authorized officer. By this procedure the trial court was altogether deprived of the opportunity of seeing the witnesses, and of observing their demeanor and bearing while testifying, and, under the circumstances, occupied no better position for determining the credibility of the witnesses and weighing their evidence than did the supreme court, to which the cause might be removed for review of the questions involved. The holding in Parkison v. Thompson, supra, has been followed and adhered to by this court in the following cases: Hudelson v. Hudelson, 164 Ind. 694, 74 N. E. 504; Ray v. Baker, 165 Ind. 74, 74 N. E. 619; Seiberling & Co. v. Porter, 165 Ind. 7, 74 N. E. 516; Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated Woodworkers' Local Union No. 131, 165 Ind. 421, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 788, 75 N. E. 877, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 829; Tinkle v. Wallace, 167 Ind. 382, 79 N. E. 355. Under the above decisions, the rule that this court will not weigh oral testimony wherein there is a substantial conflict, and determine on which side of the question there is a preponderance, is firmly settled. In such cases, if there is competent evidence to sustain the judgment of the lower court upon all material points, it will not be disturbed upon the weight of the evidence.

The evidence given upon the issues joined between appellant and appellees Brennan and Hogue is quite voluminous, covering, as it does, many pages of the record. It will be noted that these parties in their complaint allege facts to establish that appellant company was in default in the performance of its part of the contract; that it delayed and hindered appellees in carrying out their part of the contract by its failure to have ready the necessary poles, material, and the grades of the railroad, and thereby enable them to commence and complete the overhead work, which they had contracted to do within the period provided in the contract, and upon these facts and others, as averred in their complaint, they based their right of action. The contract under which they were obligated required that all of the work which they had contracted to perform should be completed by August 15, 1903. Certainly, when appellant company obligated these parties to do and finish the work within a fixed period, it was its duty to afford them a fair and reasonable opportunity to begin and complete the work; or, in other words, under the mutual contract entered into between it and them, it became its duty to furnish the required material, secure the right of way, and have the road grade in readiness, as required by the contract, so that appellees, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, might begin and finish the work within the prescribed period without being subjected to unreasonable cost or expenses on account of the default, delays and hindrance of appellant. Its default or failure in these respects would subject it to liability for whatever damages appellees might reasonably sustain on that account. If appellant violated or breached its contract, as alleged, by the defaults, delays, and hindrance charged against it, and thereby prevented appellees from beginning and completing the work which they had contracted to do, the law would hold it liable for the reasonable worth or value of the work which they performed, and also for the loss sustained, if any, on account of their being prevented or not allowed by appellant to complete the work which they had undertaken to perform. French v. Cunningham, 149 Ind. 632, 637, 49 N. E. 797, and authorities there cited; Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Donnegan, 111 Ind. 179, 12 N. E. 153; Lewis v. Atlas Mut. L. Ins. Co. 61 Mo. 534; Minneapolis Mill Co. v. Goodnow, 40 Minn. 497, 4 L.R.A. 202, 42 N. W. 356; Mississippi River Logging Co. v. Robson, 16 C. C. A. 400, 32 U. S. App. 520, 69 Fed. 773. An examination of the evidence most favorable to appellees discloses that it sufficiently sustains the averments of the complaint. It appears from the evidence that the delays and hindrance which appellees encountered in the progress of the work should be imputed to appellant's own default and negligence in the premises. Inasmuch as there is evidence in the case which fully supports the judgment of the court, we are not permitted to disturb it upon the question of its weight. Aside from the question of the mechanics' lien and attorneys' fees awarded to appellees, the judgment in other respects as to them should be affirmed.

We next turn to the consideration of the questions raised by appellant upon the evidence given in the branch of the case relating to appellee Jacob N. Bick. This evidence covers some 3,816 pages of record. Appellant's counsel insist that it is at least our duty, upon this branch of the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

case, to consider and weigh the evidence, for in doing so we will really determine questions of law; i. e., whether, under the classification clause of the specifications which were made a part of the working contract entered into by appellant and appellee, material which, as they claim, is admitted to have been plowed with a 10-inch grading plow with six horses, is loose rock or earth. They assert that the evidence shows that it was the theory of appellee Bick that, "if the plows working in any given material turn only 'one fourth of a furrow,' then the contractor was entitled to have three fourths of the material excavated classified as loose rock, and only one fourth as earth." They argue that under the contract the test of classification is the means employed in the excavation, and not the quantity excavated on a given day.

The evidence shows that the valley of the Wabash river, in Miami county, is inclosed with high banks, dividing the uplands from the lowlands. These banks at irregular intervals are cut by streams flowing from above into the river. Appellant's engineers, in locating the line of the railway in this part of the country, for several miles followed ravines, and located the line diagonally crosswise with these ravines, and thereby made it necessary, in the construction of the road, to make cuts through the hills and fills through the hollows. A long fill appears to have been rendered necessary from the bottom of the hill to the bank of the river opposite the city of Peru. The purpose of so locating the road apparently was to get a lower grade than otherwise could be secured. Appellee, as a contractor, did the grading of over 20 miles of the road. A portion of the work which he performed was between Kokomo and Peru, in Howard and Miami counties. The other portion of the grading was in Tipton and Hamilton counties. For the purpose of carrying forward the work, appellee organized a corps of men and teams, and entered upon the work in the spring of 1902. As the work progressed, he increased his force by adding thereto other employees and teams. At times it appears that he was delayed in the progress of his work by the failure of appellant company to provide the right of way. The right of way immediately north of Kokomo was not secured by appellant company until the beginning of the following winter, and appellee was then directed by the company to do his work immediately, in order that the track of the road might be laid. Appellee, it appears, was delayed by the failures of appellant until cold weather, which froze the ground so hard that it could not be excavated by plowing. The surface of the earth north of Kokomo is black loam, and on account of its being frozen, it became necessary to break it up by blasting, and to use in removing it wagons instead of wheelers, and thereby appellee appears to have incurred extra expenses, on account of money expended by him for powder used in blasting the frozen earth, and the extra labor rendered necessary for this purpose. Under the working contract, he was to be paid only for excavations, and nothing for fills, and if the earth was hauled more than 500 feet away from the part where it was excavated, whether it was wasted or put into fills, overhaul was to be allowed.

It is said by appellee that at the trial there were four questions of fact in issue in regard to the work performed by him on the line north of Kokomo. First, the number of cubic yards excavated in constructing the grades; second, the price for excavating all material that did not come within the class covered by the price fixed at 20 cents per cubic yard; third, as to the amount of overhaul; fourth, extra work, material, and "force account." It is asserted that no question arose in respect to the classification of material excavated on that part of the line south of Kokomo, for the reason that such material was earth only. But there was on this part of the line a dispute as to the amount of extra work, "force account," and overhaul. In respect to these several points, each party introduced many witnesses, including expert accountants, all of whom testified ore tenus. It appears that on the line south of Peru there were six cuts. These were known as, first, Coles No. 1; second, Coles No. 2; third, Redmonds; fourth, Jones; fifth, Geves; sixth, Cassville. The work on this latter part of the road was commenced some time in February, 1903, and was completed the last of the following December. In the performance thereof, appellee employed some 1,200 men, together with 700 teams. All of these, however, were not engaged in work at the same time. Among other things, the contract provided that "all material excavated by the contractor under this contract shall be classified either as earth, loose rock or solid rock, and the chief engineer of the company shall determine how the excavated material shall be classified. In cases of dispute, his finding and decision in the premises shall be conclusive on both parties." One of the clauses in the specifications provides as follows: "There shall be no classification of material of any kind other than earth, loose or solid rock, as provided for in these 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) specifications . . . But this clause of the specifications shall not be construed so as to prevent the application of a percentage system in classifying material, as provided in clause 2 hereof." We find nothing in the contract or the specifications which stipulates specifically what shall be classified as earth. Clause 2 of the specifications provides as follows: "Loose rock shall comprise: First, hard shale or soapstone lying in its original or stratified position, coarse boulders in gravel, cemented gravel, hardpan, or any other material requiring, in the judgment of the chief engineer of the company, the use of the pick and bar, or which cannot be plowed with a strong 10-inch grading plow, well handled, and driven by six good mules or horses. It is to be understood that the plowing test shall apply to all the materials named herein, and that only such material is entirely loose rock which, in the judgment of the chief engineer, it is impracticable to plow at all with a strong 10-inch grading plow, well handled, behind a good six mule or horse team. Any material in which a portion of a day's work in plowing can be done with a strong 10-inch grading plow, well handled, behind a good six mule or horse team, will be classified as a percentage of earth and a percentage of loose rock, the amount of such percentage to be finally determined by the chief engineer of the company."

The further contention of appellant's counsel is that the above provisions of clause 2 of the specifications are shown by the evidence not to have been properly construed or interpreted by the trial court: or, in other words, the contention is advanced that the interpretation or construction accorded to this clause by the company's chief engineer, in classifying the material excavated, was correct, while, on the other hand, the interpretation placed upon it by the trial court was wrong. They further insist that, under the contract, the court did not correctly classify the material excavated on that part of the work north of Kokomo. Paragraph 1 of appellee's cross complaint relies on the written contract of December 6, 1902, while the second paragraph is founded on a contract partly written, but in other respects oral. It is not claimed that any question of classification arose on the third paragraph. Whether the court rendered judgment for the work done north of Kokomo on the first or second paragraph, the record does not disclose. It is evident, under the condition of the record, that we are confronted with the difficulty of determining, first, upon what paragraph, or paragraphs, of the cross complaint, the judgment rests; second, what particular construction the trial court placed upon the above provisions of the contract in respect to classification of material, for the reason that the court's finding is very general, there being nothing therein to appraise us in respect to the amount of material which the court found had been moved by appellee Bick; third, nothing as to price allowed him for moving materials; fourth, nothing in respect to the amount awarded for the extra work and "force account;" fifth, nor for the overhaul. Virtually all that is shown by the general finding or judgment is the total amount awarded in favor of appellee, which, outside of attorneys' fees, is $57,969.07. The provisions of clause 2 of the specifications, stipulating of what loose rock shall consist, may be divided as follows: "Loose rock shall comprise: First, hard shale or soapstone lying in its original or stratified position. Second, coarse boulders in gravel. Third, cemented gravel. Fourth, hardpan. Fifth, or any other material requiring, in the judgment of the chief engineer of the company, the use of the pick and bar. Sixth, or which cannot be plowed with a strong 10-inch grading plow, well handled, and driven by six mules or horses. Seventh. It is to be understood that the plowing test shall apply to all material named herein. That only such material is entirely loose rock which, in the judgment of the chief engineer, is impracticable to plow at all with a strong 10-inch grading plow, well handled, behind a good six mule or horse team. Eighth. Any material in which a portion of a day's work in plowing can be done with a strong 10-inch grading plow, well handled, behind a good six mule or horse team, will be classified as a percentage of earth and a percentage of loose rock, the amount of such percentage to be finally determined by the chief engineer of the company."

S. H. Knight, the chief engineer of appellant's company, testified in its behalf at the trial. The following hypothetical question was propounded to him by appellee's counsel on cross-examination: "Assuming, Mr. Knight, that four or five cuts are to be made, varying in length from 300 to 600 or 700 feet, and varying in depth, say, from 15 to 27 or 28 feet, and that after the first 4 feet of the top soil is taken off, there is encountered a hard soil or clay, interspersed with rocks or boulders, so that, in attempting to plow it, every 5 to 10 feet, with a heavy 10-inch grading plow, drawn by from four to six heavy horses, the plow is turned out by some boulder, or becomes fast under the boulder, so that, when it is fast, there is great difficulty in extracting the plow; that in plowing, or attempting to plow, the plow does not enter the ground more than 3 inches, and often less; that a furrow from 3 to 5 inches wide is turned up, two men riding on the whiffletree, sometimes one man in addition on the plow beam, sometimes one man holding the plow handle, and sometimes two, the dirt hauled off by wheelers, which are very often being tripped by boulders which are being developed by the plowing, heavy boulders, so large that they have to be blown out with dynamite and hauled off by chain, they being so large that a team cannot snake them, but they have to be rolled with a rolling hitch; three or four furrows have to be plowed before the wheeler can attempt to fill at all, then being compelled to go 100 feet, then get one third of a load, being compelled to go to the fill that way because they could not get enough dirt in front of the wheelers to shove the dirt back into the wheelers,—I wish you to state to the court, you being familiar with the specifications in the contract, and using that knowledge, I wish you to state to the court whether or not any portion of that soil or clay and boulders should be classified as loose rock under the specifications." The answer of the witness to this question was, "On these specifications, I would not." The following hypothetical question was also propounded to him: "Assuming that after the yellow clay is taken off, several feet of it, there was encountered a blue clay a little harder than the yellow, but with comparatively few boulders and stones, and that it was excavated in the same way I have detailed [meaning as detailed in the previous question], except it was not necessary to use dynamite, or pick out the boulders, what would you say as to whether or not any portion of that blue clay should be classified as loose rock under the specifications?" The answer of this witness was, "I would not." There is evidence in the record to establish the facts stated in these questions, and therein assumed to be true, and that material excavated, as therein stated, was classified by the engineer entirely as earth. Counsel for appellee claim, first, that his answers to the above questions clearly show that he placed a wrong legal construction upon the provisions of clause 2 of the specifications hereinbefore set out; second, that his answers to the questions disclose that, upon the subject of classifications, he was so prejudiced against appellee, and in favor of appellant, his employer, and of whose company he was a stockholder, that he was not a fit person to settle the question of classification.

We will hereinafter endeavor particularly to point out wherein, as we believe, the engineer, as shown by his answers to the previous questions, misinterpreted the provisions of the specifications in regard to what material should be classified as loose rock. It is true that there is a provision in the specification in question that the chief engineer of the company should determine how matter excavated should be classified, etc., and his decision, in case of dispute, was to be conclusive on both parties. This provision, however, contemplated, under all circumstances, the exercise of an honest judgment on the part of the engineer upon the matter involved. This court has held that stipulations or provisions of this character cannot operate to deprive the parties of the right to resort to the courts for a redress of wrong, or to a recovery of whatever may be due them. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Donnegan, 111 Ind. 179, 12 N. E. 153; Kistler v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. 88 Ind. 460; Carroll County v. O'Connor, 137 Ind. 622, 35 N. E. 1006, 37 N. E. 16; Fulton County v. Gibson, 168 Ind. 471, 63 N. E. 982; McCoy v. Able, 131 Ind. 417, 30 N. E. 528, 31 N. E. 453. The rule generally affirmed by the authorities is that the measurements, estimates, and classifications of material, in cases where the same is left to the judgment or decision of the engineer, are accepted as prima facie correct, and to that extent are binding upon the parties to the contract, in the absence of fraud or gross or obvious mistake on the part of such engineer, and the burden is upon the party who assails them to establish such fraud or mistake. McCoy v. Able, supra; 3 Elliot, Railroads, §§ 1058, 1059. As previously shown, appellee, under his cross-complaint, assailed the decisions or findings of the chief engineer upon the ground that he acted arbitrarily, and that his judgment was impressed with gross mistakes and fraud. Without regard to the controlling effect which, under any circumstances, might be accorded to the provision or stipulation in the contract concerning the decision of the chief engineer as to estimates, measures, etc., being conclusive in cases of dispute, the provision certainly cannot control in respect to the contract so as to preclude either party from controverting any construction or interpretation which the engineer may have placed upon it, for it is elementary that it is the province of courts to construe contracts. Consequently, as claimed by counsel for appellee, if the engineer misinterpreted or misconstrued the provisions of the contract in his classification of loose rock by applying the "plow test," either to the first, second, third, or fourth clause of the stipulations, as hereinbefore set out, then, under the circumstances, appellee would be entitled in this action to have such errors of the engineer reviewed by the court and corrected. Williams v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. 112 Mo. 463, 34 Am. St. Rep. 403, 20 S. W. 631; Lewis v. Chicago S. F. & C. R. Co. (C.C.) 49 Fed. 708; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1271.

Counsel for appellant contend that the stipulation in clause 7, viz., "It is to be understood that the plowing test shall apply to all material herein named," etc., modifies or destroys the classification of material immediately preceding as specified under clauses 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th; or, in other words, that notwithstanding the provision of the specification by which the contracting parties expressly declared and agreed that "hardpan, coarse boulders in gravel," etc., should be classified as loose rock, nevertheless it was meant and intended that such material was subject to the plowing test provided for by clause 6. The provisions of the specification must be construed together, and given a reasonable interpretation, and they should not be construed in such a manner as to lead to absurdity. By the 2d clause, the parties were dealing with the plowing test as provided by clause 6, next preceding. This test was to apply to all material coming within its meaning; that is to say, as therein provided, only such material was to be considered as entirely loose rock, which, in the judgment of the chief engineer, it was impracticable to plow at all with a strong 10-inch grading plow, well handled, etc., or in other words, impracticable to plow the material, in the judgment of the chief engineer, when the plow test was applied. It is manifest that the latter test was not intended to refer to or control the particular material specified as hardpan, etc., which the parties had already declared should comprise or constitute "loose rock." Under the circumstances, to hold to the contrary would be absurd. We may assume that the appellant and appellee, in entering into the contract, recognized that the materials specified or named in the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th clauses were well-known hard substances, quite difficult to excavate. Therefore they mutually declared that they should be classified as loose rock. Doubtless the parties believed that other hard material might be developed in excavating, and therefore, under the circumstances, the pick and bar test and the plowing test were provided for other hard earth or substance not specifically falling within that mentioned and specified in the preceding clauses.

In Lewis v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. supra, the specification involved was as follows: "Loose rock shall comprise: First, shale or soapstone lying in its original or stratified position, coarse boulders in gravel, cemented gravel, hardpan, or any other material requiring the use of pick and bar, or which cannot be plowed with a strong 10-inch grading plow, well handled, behind a good six mule or horse team." It will be observed that this is virtually the same as the one with which we have to deal. It appears in that case that, as the engineers construed the specification, "shale, cemented gravel, hardpan," etc., were not classified as loose rock unless more than six horses or mules were required to plow such material. The court in that case, in determining whether the engineers had properly construed the specification, said: "After an attentive consideration of the question, the court concludes that the engineers put a wrong construction on the 2d clause of the specifications, in so far as they construed the 'plowing test' to be applicable to shale, soapstone, cemented gravel and hardpan, as well as to other hard earthy substances. The right interpretation of the clause is as follows: Shale, soapstone, cemented gravel, and hardpan were known substances, and were known to be hard to handle. Therefore it was declared that they should be classified as loose rock. And inasmuch as it was thought probable or possible that other hard earths might be encountered in the progress of the work, it was agreed that any other material requiring the use of pick and bar, or that could not be plowed 'with a strong 10-inch grading plow . . . behind a good six horse or mule team,' should likewise be classified as loose rock. This is the correct exposition, and truly expresses the thought in the mind of the draftsman. . . . By far the largest portion of all the material found in the various cuts, except the rock cuts, was broken up, I think, by the use of a team of not more than six horses. Probably that was the most practicable and economical method of working the cuts, as an eight-horse team is usually cumbersome. Nevertheless, if the engineers had classified every cubic yard of earth that was so broken up with six horses 'as earth excavation,' it would not have accorded with the spirit of the contract." . . . In Williams v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. supra, identically the same specification was involved as in the case last cited. In this latter case the plaintiffs claimed, and offered to show, that the engineer had construed hardpan to be loose rock only "when it could not be plowed with a strong 10-inch plow, behind a good six horse or mule team." The plaintiffs further contended that, under this clause of the contract, the classification of hardpan as loose rock was fixed without any reference to the plowing test. The court sustained this contention, saying: "We think the plaintiffs are correct in their interpretation of this clause, and if the engineer did so misconstrue it, he exceeded the power vested in him by the contract, and there is no principle of law or equity that demands that plaintiffs should submit to a misconstruction of their contract which would result in a serious loss to them. The contract fixed certain classifications of material; others it left to the judgment of the engineer." The court further affirmed that plaintiffs were entitled to show, if they could, under their complaint, that the engineer misconstrued the contract in his classification of the loose-rock clause, and had not measured the work according to the contract; that an allegation of fraud was not necessary to entitle them to make such a showing.

The interpretation for which appellee contends of the term "loose rock," as used in the specification in question, is manifested by the statements of facts in the hypothetical question propounded to the chief engineer. Appellant's counsel, however, deny that appellee's contention in respect to the construction is correct within the meaning of the contract, but affirm that the one accorded to it by the chief engineer is right. The infirmity of the interpretation placed upon the specification or contract by appellant's engineer is that it accords neither with its letter nor spirit. We have heretofore, we believe, sufficiently shown that the engineer was wrong in the construction which he accorded to the specification as to how the material mentioned in the hypothetical question should be classified. In addition to this we may say that the provision "any other material . . . which cannot be plowed," etc., must be construed to mean such hard material or substance as cannot be plowed with reasonable facility. The term "plowed" was certainly used in its usual meaning, and must have been so understood by the parties. They did not mean or intend thereby the mere "rooting-up" of the material, or cutting a very shallow furrow, or such plowing as would require men to ride upon the whiffetree and upon the plow beam in order to keep the nose of the plow in the material which was attempted to be plowed. It is not tenable to argue that plowing, within the meaning of the test provided, was accomplished where, as the evidence shows, the material attempted to be plowed was hardpan, or contained many large and coarse boulders and cemented gravel, and that thereby the plow would be frequently turned out of its shallow furrow, and would become fastened beneath the boulders, so that the men handling it would be required to resort to the use of the pick and bar to loosen or extricate it from the boulders; that it required the force of several men to hold the nose or point of the plow in the ground; and that the plow nose or point would be frequently broken by the hardness of the material which was encountered in the progress of the work. Certainly, under these circumstances, it could not in reason be said that such material, within the meaning and spirit of the contract, should be classified as ordinary earth, to be removed by the appellee at 20 cents per cubic yard. A converse view, however, is apparently entertained by appellant. There was no price fixed by the contract for excavating loose rock, and appellee was only entitled to the reasonable value of such work. The value of such work, as shown by the evidence, is far in excess of that provided in the contract for the removal of earth.

Appellee claimed that the only feasible, practicable, and cheapest method of loosening and breaking up much of the material which was encountered in the work in some of the several cuts was by means of a plow, and that only a small portion of it could be removed by the ordinary method employed for removing earth.

After showing the character of the material, the number and size of boulders, and the great labor and difficulty experienced in loosening, excavating, and removing the material in question, and the only practicable method by which it could be broken up, appellee was asked the following questions:

Q. Now, what other method did you adopt there, trying to excavate this earth, except the way you have already detailed?

A. Well, the boys tried to pick it, and tried to blow it out.

Q. How did you pick it?

A. Run a pick down as far as he could drive it, and bring it up; he would just jerk out what was on the pick.

Q. Could he bury the pick in to the handle?

A. It was too hard.

Q. Now, you spoke of blowing up with dynamite?

A. Powder. It would not take any effect on it, just blow out whatever hole they put it in.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Q. Now, you have been a contractor a good many years. Tell the court what method of loosening this earth was there known or available other than to do it with a plow, as you did it.

A Under these conditions nothing more.

Appellee's testimony was supported by many other witnesses. Because he employed the plow as the most feasible and available method of loosening and breaking up the material in controversy certainly affords appellant no room for insisting that such material should be classified entirely as earth, to be paid for 20 cents per cubic yard, mainly for the reason that the excavation thereof was principally done with a plow as the most feasible, practicable, and the cheapest method, as the evidence fully establishes. What appellee did in this respect could not be said to be plowing, but merely, in common parlance, "rooting-out" the boulders, and breaking up the hard substances with a strong grading plow which was used.

Appellee examined many witnesses upon the trial of the cause, some of whom were expert civil engineers. The evidence given by the men employed in excavating and grading appellant's railroad shows that much of the material developed in some of the several cuts was hardpan, and that other parts thereof, to quite an extent, were intermingled with boulders, large and small. The material encountered in the attempt to plow was so hard that sometimes the plow points would only last two or three hours. One witness testified that the material was so hard that he could not drive a harrow tooth down through it; that in his attempt to do so the tooth was bent, although it did not strike any boulder or rock. Others testified that dynamite was employed to break up the material, without much success; that it was useless to try to remove it with a force of ten or twelve horses attached to the plow; that the more horses used in drawing the plow, the more difficult it was for the men to keep the plow in the ground; that all that could be done was simply "to root" along; that six, seven, and sometimes as many as eight horses were used, but on account of the hardness of the material and the many boulders encountered it was found impracticable to use this number of horses. Four horses were all that it was practicable to use or employ with any degree of success in breaking up the material.

It is not necessary that we give the evidence in detail upon the many points in dispute before the trial court, for to do so would, under the circumstances, serve no useful purpose. Suffice to say that the evidence as we find it in the record is ample to sustain the allegations of appellee's cross complaint, and the finding and judgment of the lower court upon all material points. In fact, it may be said that had the court given full credit to the testimony of appellee, it would have been justified in awarding a recovery in his favor of a much larger amount than it found was due to him. As heretofore shown, the contention of appellant's counsel that the lower court erred, upon the ground that it did not adopt the construction of the contract for which they contend, even if true, cannot be sustained. It does not appear that during the progress of the work there was any substantial dispute on the part of appellant's engineer in regard to the estimates and classification of the material to which appellee was entitled. Instead of making estimates and classifications, which, as shown, appellee frequently requested should be done, the engineer merely promised to do so, but failed to carry out his promise. The controversy appears to have arisen after appellee had completed the work and turned it over to appellant company. It appears that he was anxious that estimates and classifications should be made by the company's engineer, in order that he might know what he was being allowed. His pay roll at the time was running high, some weeks to $14,000. He testified that he asked Mr. Knight, the chief engineer, about making estimates and classifications of material excavated, saying to him that he thought the matter ought to be settled so far as the work had progressed, stating to the engineer that the estimates which had been made were "rather shy." The engineer, in reply to this, as shown by appellee's testimony said: "Mr. Bick, my monthly statements are, to a certain extent, guesses; they are approximates only. When you get through with your work, you will have every yard and every yard of overhaul and your proper classification, so don't worry about them. I am going to treat you right." Appellee also appealed to the assistant engineer, who told him that there was a mistake in the overhaul, and that he would make it right next month, and he also promised to see that a detailed statement of the estimates should be furnished to appellee, but this promise was not carried out. Appellee testified that he also had a conversation with Mr. Drum, the general manager, along in August or September, before the work was completed, and informed him that he was getting "pretty rough treatment" as to estimates. In the language of appellee, "I told him my judgment was that I was not getting my yardage, and when was I to get my overhaul up to that time? They had practically allowed me nothing, only a trifle on classification. That I needed the money. That they ought to give it to me. That he ought not to hold it until the job was done. That I ought to receive it as we went along." The general manager said to him in reply to this: "Mr. Bick, these engineers are narrow. It is hard to get a good man. You will come out all right when you get through." This evidence stands undisputed, and at least tends to show, as insisted by appellee, that he was thereby induced to wait until his job was completed in the belief that he would be fairly dealt with and treated at the final settlement. It appears that appellant adopted the method of measurement denominated and known in mathematics as the "prismoidal formula," while the witnesses for appellee, who testified as to the number of yards of material excavated, adopted and used the method known as the "average end area." Expert engineers testified pro and con to the correctness of these two methods. Appellant argues that the court adopted the latter method, but in respect to this contention we are not apprised by the record which method of computation or measurement the court adopted. Therefore the question as to which of these two methods is the most correct is not before us for determination.

It follows from the conclusions which we have herein reached that the judgment below must be in part reversed and in part affirmed. It is therefore ordered that all that part thereof which adjudges and awards a statutory lien in favor of the respective appellees, and attorneys' fees thereon, and a foreclosure of such lien, be reversed, with instructions to the lower court, on motion of appellant, to modify the judgment or decree to that extent. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

Myers, J., did not participate.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Jordan, J., on December 7, 1909, handed down the following additional opinion (—Ind. —, 90 N. E. 65):

Appellants in this appeal have separately petitioned for a rehearing upon the grounds: First, that each of them was entitled to a trial by jury in the lower court; second, that their right to a jury trial was not waived. Appellee Bick has also petitioned for a rehearing of this case, so far as may be necessary for the court to amend and modify its judgment, and thereby fully sustain and affirm the judgment and decree of the Howard circuit court. He claims that, if he is not entitled to a lien as a contractor under the act of 1883 (Acts 1883, chap. 115, p. 140), this right thereto is saved and awarded to him by virtue of an act of March 10, 1873 (Acts 1873, chap. 78, p. 187), entitled, "An Act to Give Security to Persons Who Contract with Railroad Corporations to Perform Work and Labor in the Construction of Railroads," which act he claims has never been repealed, but is in full force and effect. Other attorneys, on behalf of parties interested in like cases, in upholding their right to a lien as contractors, in briefs filed herein, criticize the decision as not being supported by the authorities cited, etc. The arguments in the main advanced by appellants for a rehearing are: First, that the decision in this appeal denies to them the right of a trial of the cause by jury,—a right, as they properly claim, guaranteed under the state's Constitution; second, that there should be a reversal of the judgment in its entirety, and a new trial ordered, and the cause remanded to the lower court, in order that they may be afforded an opportunity to demand a trial by jury as a matter of right. It is further contended that, during the progress of the trial below, appellants were not in a situation to have properly demanded a trial by jury, for, inasmuch as this suit is to foreclose a statutory lien, it, under our decisions, was of equitable cognizance, and therefore triable by the court; that therefore, under the circumstances, a trial by jury could not be demanded as a matter of right, and to have requested the lower court to submit the cause to a jury would have been but a useless formality. They further argue: That they demurred to the complaint for insufficiency of facts, which demurrer was overruled, to which ruling they excepted; that they objected to the introduction in evidence of the notice in respect to the lien sought to be enforced by appellee; that by these affirmative acts on their part they raised the question of their right to a trial by jury; and that such right was by these acts clearly preserved. It is not claimed, however, that they demanded or made any request whatever in the lower court for a jury trial, and there is no ruling of the court in denying any such demand or request assigned in the motion as a reason for a new trial.

Appellants, in their contention that, by the demurrer to the complaint and objection to the introduction of the notice of the lien in evidence, they raised and preserved the right to a jury trial, are clearly mistaken in their view of the question. In fact, the only point presented by the demurrer, and determined by the court in its ruling thereon, was that the complaint stated a cause of action. If the complaint, independently of appellee's right to the lien in controversy, sufficiently stated a cause of action to entitle him to a personal judgment, then the demurrer was properly overruled. Our cases generally affirm that, if a complaint is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to any of the relief demanded, a demurrer thereto should be overruled. Linder v. Smith, 131 Ind. 147, 30 N. E. 1073; Yorn v. Bracken, 153 Ind. 492, 55 N. E. 257; Chicago & S. E. R. Co. v. Woodard, 159 Ind. 541, 65 N. E. 577; Oolitic Stone Co. v. Ridge, 169 Ind. 639, 642, 83 N. E. 246. See also Shepardson v. Gillette, 133 Ind. 125, 31 N. E. 788; United States Sav. Fund & Invest. Co. v. Harris, 142 Ind. 226, 40 N. E. 1072, 41 N. E. 451.

Opposing counsel insist that appellants waived their right to a jury trial by submitting the cause to the court without requesting or demanding that they be awarded a jury, and in not interposing any objections to the submission of the cause to the court for trial. It is insisted that an entry of record in this case fully discloses that appellants consented to the submission of the cause to the court for trial, and that thereby a jury trial was expressly waived. This entry is as follows: "Come the parties by counsel, and this cause being at issue and called for trial, the same is now submitted to the court for trial, without the intervention of a jury." As preliminary, we may say that we might properly deny appellants' petition for a rehearing on the ground that they are not in a position to have a review of the question which they present at this stage of the case; but as their counsel assert that it is one which is before this court for the first time, and as they evince much earnestness in their argument, we have concluded to consider their points, and herein give our reasons to show that their contentions or arguments in support of the petition are untenable. The question then is: Did appellants, in the lower court, either expressly or impliedly waive their right to a trial by jury?

Section 20 of our Bill of Rights declares that "in all civil cases the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." That this right in all civil cases where it exists may be waived by a party entitled thereto is not disputed. Section 576, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, provides the manner by which parties in a civil action may expressly waive their right to a jury trial: First, by failing to appear at the trial; second, by a written consent, in person or by attorney, filed with the clerk; third, by the oral consent in open court, entered on the record. That this right may also be impliedly waived by a party failing at the proper time to make a demand or request for trial by jury is a proposition well settled by repeated decisions of this court. Madison & I. R. Co. v. Whiteneck, 8 Ind. 217; Burgess v. Matlock, 12 Ind. 357; Sprague v. Pritchard, 108 Ind. 491, 9 N. E. 416; Jarboe v. Severin, 112 Ind. 572, 14 N. E. 490; Sheets v. Bray, 125 Ind. 33, 24 N. E. 357; Blair v. Curry, 150 Ind. 99, 46 N. E. 672, 49 N. E. 908; Boonville Nat. Bank v. Blakey, 166 Ind. 427, 76 N. E. 529. In Madison & I. R. Co. v. Whiteneck, supra, this court said: "If a party voluntarily abstains from claiming the right of trial by jury in a given case, it may be judicially held that it is waived." In Jarboe v. Severin, supra, the court said: "Where a party does not ask for a trial by jury, nor object to a trial of the cause by the court, with a jury as advisory merely, it is too late to object on appeal to the mode of the trial." In Sheets v. Bray, supra, the court said: "Where the right to a trial by jury exists, and no request is made for the same, it will be considered as waived." In Blair v. Curry, supra, it is said: "A jury trial is waived by a failure to demand it at the time of the trial." In Boonville Nat. Bank v. Blakey, supra, this court, after considering the manner by which a jury may be waived, as provided by § 576, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, said: "While it does not admit of doubt that there may be an implied waiver of the right of a jury trial, yet such waiver will not be predicated upon a doubtful implication." Or, in other words, where the waiver is predicated upon implication, the intention of the party to waive his right to a jury should be clearly manifested. In Goodwin v. Hedrick, 24 Ind. 121, this court held that an agreement to refer a cause to a referee for hearing was totally inconsistent with a submission to a jury, and was therefore a waiver of a jury trial. See also Taylor v. First Cong. Church, 7 Ind. App. 388, 34 N. E. 655; Whitestown Mill. Co. v. Zahn, 9 Ind. App. 270, 36 N. E. 653.

In Hauser v. Roth, 37 Ind. 89, the appellant was present in court by his counsel when the cause was ordered to be referred to a master in chancery to find the facts and report his finding to the court. Appellant in that case was ordered by the court to furnish the master with a bill of particulars, and with this order he complied. He was also present in court by counsel when the master filed his report, which was ordered to be spread of record. The appellant, as it appears, in that appeal, interposed no objections to the reference of the cause to a master, and made no objections to the court's order at any stage of the proceedings. After the filing of the master's report, containing the finding, appellant then demanded a trial by jury; but his demand was overruled, to which ruling he excepted. In reviewing the question, on appeal, as to whether he had waived his right to a trial by jury, under the facts in that case, this court, after quoting from the provisions of the Civil Code of 1852, which provided the mode by which a jury trial might be waived (being the same provisions now embraced in § 576, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, supra), held that the appellant, in not objecting to the order of the court in submitting the cause to a master in chancery for a finding, must be presumed to have given his oral consent in open court, which was entered of record, and that thereby he waived a jury trial within the spirit of the third mode provided by § 576, supra. The court, speaking by Worden, J., said: "Here it will be seen that the parties were in court at the time the court made the order referring the cause to the master, and requiring the appellant to furnish him with a bill of the particulars of the items of account claimed in his answer. . . . The appellant, by his attorneys, was present when the order was made, and submitted, not only to the order of reference, but to the order requiring him to furnish the master with the specified bill of particulars, making no objection thereto whatever. He must be presumed, therefore, to have consented. If he had required a trial by jury (a mode entirely inconsistent with a reference of the cause to a master), he should then have objected to the reference." The decision in the Hauser Case upon the question involved is quite applicable to the one in the case now before us. Appellants, at the time this cause is shown to have been submitted to the court for trial without the intervention of a jury, were present on court by counsel, and, as nothing to the contrary appears, it must be presumed that the entry of record in respect to the submission of the cause to the court was predicated upon the oral consent of appellants and appellees, and thereby falls within the third mode prescribed by § 576, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, supra, and must be held or considered as an express waiver of a jury trial by appellants and appellees, and consequently appellants cannot be heard to say that they were in any manner denied the right by the court to a trial by jury. It is a well-settled rule, recognized by our decisions, that where a party is in court in person or by counsel, and an opportunity is afforded him at the proper time to assert or reserve his legal right or rights, his failure or neglect to do so is deemed and considered as a waiver of such right or rights. Zehnor v. Beard, 8 Ind. 96; Preston v. Sandford, 21 Ind. 156, and authorities there cited; Adams v. Whitley County, 164 Ind. 108, 72 N. E. 1029, and authorities there cited.

There certainly is no merit in the argument advanced by appellants' counsel, that as this suit involved the foreclosure of a statutory lien, and therefore of equitable jurisdiction, or, in other words, triable by the court, and not as a matter of right by jury, consequently they were not in a position or situation to demand a jury, and to have interposed such a demand would have been an idle formality and of no avail. Appellants were bound to know what were their legal rights and to have properly asserted them. Their counsel in this appeal successfully raised the question that appellee was not, under the law, entitled to the lien which he sought to have enforced. We have no reason to presume that they were not impressed with the same view of the law when the cause was submitted to the court for trial. Under the circumstances, appellants' counsel are not warranted in their contention that to have demanded a jury in the case would have been of no avail. Conceding that the lower court possibly might have denied this demand, still this would not have rendered it unavailable to appellants, for had the record disclosed that a demand or request for a trial by jury had been made at the proper time, but was overruled by the court, and that such ruling was assigned as a reason in the motion for a new trial, then, upon reaching the conclusion, as we did, that, under the law, appellee had no right to the lien which he claimed, we would have considered no other question raised in the case; but, for the error of the court in refusing a jury trial, we would have ordered a reversal of the judgment as a whole, and have remanded the cause to the lower court for a new trial, with instructions to grant appellants' demand for a trial by jury, and for further proceedings.

The claim is advanced by appellants to the effect that, because the court, instead of a jury, was permitted to try and determine the cause, it was therefore tried upon the wrong theory, to their injury; hence, for this court to affirm as correct the action of the trial court in rendering a personal judgment, it must be made affirmatively to appear that substantial justice was done in the trial below. Or, in other words, even if remanded for a new trial, a jury will be compelled to reach the same conclusion as that arrived at by the trial court. This 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) contention is certainly untenable and devoid of merit. If the contention be true in respect to the wrong theory arising out of the trial by the court, then, under the circumstances, it may be said that appellants aided and helped to bring about or create this wrong theory by their failure to demand a jury trial, and consenting to the submission of the cause to the court, thereby giving the lower court to understand that they entertained the view that, under the law, the case was not triable by jury as a matter of right. The parties undoubtedly, in the lower court, acted upon the assumption that the issues were triable by the court, without the intervention of a jury, and certainly neither party will be permitted to shift or depart from this theory upon appeal to this court. Elliott, App. Proc. § 490.

The decision in the appeal of Shaw v. Kent, 11 Ind. 80, so far as it can be said to hold that a trial by jury can only be waived by a party by some one of the modes prescribed by § 576, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, is inconsistent with the holding of this court in its many decisions to which we have referred, and upon this point Shaw v. Kent, supra, has been, at least impliedly, overruled, and no longer can be considered as an authority.

By reading the original opinion, it will be seen that we did not hold that § 12 of the act of 1883, as amended, was invalid; but the holding was that its provisions did not embrace or apply to contractors such as was appellee Bick, and that to construe it so as to make it apply to and include him would render it antagonistic to § 19 of article 4 of the Constitution, for the reason that contractors of his class or grade were not within the scope of the act as originally entitled. To the many authorities cited in our opinion, we may now add § 157 of Phillips on Mechanics' Liens, wherein the author says: "But when we study the legislative intention in the enactment of a law granting those who work chiefly through physical means certain privileges, it is possible to see that the term 'labor' is used in a restricted sense, and not in its broad and comprehensive meaning. The object of the lien laws, now almost universal, is not doubtful, on authority, at least. One purpose may have been to protect the laboring man—the man whose subsistence depends on the wages earned by his own manual labor—from the reckless improvidence of his employer, and to furnish him with ample security for his earnings, which ordinarily he could not successfully demand. If this was the intention of the legislature in the passage of the law in question, then it follows that it does not apply to contractors employing men and teams to cut and haul timber, doing no manual labor themselves, and deriving their compensation from the profits realized. Most of the authorities that we have examined support this view of the law, except in cases where, from the wording of the statutes, a different intention clearly appeared."

In opposing the contention of appellee Bick, that he has the right to have and enforce a lien under the act of 1873, supra, counsel for appellants insist that his intention cannot be sustained: First, because that act was repealed by the act of 1883; second, that, if not repeated, nevertheless appellee Bick and his coappellees are not embraced within its provisions. We pass, without deciding, the question raised in respect to the repeal of this statute, and consider the second point advanced by appellants' counsel. The act of 1873, supra, is entitled, "An Act to Give Security to Persons Who Contract with Railroad Corporations to Perform Work and Labor in the Construction of Railroads." It will be observed that the persons mentioned in the title are those who, contract to perform work and labor. The 1st section of the act, under the provisions of which a lien is awarded, provides that "all persons who, by contract with any railroad corporation or company, shall perform work or labor for any such corporation or company in the way of grading, building embankments, or making excavations for the track of any railroad . . . shall have a lien upon such grading, embankment, or excavation. . . ." It is manifest, we think, that this section, so far as it professes to apply to or include persons entitled to its benefits is no broader than § 12 of the act of 1883, and cannot be said to create a right to a lien upon the property of appellant railroad company in favor of appellee. Neither the title nor the body of the act of 1873, supra, can be held to contemplate or apply to a contractor like appellee, or, in other words, a person to whom the work of construction of a railroad is let, and who, in carrying out his contract, performs no manual labor himself, but, as the authorities assert, employs men and teams in the performance of his contract, and "derives his compensation from the profits realized." By the plain language of the statute of 1873, the right to a lien is limited or confined to all persons who by contract (either express or implied) "perform work or labor," etc.

It follows that each of the petitions of appellants and the petition of appellee Bick for a rehearing should be overruled, which is, accordingly, ordered.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

OCEOLAR ROBBINS

v.

LEWISTON, AUGUSTA, & WATERVILLE STREET RAILWAY.

Master — incompetent servant — disobedience of orders.

1. A servant who repeatedly violates different rules of the master, and disobeys different express orders, is legally incompetent; and if the master continues to employ him with knowledge of such incompetence, he will be liable for injuries to other employees through such disobedience of orders.

Evidence — incompetency of servant — sufficiency.

2. Evidence of specific acts of negligence on the part of an employee, tending to show his incompetence, by which the master had actual knowledge, or, by the exercise of due care, should have had such knowledge, is admissible on the question of incompetence and knowledge, in an action to hold the master liable for injury to an employee through a negligent act of the one alleged to be incompetent.

Same — complaints of incompetency — admissibility.

3. Evidence of a conversation between a person injured while alighting from an electric car, and officers of the railway company, bearing upon the question of the negligence of the motorman, is admissible to show knowledge of his incompetence, in an action by a coemployee to hold the company liable for injuries due to his disobedience of orders.

Note. — Disobedience of orders as incompetency within the rule as to master's duty to furnish competent fellow servants.

This note is confined to cases like ROBBINS v. LEWISTON, A. & W. STREET R. CO., in which the sole evidence of incompetency is the fact that the alleged incompetent servant repeatedly disobeyed orders. In many cases the servant's disobedience to orders is shown, but only as one of the several elements making up the incompetency alleged. Cases of that character are not of importance on this question, because it is impossible to tell what weight was given to each of the factors of the alleged incompetency.

And this note is confined to cases involving the disobedience of servants to the express rules or orders of the master, and does not include cases which merely involve the reckless or negligent failure of a servant to perform the ordinary duties required of him.

There are but few cases on this question, but this is not surprising, in view of the EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of Supreme Judicial Court for Kennebec County, made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff, and motion by defendant for a new trial. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Heath & Andrews, for defendant:

Evidence of past single acts of negligence, even if communicated to the defendant, was not admissible.

Mr. Benedict F. Maher for plaintiff.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes up on motion and exceptions. The case is stated in the defendant's brief as follows:

fact that a servant who repeatedly disobeys orders is generally incompetent in other matters, so that the disobedience is only one of several factors going to make up the incompetency.

The reported cases generally recognize that repeated disobedience to orders alone constitutes incompetency within the rule requiring a master to use reasonable care to furnish competent fellow servants.

Ordinarily, the word "incompetency" is used to indicate merely a lack of experience, or of mental or physical unfitness; in other words, to indicate that the servant is either inexperienced or is unfit for the work because he is mentally or physically deficient. But it cannot be questioned that, under the rule requiring the master to use reasonable care to furnish his servant competent fellow servants, it has a much broader meaning.

One of the clearest definitions of a competent man, as distinguished from an incompetent one, is given in Coppins v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 122 N. Y. 557, 10 Am. St. Rep. 523, 25 N. E. 915, where the court says: "A competent man is a reliable man; one who may be relied upon to execute the rules of the master, unless prevented by causes beyond his own control. Hence, incompetency exists not alone in physical or mental attributes, but in the disposition with which a servant performs his duties. If he habitually neglects these duties, he becomes unreliable, and although he may be physically and mentally able to do well all that is required of him, his disposition toward his work and toward the general safety of the work of his employer and to his fellow servants makes him an incompetent man."

So, in Maitland v. Gilbert Paper Co. 97 Wis. 476, 65 Am. St. Rep. 137, 72 N. W. 1124, the court said: "A person may be competent to do the particular acts required of a fireman, yet be so careless in respect to obeying the rules that prohibit him from interfering with appliances not connected with his work as to render him an exceedingly dangerous and incompetent person to be associated with. . . . So here, though it may be true that Welk had sufficient capacity to do the acts required of him as a fireman, yet, if he had not sufficient capacity to understand and obey rules which required him not to disturb parts of the machinery with which he had nothing to do, and which he was prohibited from touching, a violation of which rules was liable to imperil the personal safety of his fellow servants, he was incompetent."

And in Coppins v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra, where the servant was charged with repeatedly violating rules in respect to the closing and locking of switches, the court said: "No distinction exists in principle between permitting the use of defective machinery and permitting employees to habitually disregard the safeguards that have been provided to insure the safe running and operation of trains."

And in Cameron v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 77 Hun, 519, 28 N. Y. Supp. 898, following the Coppins Case, it was held that a servant who habitually violated the rules requiring any employee who opened a switch to remain at it until it was closed or until he was relieved was incompetent. On appeal (145 N. Y. 400, 40 N. E. 1), however, it was held that knowledge on the part of the master of such repeated violation of the rules could not be inferred from the mere fact that such disobedience had continued for four months.

So, in Southern P. Co. v. Huntsman, 55 C. C. A. 366, 118 Fed. 412, it was held proper to admit evidence tending to show that the servant of whom complaint was made, either through a defect of memory or other cause, was liable to overlook his orders and take dangerous risks, and that the defendant company, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have been aware of the fact.

On July 20, 1907, the plaintiff was a motorman on defendant's trolley car, then running from Winthrop to Augusta, on a road which is operated by the block signal system. The track between the substation at East Winthrop and Island Park is governed by a block with lights at each end. Plaintiff, when about to leave the substation, found a white light in front of him, indicating, according to the system, that there was no car in the block coming toward him from Island Park. He was justified in going ahead into the block as he did. The due care of the plaintiff throughout is admitted.

Two cars had left Augusta, running opposite to plaintiff, one, the regular car, bound for Winthrop, the other, a special car with orders to run only to Island Park, and to there cross plaintiff. The special had no right to go beyond Island Park. It was to follow the regular from Augusta to Island Park. The regular carried a sign, "Car following," to indicate to all crossing cars that they should wait for the special. Plaintiff's car and the regular from Augusta should have crossed at Island Park, if both had been on time. On arriving at Island Park, plaintiff's car not being there, the regular properly proceeded on towards the substation, as the light at Island Park was white, indicating that plaintiff had not arrived at the substation. When the regular so entered the block, it threw the light at the substation red, indicating to plaintiff that he must wait for the regular before entering the block. The regular, on crossing plaintiff at the substation, took off the sign, "Car following," as they knew the orders were for the special to remain at Island Park. When the regular passed plaintiff at the substation, he was justified

The habitual disregard for upwards of a year, by locomotive engineers, of a rule of their employer forbidding engines to remain on the main track while awaiting orders, is prima facie evidence of their incompetence, and the railroad's failure to ascertain such incompetence is prima facie evidence of its own negligence in retaining the habitually disobedient engineers in its service. Whittaker v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 126 N. Y. 544, 27 N. E. 1042.

Frequently and continuously running his engine over crossings without signaling his approach, as he should have done, is evidence of incompetency in a locomotive engineer, and when it has long been habitual, is constructive notice to the railroad company that he is incompetent. Wall v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 54 Hun, 454, 7 N. Y. Supp. 709, affirmed in 125 N. Y. 727, 26 N. E. 757.

In Senior v. Ward, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 139, it was held that it was most culpable negligence on the part of the defendant to keep in his employment a banksman who habitually disregarded a rule requiring a test of the rope and tackle by which a cage was let down in a mine, and whom he knew to be habitually disregarding the rule.

In Huntingdon & B. T. M. R. & Coal Co. v. Decker, 82 Pa. 119, and in Branch v. International & G. N. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 208, it was apparently conceded that repeated disobedience to orders amounts to incompetency, but the cases turn on other points.

A few cases may be cited as showing that the courts do not consider the mere lack of the mental and physical ability to do the work, the only form of incompetency.

Thus, in Stoll v. Daly Min. Co. 19 Utah, 271, 57 Pac. 295, the court said: "It must be conceded that a servant who frequently makes mistakes in his work, and is habitually careless, and fails to properly attend to the duties of the service in which he is employed, to such an extent that the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

risks and hazards of the employment are greatly increased thereby, is not a competent man for the work."

So, also, in Consolidated Coal Co. v. Seniger, 79 Ill. App. 456, affirmed in 179 Ill. 370, 53 N. E. 733, the court said: "If, instead of being watchful, he becomes inattentive, and habitually neglects his duty, he becomes unreliable; and although possessing the mental and physical ability to do well the work assigned him, his disposition toward the general safety of his fellow servants renders him an incompetent man."

And in Beers v. Isaac Prouty Co. 200 Mass. 19, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 39, 125 Am. St. Rep. 374, 85 N. E. 864, it was held that a foreigner who could not understand the language of his superior was incompetent, where the operation of the machine required two men in the frequent stopping, cleaning, and starting of it, in the accomplishment of which directions to him from the superior were necessary.

As to liability of master, as affected by inability of fellow servant to understand English, see note to Beers v. Isaac Prouty & Co. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 39.

Upon the general question of the liability of the master for injuries caused to one servant by the incompetency of a fellow servant, see note to Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover, 25 L.R.A. 710.

As to evidence of specific instances to prove character of servant in action against the master, see note to McQuiggan v. Ladd, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 689, at pages 756 et seq.

Upon the question, May breach of duty to employ or retain none but competent servants be inferred from the fact of their incompetence, see note to Still v. San Francisco & N. W. R. Co. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 322.

Upon the question, May incompetence of minor to perform duties of a particular employment be inferred from his minority, see note to Wilkinson v. Kanawha & H. Coal & Coke Co. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 331.

W. M. G.

in believing there was and would be no car in the block. The regular, as it left the block, turned the light white, a mechanical order to plaintiff to proceed to Island Park.

The special, without orders and against orders, left Island Park shortly after the regular, and, unseen by the regular, continued to follow it to the substation. This had no effect upon the substation light, which could be changed from red to white only by the action of the forward car, the regular. If the following car violates orders, and enters a block behind a regular, the protection of the crossing car is in the "Car following" sign.

As a result, the car of plaintiff and the special collided in the block, severely injuring plaintiff. That Taylor, the motorman, and Sanborn, the conductor in charge of the special, were both guilty of negligence in so entering the block, was admitted. The damages were assessed at $7,500. The defendant does not contend that the law court would be justified in finding the damages to be unreasonably excessive.

From this statement it will be seen that the plaintiff's action rests upon the claim that the defendant was negligent in the selection and retention of its servants Taylor and Sanborn, especially Taylor, the motorman, when it knew, or, by the exercise of due care, should have known, his incompetency. The negligent act complained of was the running into the block without orders and against orders, in violation of the rule.

The fate of the motion depends upon the result of the exceptions. If the exceptions prevail, the evidence in support of the verdict disappears. If the exceptions fail, the verdict is well founded. In other words, the evidence, if admissible, amply sustains both the charge of unfitness of the servant, and such notice thereof to the defendant that it knew, or, by due care ought to have known, of his incompetency.

But it is contended that the negligent acts of the servant, which, by the verdict, we must assume to be proven, were not of such a character as to fairly warrant the conclusion of incompetency. We think differently. Time after time he ran his car, in violation of rules and orders, and against the protest even of the conductor, round curves at an excessive rate of speed. So persistently and recklessly did he do this that one conductor, after repeated reports of these wilful acts of misconduct to the superintendent of the defendant company, resigned his position rather than continue the hazard of further employment with this young man acting as motorman. He violated the controller handle rule, which forbids a motorman to leave the car without taking his controller handle with him. He ordered the substation to shut down the power, clearly exceeding his authority. He refused to exchange passengers, as ordered, thereby disobeying the direct order of the superintendent. He refused to obey the conductor's signal bells.

These varied acts of insubordination seem to us more potent in their tendency to establish character for wilful disobedience than the repetition for an equal number of times of the same act, involving the precise element of character. The conduct of this servant, as manifested by these various acts, fully brings him within the rule of legal incompetency. In the legal sense, incompetency or unfitness is not predicated solely upon a want of ability and comprehension. It may be found side by side with even eminent skill respecting the particular thing to be done, and yet that skill so often and persistently exercised in violation of rules, orders, and regulations as to establish a character for such reckless acts as to render a person in every way mentally competent, legally incompetent. Such is the theory of the decisions.

In Consolidated Coal Co. v. Seniger, 179 Ill. 370, 53 N. E. 733, the court says: "One is incompetent who is wanting in the requisite qualifications for the business intrusted to him [He] . . . was incompetent, . . . if he was wanting in the qualifications required for the performance of the service, whether arising out of a lack of knowledge or capacity, or through imprudence, indolence, or habitual carelessness." In Maitland v. Gilbert Paper Co. 97 Wis. 476, 65 Am. St. Rep. 137, 72 I. W. 1129, the court says: "A competent man is a reliable man. Incompetency exists not alone in physical or mental attributes, but in the disposition with which a person performs his duties; and though he may be physically and mentally able to do all that is required of him, his disposition toward his work and toward his employer and toward fellow servants may make him an incompetent man." And it has been said in the recent case of Hamann v. Milwaukee Bridge Co. 127 Wis. 550, 105 N. W. 1084, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 458: "Incompetence, in the law of negligence, means want of ability suitable to the task, either as regards natural qualities or experience, or deficiency of disposition to use one's abilities and experience properly." See, also Young v. Milwaukee Gaslight Co. 133 Wis. 9, 113 N. W. 59; Still v. San Francisco & N. W. R. Co. 154 Cal. 559, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 322, 129 Am. St. Rep. 177, 98 Pac. 672; Beers v. Isaac Prouty Co. 200 Mass. 19, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 39, 128 Am. St. Rep.

374, 85 N. E. 864; Baird v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 172 N. Y. 637, 65 N. E. 1113.

Therefore, if the evidence of these specific acts of the servant was admissible to prove both incompetency and knowledge, then, the defendant being amply charged with knowledge, the jury were authorized to find the servant incompetent, and to declare it negligence in longer retaining this young man in its employ as a motorman.

This brings us to the question raised by the exceptions: Is the evidence of specific acts of prior negligence admissible to prove (1) incompetency, (2) knowledge to the master? All the exceptions but one, which will be discussed later, present the same question of law, and may be considered together.

The defendant does not question the assertion that the great weight of authority is in favor of the admission of such testimony, and cites only Massachusetts and Pennsylvania in opposition. On the other hand, it appears from the plaintiff's brief that twenty-nine of the thirty-one states that have passed upon this question have decided in the affirmative. The precise question has never been raised in this state. We are therefore free to adopt that rule which seems best calculated, upon the principles of reason and authority, to attain the best results. Upon a careful examination of the authorities, it is the opinion of the court that the rule admitting specific acts of prior negligence tending to prove the incompetency of a servant when the master has actual knowledge of such acts, or, by the exercise of due care, should have had such knowledge, is the safer and better rule to establish. In arriving at this conclusion, we have carefully reviewed and considered the reasons advanced by the courts for the directly opposite views by them declared.

The Massachusetts and Pennsylvania courts base their decision upon the doctrine of surprise and multiplicity of issues. See Hatt v. Nay, 144 Mass. 186, 10 N. E. 807; Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467. While many strong reasons may be adduced in favor of this doctrine, it has yet been found so impracticable in its application to concrete cases that even the later Massachusetts cases have felt compelled to modify it. See Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co. 170 Mass. 129, 49 N. E. 97; Ledwidge v. Hathaway, 170 Mass. 348, 49 N. E. 656; Olsen v. Andrews, 168 Mass. 261, 47 N. E. 90; Peaslee v. Fitchburg R. Co. 152 Mass. 155, 25 N. E. 71.

It should be observed, however, that the court stood squarely upon the original doctrine in Cooney v. Commonwealth Ave. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Street R. Co. 196 Mass. 11, 81 N. E. 905, and that the rule of exclusion is the law of Massachusetts to-day.

The opposite rule seems to be based upon the ground of natural admissibility. In Thayer's Preliminary Treatise on Law of Evidence, p. 530, is found the following:

"In like manner, in the whole of the secondary and adjective part of the law there should be little opportunity to go back upon the rulings of the trial judge. There should be an abuse, in order to justify a review of them by an appellate court. In order to make this practicable, the rules of evidence should be simplified, and should take on the general character of principles, to guide the sound judgment of the judge, rather than minute rules to bind it. The two leading principles should be brought into conspicuous relief: (1) That nothing is to be received which is not logically probative of some matter requiring to be proved; and (2) that everything which is thus probative should come in, unless a clear ground of policy or law excludes it."

From this it may be stated as a general principle that whatever to the ordinary reasoning mind is logically probative of a fact in issue is prima facie admissible, and should not be excluded unless its admission is in conflict with some principle of law, or in violation of some rule of policy. Past acts of negligence on the part of a servant in the performance of his duties have a direct and natural tendency to prove unfitness and incompetency, are prima facie admissible, and their admission is not in conflict with any rule or policy of law, as the cases clearly show. In the Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 294, 10 Am. Rep. 111, it was held:

"In an action by a servant against the master, to recover damages for injuries occasioned by the negligence of a coservant, held, that evidence of particular acts of carelessness and negligence on the part of the coservant was admissible to show that the master had retained said coservant in his service after he knew, or ought to have known, that said servant was careless and negligent."

A review of this opinion will disclose that the case was carefully considered, and the opposite doctrine fully condemned. Baulec v. New York & H. R. Co. 59 N. Y. 356, 17 Am. Rep. 325, involves the precise point in issue. After specifically rejecting the Massachusetts and Pennsylvania doctrine, and fully approving the rule enunciated in 38 Ind., the court proceeds to give the following sound and cogent reasons for its opinion:

"When, as here, the general fitness and capacity of a servant is involved, the prior acts and conduct of such servant on specific occasions may be given in evidence with proof that the principal had knowledge of such acts. The cases in which evidence of other acts of misconduct or neglect of servants or employees whose acts and omissions of duty . . . have been held incompetent have been those in which it has been sought to prove a culpable neglect of duty on a particular occasion by showing similar acts of negligence on other occasions. . . . When character, as distinguished from reputation, is the subject of investigation, specific acts tend to exhibit and bring to light the peculiar qualities of the man, and indicate his adaptation or want of adaptation to any position, or fitness or unfitness for a particular duty or trust. It is by many or by a series of acts that individuals acquire a general reputation, and by which their characters are known and described, and the actual qualities, the true characteristics of individuals, those qualities and characteristics which would or should influence and control in the selection of agents for positions of trust and responsibility, are learned and known. A principal would be without excuse should he employ for a responsible position, on the proper performance of the duties of which the lives of others might depend, one known to him as having the reputation of being an intemperate, imprudent, indolent, or careless man. He would be held liable to the fellow servants of the employee for any injury resulting from the deficiencies and defects imputed to the individual by public opinion and general report. Still more should he be chargeable if he had knowledge of specific acts showing that he possessed characteristics incompatible with the duties assigned him, and which might expose his fellow servants and others to peril and harm."

In Smith v. Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. 236 Ill. 369, 86 N. E. 150, will be found this significant language: "The mere happening of an accident would not ordinarily raise a presumption of incompetency, . . . but the conduct of a person on a single occasion may be entirely sufficient to demonstrate his unfitness, and, after such an occurrence, to charge the employer with a failure of duty in keeping him in the service."

The same rule is found in various states, as shown by the following cases: Stanton Coal Co. v. Bub, 218 Ill. 125, 75 N. E. 770; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Guyton, 115 Ind. 450, 7 Am. St. Rep. 458, 17 N. E. 101; Pfuld v. F. J. Romer Sons, 107 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Minn. 353, 120 N. W. 303, 304; Hilts v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 55 Mich. 437, 21 N. W. 881; Tucker v. Missouri & K. Teleph. Co. 132 Mo. App. 418, 112 S. W. 8; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Davis, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 468, 23 S. W. 305; First Nat. Bank v. Chandler, 144 Ala. 286, 113 Am. St. Rep. 39, 39 So. 828; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wyatt, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 437, 93 S. W. 604; Stoll v. Daly Min. Co. 19 Utah, 271, 57 Pac. 295; Green v. Western American Co. 30 Wash. 87, 70 Pac. 320.

We feel clear that, upon both reason and authority, the exception to the class of evidence above discussed should be overruled.

The exception to the admission of acts of prior negligence to prove the knowledge of the master has been coupled with the exception to the admission of such evidence to prove incompetency, inasmuch as, if the latter was determined to be competent evidence, the former, a fortiori, must be admissible. This conclusion is fully supported by the cases already cited upon the main proposition, and need not be further discussed. This exception should also be overruled.

The third and only other exception to be considered relates to the admission of the testimony of Maud Smith of a conversation which she heard related at one time by her husband to the superintendent of the road, as to an accident, and injuries received by him while alighting from a car upon which Merton Taylor was acting as motorman, and repeated at another time to one of the directors of the defendant company. This exception refers generally to the testimony of the witness to be found in the case inclosed in brackets. As no brackets appear to inclose any part of the evidence, we are able to consider only the pages referred to in the defendant's brief. But these pages do not disclose that any exceptions were taken. Therefore we are unable to examine this exception further than to say that the evidence seems to be entirely competent upon the question of notice to the defendant.

It is conceded that the plaintiff, when injured, was in the discharge of his duties and in the exercise of due care. The evidence discloses that he was injured by the negligence of the defendant's servant, that the servant was in fact incompetent, and that his incompetency was known to the defendant when the plaintiff was injured and prior thereto, and yet he was retained in its employ.

Motion and exceptions overruled.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

ROXANA V. WALKER, Resp.,
v.
SELVA ALVERSON et al., Appts.

Levy — vested remainder.

1. A vested remainder is subject to execution during the continuance of the preceding estate.

Will — remainder — vesting of estate.

2. An estate created by a devise to one or his heirs after the death of a life tenant, with a provision that, in the event that he shall de cease before the life tenant, leaving no heirs, then the estate shall go to another, vests in the first taker, subject to be divested in case he predeceases the life tenant, without leaving heirs.

(September 20, 1910.)

Note. — Expectant and contingent interests in real property as subject of attachment or levy on execution.

The earlier cases on this question are collected in a note to Young v. Young, 23 L.R.A. 642.

The cases in this note are confined exclusively to the interest of an heir in the lands of his ancestors, reversioners, remainders, executory devise, inchoate rights of dower, and curtesy initiate.

As shown in the earlier note, the general rule is that lands, tenements, and hereditaments which may be taken and sold on execution include all possible titles to lands, contingent or otherwise, where there is a real interest, but where it is uncertain to whom the estate will go, or where it is limited to take effect upon an uncertain event, it is a mere contingency, not subject to levy and sale.

In Byerly v. Sherman, 126 Iowa, 447, 102 N. W. 157, it was held that an unassigned distributive share of an heir of a deceased person, in an undivided interest in land, may be levied on and sold under execution.

Under a statute providing that land to which the defendant has a legal title in fee for life or for a term, whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, may be sold under execution, and making estates of every kind held in trust subject to the debts of the person for whose benefit they are so held, just as they would be if those persons owned a like interest in the property itself, it was held in Smith v. Smith, 115 Ky. 329, 73 S. W. 1023, that the interest of a devisee is subject to attachment for his debts, notwithstanding the provision of the will, restricting alienation by him until he arrives at a certain age.

But in Brightman v. Morgan, 111 Iowa, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Spartanburg County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain real property to which she alleged title under the will of Mary Ann Johnson, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nichols & Nichols and William M. Jones for appellants.

Messrs. Johnson & Nash, for respondent:

A contingent remainder is not subject to execution, levy, and sale by the sheriff.

This is a contingent remainder.

Charleston & W. C. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 69 S. C. 503, 48 S. E. 476; Thomas v. Poole, 19 S. C. 323; Boykin v. Springs, 66 S. C. 370, 44 S. E. 934; Faber v. Police, 10 S. C.

481, 82 N. W. 954, it was held that the unadmeasured distributive share of the husband in his deceased wife's real estate was not subject to levy under an execution against him. It was suggested, however, that the execution plaintiff might have a remedy in equity to subject the husband's unassigned interest.

In Beaver v. Ross, 140 Iowa, 154, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 65, 118 N. W. 287, 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 640, it was held that a devise of land to testator's wife for life, with directions to sell it at her death, and out of the proceeds pay a certain amount to a certain person, and divide the remainder among testator's children, effects a conversion of the property as of the time of the testator's death; and judgments against one of the children, before sale is actually effected, will not create a lien on his interest in the property as the testator's heir.

A creditor of a devisee, who attaches real property devised before the distribution of the estate, is not required to present his claim to the probate court, but the property continues subject to the lien of attachment. Martinovich v. Marsicano, 150 Cal. 597, 119 Am. St. Rep. 254, 89 Pac. 333.

Vested remainders.

As shown in the earlier note, it is generally held that a vested remainder may be taken in execution, and sold by virtue thereof, under a judgment against the remainderman. To the same effect are Ernst v. Northern Bank, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1334, 49 S. W. 333; Roach v. Dance, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 157, 80 S. W. 1097; Armiger v. Reitz, 91 Md. 334, 46 Atl. 990; Stern v. Lee, 115 N. C. 426, 26 L.R.A. 814, 20 S. E. 736.

And the undivided interests of remaindermen in a vested remainder are subject to levy and sale on execution for their respective debts. Deadman v. Yantis, 230 Ill. 243, 120 Am. St. Rep. 291, 82 N. E. 592.

E. 978, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 693.

It is not the uncertainty of the estate in the future, but the uncertainty of the right to such enjoyment, which marks the difference between a contingent and a vested remainder.

So, a judgment debtor's undivided interest in property devised to another for life, with power of disposition, and remainder over to the debtor and others, is subject to levy and sale on execution for his debts. Pedigo v. Botts, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 196, 89 S. W. 164.

In Williams v. Lobban, 206 Mo. 399, 104 S. W. 58, the interest of one of the children under a will devising land to testator's wife, and directing that at her death it should be sold and the proceeds divided among testator's eight children, was held subject to seizure in an attachment suit, and to sale under execution during the widow's life. It was contended that the direction to sell at the widow's death, and to divide the proceeds among the children, converted the land into personalty at the time of the testator's death, and it could not, for that reason, be seized as realty, but it was held that the will vested the land in the devisees, subject to the widow's life estate, and whether the estate of each devisee be considered real estate or personalty, it could be sold, either by the devisee voluntarily, or by judgment and execution against him.

An equitable vested remainder created by a trust deed is subject to sale on execution against the remainderman. Dunkerson v. Goldberg, 89 C. C. A. 120, 162 Fed. 120.

A remainderman's interest, encumbered with a homestead, may be levied upon and sold, subject to the homestead right. Brokaw v. Ogle, 170 Ill. 115, 48 N. E. 394.

Contingent remainders.

Contingent remainders are not, in general, subject to seizure during the continuance of the precedent estate, and it has been specifically so held:

—as to the interest of remaindermen under a devise of real estate limiting the remainder to such persons of a class as may be alive at the death of the life tenant, notwithstanding the general provisions of the 20 L.R.A.(N.S.)

statute that the words "real estate," "real property," and "lands," include lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein, since such remaindermen have no interest, legal or equitable, in the land devised until the termination of the life estate. Nichols v. Guthrie, 109 Tenn. 535, 73 S. W. 107;

—as to the interest of children of the testator in land devised to the widow for life, for the education of minor children, with direction for sale at death of the widow, and division of proceeds among all the children, notwithstanding the general provision of a statute that any land to which the debtor has a legal title, whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, shall be subject to sale under execution. Mudd v. Durham, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1202, 33 S. W. 1116;

—as to the interest which a son acquired under his father's will, directing that the widow take charge of all the testator's property, and receive all the proceeds arising therefrom during her life, and directing that, at her death, the executor should take charge of the property, and dispose of it and divide the proceeds among testator's children in a given way. Harris v. Kittle, 119 Ga. 29, 45 S. E. 729;

—as to the interest in remainder which a son acquired under his father's will, giving the property to the widow for life, and after her death to be divided equally between his two sons, and providing that if either sons should die before the decease of the widow, leaving lawful issue, such issue should inherit in the place of the parent so deceased. Smith v. Gilbert, 71 Conn. 149, 71 Am. St. Rep. 163, 41 Atl. 284.

In Taylor v. Taylor, 118 Iowa, 407, 92 N. W. 71, it was held that the statute making judgments liens upon real estate owned by defendants, and defining real estate as including lands, tenements, hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein, contemplates a present, tangible right to their interest in the land, so that where the uncertainty of a contingent remainder involves solely the question of who shall take the real estate, it is not, before vest-

Hydrick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mary Ann Johnson disposed of her property, real and personal, by her will, as follows:

"Item 2. I give, bequeath, and devise all of my property . . . unto my beloved husband, Thomas P. Johnson, for his sole use and control, during his natural life.

"Item 3. After the decease of my husband, it is my will and desire that my cousin, Roxana Sowell, or her heirs, shall come into possession of all my property, both personal and real, forever.

"Item 4. In the event, if my cousin, Roxana Sowell, shall decease before my husband, Thomas P. Johnson, leaving no heir or heirs, I will and desire that the heirs of my brother, S. James Ellis, or their heirs, shall inherit all of my estate, after the death of my husband, Thomas P. Johnson."

During the life of Thomas P. Johnson, the interest of Roxana Sowell (now Walker) in the real estate was sold under execution against her. The defendant is in possession, claiming under the purchaser at that sale. After the death of the life tenant, Roxana brought this action to recover the possession of the land. If the limitation to her was a contingent remainder, the purchaser at the sheriff's sale took nothing, and she is entitled to recover. But, if her interest was a vested remainder, it was conveyed by the sheriff's deed, and the defendant is entitled to retain the possession.

ing, the subject of levy and sale under execution.

But under a statute providing that an expectant estate is descendible, devisable, and alienable in the same manner as an estate in possession, it was held in Cohalan v. Parker, 138 App. Div. 849, 123 N. Y. Supp. 343, that a testamentary remainder interest, whether vested or contingent, is subject to sale to satisfy a judgment against the devisee, and whatever interest the devisee has will pass to the purchaser at the sale.

And in Wood v. Watson, 20 R. I. 223, 37 Atl. 1030, it was held that a judgment debtor's contingent interest in real property was liable to attachment under a statute providing that such interest in real estate may be disposed of by legal conveyance or will, the general rule being that the attachment creditor acquires the same rights over the thing attached as his debtor had, so far as to enable him to satisfy his judgment therefrom.

Moreover, it was held that the statute authorizing a judgment creditor to attach real estate, or the right, title, and interest of any defendant therein, was broad enough to include a contingent interest in the real estate. Ibid.

In Higgins v. Downs, 101 App. Div. 119, 91 N. Y. Supp. 937, it was held that a devise by a testatrix to her son, the residue of her property to be held in trust by her executors, and managed by them for her son's benefit until he should arrive at the age of fifty years, when said trust should continue, in the discretion of the executors, with provision that the son might dispose of the property by will if he should die while the trust was in force, but if he should die intestate, the property to go to the heirs at law of the testatrix,—created two future expectant estates, to take effect in the alternative; namely, the remainder in the son, limited by the precedent estate in the executors and contingent upon his arriving at the age of fifty years, and the exercise by the executors at that time of their discretion to terminate the trust; and second, the remainder in the testatrix's heirs at law, limited upon the same precedent estate in the executors, and contingent upon the failure of the estate to vest in the son, and also upon his failure to exercise the power of disposal by will during the term of the trust; and that the expectant estate in the remainder created in the testatrix's son was a descendible, devisable, and alienable estate, to which the lien of a judgment recovered against him would attach upon execution.

Dower.

As shown in the earlier note, the rule is well settled that, unless otherwise regulated by statute, a mere right of dower, before an assignment thereof, is only a chose in action, and not such an interest or estate in real property as can be levied upon and sold under execution. And to the same effect are the following later cases: Baer v. Ballingall, 37 Or. 416, 61 Pac. 852; Falkner v. Thurmond (Miss.) 23 So. 584; Petefish v. Buck, 56 Ill. App. 149.

Nor can an unassigned dower be reached by a creditors' bill, in the absence of any provision thereof by statute. Harper v. Clayton, 84 Md. 346, 35 L.R.A. 211, 57 Am. St. Rep. 407, 35 Atl. 1083.

In Young v. Thrasher, 61 Mo. App. 413, it was held that a statute permitting a widow to transfer her unassigned dower could not subject such dower to sale under execution, "as many reasons exist," said the court, referring to Waller v. Mardus, 29 Mo. 25, "why a voluntary alienation should be permissible and an involuntary alienation be prohibited."

In Canadian Bank v. Rolston, 4 Ont. L. Rep. 106, it was held that the right of dower in an equity of redemption, before assignment, is not subject to sale under execution; that the widow, before assignment of dower, though entitled to redeem a mortgage to which her dower is subject, is not possessed of an estate in the land, and is not therefore an "assign" of her husband, nor a "person having the equity of redemption," within the meaning of a statute subjecting the interest of such persons to sale under execution.

Allston v. Bank of the State, 2 Hill, Eq. 235; Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450, 2 S. E. 474.

The sole question, therefore, is: Was the limitation to Roxana a contingent or a vested remainder? The master and circuit court held that it was contingent, and gave judgment for plaintiff. The law favors the vesting of estates at the earliest time possible; and no remainder will be construed to be contingent which may, consistently with the intention, be deemed vested. 4 Kent, Com. 195. "Whenever there is a doubt as to the quantity of the estate devised, or whether it is vested, the rule is to presume that the testator intended to give an absolute rather than a qualified estate, and a vested rather than contingent inter-

But in Latourette v. Latourette, 52 App. Div. 192, 65 N. Y. Supp. 8, it was held that the dower right of a widow in the lands of her deceased husband is liable to be taken by attachment to satisfy the claims of her creditors before its admeasurement, under a statute providing that any interest in real property, whether vested or not vested, which is capable of being aliened by the defendant, shall be liable to attachment.

And in Gildehaus v. Fidelity Bldg. & Sav. Co. 24 Ohio C. C. 110, it was held that the dower interest of the judgment debtor may be subjected to the payment of his debts, notwithstanding such interest has not been assigned, under a statute providing that any interest in any claim or chose in action, due or to become due, shall be subject to the payment of the judgment.

In Peebles v. Bunting, 103 Iowa, 489, 73 N. W. 882, it was held that judgments obtained against a widow attach immediately to her interest in her husband's real estate, which may be levied upon and sold, where she does not elect to take her homestead right in her husband's lands, as provided by statute, in lieu of dower.

In Trowbridge v. Cunningham, 63 Kan. 847, 66 Pac. 1015, where, under the statute, the surviving wife inherits one half of the real estate of her husband; it was held that her undivided share may be levied on and sold for the payment of her indebtedness.

So, when dower is assigned, it becomes a life estate, and may then be sold upon execution against the doweress. Petefish v. Buck, supra.

And the unassigned right of dower in lands is such an interest as may be reached by a judgment creditor by the aid of a court of equity. Petefish v. Buck and Baer v. Ballingall, supra.

Curtesy initiate.

The contingent curtesy of a husband in his wife's lands is not, during the life of the wife, subject to attachment or sale under execution, in the satisfaction of his debts. Ball v. Woolfolk, 175 Mo. 278, 75 S. W. 410.

Under a statute providing that the separate property of the wife shall not be liable for the debts of her husband, his estate by the curtesy in her property is not liable to be sold to pay a debt of his, created after the passage of the statute. Hitz v. National Metropolitan Bank, 111 U. S. 722, 28 L. ed. 577, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 613. In that 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

case it was argued that the property exempted from the husband's debts by the statute was the wife's property, and that the life estate of the husband was not her property; but it was held that the statute was intended to exempt all property which came to the wife by any other mode than by the husband from liability to seizure for his debts, without regard to the nature of the interest which the husband may have in it, or the time when it accrued; and that, in regard to the husband's debts created after the passage of the law, no principle of law or morals was violated by the enactment. To the same effect is Mattoon v. McGrew, 112 U. S. 713, 28 L. ed. 824, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369.

In Campbell v. McBee, 92 Va. 68, 22 S. E. 807, it was held that, under the married women's property act, the husband has no interest in the wife's separate real estate during her lifetime, but that the husband is entitled to curtesy when the wife dies intestate, and a judgment against the husband will attach to his estate by the curtesy, but in subordination to a deed of trust made by the husband and wife during the coverture, to secure a loan made to the wife, since by her conveyance, so far as the land was necessary to pay the debt secured, the husband had no curtesy in it.

In Hampton v. Cook, 64 Ark. 353, 62 Am. St. Rep. 194, 42 S. W. 535, it was held that the husband's right to curtesy in the wife's land is superior to the claims of her judgment creditors, although, during her life, they might have had the land sold under execution, and thereby might have extinguished the estate by curtesy. The court said that the estate vested in the husband by virtue of his marital rights, in the lifetime of his wife, independently of her debts, and consequently did not vest in him at her death, subject to her debts, if any.

In Rusk v. Hill, 121 Ga. 379, 49 S. E. 261, it was held that the reversionary interest in lands which have been assigned as dower is subject to levy and sale at the instance of the creditors of the husband's estate.

And in Clark v. Hillis, 134 Ind. 421, 34 N. E. 13, it was held that, upon the death of the owner of the reversionary interest in land, before the expiration of the particular estate, his heirs took his interest, subject to the payment of his debts, which interest could be sold on execution.

est; and even where the words import a contingency, but do not create a condition precedent, they give a vested interest to the devisee, subject, however, to be divested if the contingency should not happen." Smith v. Hilliard, 3 Strobb. Eq. 223, 224. In considering the difference between vested and contingent remainders, Mr. Fearné calls attention to the confusion which sometimes arises from the failure to observe the distinction between the uncertainty which makes a remainder contingent, and the uncertainty of its ever taking effect in possession,—“a distinction,” he says, “not always attended to, but absolutely requisite to complete an accurate notion of what is in law considered as a contingent estate; for, wherever there is a particular estate, the determination of which does not depend on any uncertain event, and a remainder is thereon absolutely limited to a person in esse and ascertained, in that case, notwithstanding the nature and duration of the estate limited in remainder may be such as that it may not endure beyond the particular estate, and may therefore never take effect or vest in possession, yet it is not a contingent, but a vested remainder. As if a lease be to A for life, remainder to B for life or in tail,—here, notwithstanding B may possibly die, or die without issue, in the lifetime of A, and consequently never come into possession, yet is his remainder vested in interest, and by no means comprised in the legal notion of a contingent estate. It is not the uncertainty of ever taking effect in possession that makes a remainder contingent; for to that every remainder for life or in tail is and must be liable, as the remainderman may die, or die without issue before the death of the tenant for life. The present capacity of taking effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant, and not the certainty that the possession will become vacant before the estate limited in remainder determines, universally distinguishes a vested remainder from one that is contingent.” 1 Fearné, Contingent Remainders, p. 215. Again, at page 216, he says: “Wherever the preceding estate is limited, so as to determine on an event which certainly must happen, and the remainder is so limited to a person in esse, and ascertained, that the preceding estate may by any means determine before the expiration of the estate limited in remainder, such remainder is vested.” Chancellor Kent thus expresses the difference: “It is not the uncertainty of enjoyment in the future, but the uncertainty of the right to that enjoyment, which marks the difference between a vested and contingent interest.” 4 Kent, Com. 198. Mr. Washburn says: 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

“A vested remainder is one the owner of which has the present capacity of taking the seisin in case the particular estate were to determine. But no degree of uncertainty as to the remainderman’s ever enjoying his remainder will render it contingent, provided he has by the limitation a present absolute right to enjoy the estate the instant the prior estate should determine.” 2 Washb. Real Prop. § 1541. In Faber v. Police, 10 S. C. 376–387, this court pointed out the distinction between vested and contingent remainders as follows: “The most marked distinction between the two kinds of remainders is that, in the one case, the right to the estate is fixed and certain, though the right to the possession is deferred to some future period; while, in the other, the right to the estate as well as the right to the possession of such estate is not only deferred to a future period, but is dependent on the happening of some future contingency.”

With these rules and distinctions before us, let us examine the will to ascertain the intention of the testatrix, for to that we must give effect, unless it conflicts with some rule of law. After the death of her husband (a certain event), she gives the property to Roxana (a person in esse, and ascertained), or her heirs. If she had said no more, there would be no difficulty. But, after having given her property unqualifiedly to Roxana, she says, in the next clause: “In the event, if my cousin, Roxana, shall decease before my husband, I will and desire that the heirs of my brother, S. James Ellis, or their heirs, shall inherit all of my estate, after the death of my husband.” The previous devise to Roxana manifests the intention that she should take in preference to the Ellis heirs. But the context shows that, after testatrix had given Roxana the estate, it occurred to her that she might die before the life tenant, without leaving heirs, and, to provide for that contingency, she made the devise over. It is contended that the contingency expressed in the limitation over cut down the absolute interest previously given to Roxana, and made it contingent upon her surviving the life tenant. That depends upon whether the contingency expressed in the devise over is so incorporated into the substance of the gift to Roxana as to make her right to the estate depend upon her surviving the life tenant; or whether the testatrix, having in mind the uncertainty of her actual enjoyment of the estate, intended merely to provide for that contingency. We think the two clauses of the will, taken together, show the latter to have been her intention. If there had been no limitation over, precisely the same uncertainty as to Roxana's actual enjoyment of the estate would have existed. It is more consistent, therefore, with the intention expressed in the third clause of the will, to give the estate to Roxana, to hold that the fourth clause creates only a condition subsequent, upon the happening of which the estate already vested will be divested. When a gift is made in one clause of a will in clear and unequivocal terms, the quantity or quality of the estate given should not be cut down or qualified by words of doubtful import, found in a subsequent clause. To have that effect, the subsequent words should be at least as clear in expressing that intention as the words in which the interest is given. While a contingent remainder is one limited to take effect either to a dubious and uncertain person or upon a dubious and uncertain event, it does not follow that every remainder which is subject to a contingency or a condition is therefore a contingent remainder. The condition may be precedent or it may be subsequent. If the former, the remainder is contingent; if the latter, it is vested, though it may be divested by the happening of the condition.

There is a class of cases which closely resemble, in the rules of construction applicable, the case under consideration, in which vested remainders are limited in terms which seem to import contingency; but the contingent expressions are construed to denote merely the time when the estate is to take effect in actual possession; as, for example, when an estate is limited to one, "if," or "when," or "as soon as" he attains a certain age, with a limitation over, in case he dies under the age specified, or dies under that age without issue, etc. There the words of apparent contingency are held not to create a condition precedent to the right of enjoyment, or to denote the time when the interest shall vest, but merely the time when enjoyment in possession shall commence, or when an estate already vested shall be divested.

The case of Rivers v. Fripp, 4 Rich. Eq. 278, is an illustration of the rule. In that case the devise was to testator's wife for life, and, after her death, to his son for life; "and from and immediately after the death of my wife and son, unto the issue of my said son living at the time of his death, who shall live to attain the full age of twenty-one years, or who, dying before that time, shall leave issue to live until the time at which the parent or parents, if alive, would have reached the age of twenty-one years," and, in default of such issue, then over. Held to give a vested, but defeasible, interest, with immediate right to the rents and profits, to a child of the son who survived both the wife and son, although such child died under twenty-one years of age, leaving no issue which lived until the time at which the parent, if alive, would have been twenty-one years of age. Seabrook v. Gregg, 2 S. C. 68, is another case construing the limitations of a will which, if not identical, are not materially different from those contained in the will construed in Rivers v. Fripp. In both these cases the English cases which established the rule of construction are reviewed at some length. The doctrine of these cases has never been questioned, and they are in accord with the current decisions. English and American, upon the point decided. In Rivers v. Fripp, at page 278, the court said: "The authorities concur that this inquiry must be determined by the sense in which the testator intended the devisee's interest in the property to depend upon his attaining the specified age. Thus, a devise to a person if he shall live to attain a particular age, standing alone, would be contingent; yet, if it be followed by a limitation over in case he die under such age, the devise over is considered as explanatory of the sense in which the term is used, to wit, that at that age the estate should become absolute and indefeasible. The interest in question, therefore, is construed to vest instantly. 1 Jarman, Wills, 738." So here, the devise over is explanatory of the sense in which the testatrix intended the devise to Roxana to depend upon her surviving the life tenant; to wit, that at that time (the death of the life tenant) the estate should become absolute and indefeasible.

In Haynsworth v. Haynsworth, 12 Rich. Eq. 114, donor conveyed real and personal property to the use of his granddaughter M., wife of H., for life, and, after her death, to the use of H. for life, and, after his death, to the use of the children born and hereafter to be born of the said M., and their heirs; but, should the said M. and the said H. both die without leaving children living at the time of their decease, born of the said M., then over. M. afterwards died, leaving H. and one child surviving her, and the child then died, leaving H. surviving him. Held, that the child took a vested transmissible interest, which became indefeasible at the death of M. leaving him surviving her, and consequently that the limitation over could not take effect. In the circuit decree, which was affirmed upon that point, Chancellor Carroll uses the following language: "If the words employed be in other respects sufficient to pass a present interest, the mere circumstance of its being limited over a contingency does not in itself prevent the interest from vesting. Rutledge v. Rutledge, Dud. Eq. 205; Skey v. Barnes, 3 Meriv. 340, 25 Eng. Rul. Cas. 593. On the contrary, there is high authority for the proposition that it has precisely the opposite effect." A limitation over in case of the prior devisee dying under certain circumstances, or before attaining a certain age, or in case of his dying before the life tenant, etc., is an argument in favor of the prior devisee's taking an immediately vested interest; for, as said by Tindal, Ch. J., in Phipps v. Ackers, 9 Clarke & F. 583, the limitation over "sufficiently shows the meaning of the testator to have been that the first devisee should take whatever interest the party claiming under the devise over is not entitled to, which, of course, gives him the immediate interest, subject only to the chance of its being devested on a future contingency." It shows, therefore, that the prior devisee is the preferable object of the testator's bounty, from which a presumption arises of an intention that the estate should invest in him, subject to the divesting contingency. Smith v. Hilliard, 3 Strobb. Eq. 223, 224. See also Rutledge v. Rutledge, supra; Kersh v. Yongue, 7 Rich. Eq. 100; Boykin v. Boykin, 21 S. C. 529; Brown v. McCall, 44 S. C. 503, 22 S. E. 823; and Woodley v. Calhoun, 69 S. C. 290, 48 S. E. 272.

There is another class of cases which are analogous to the one we are now considering, in which Mr. Fearn says [p. 247]: "The contingency upon which an estate is limited has been considered as a condition subsequent instead of precedent, so that the estate becomes vested immediately, subject to be defeated by the condition when it happens, in the room of not taking effect till such condition happens." He gives the case of Stocker v. Edwards, 2 Shower, 398, as an instance. In that case there was a surrender of copyholds to the use of the surrenderor for life, and afterwards to the use of his youngest son, and the heirs of his body, if he attained the age of eighteen, and, if he died before eighteen, without issue male, then to the right heirs of A. It was held to be a condition subsequent with respect to the youngest son, and therefore the remainder vested immediately, subject to be defeated by the condition of his dying without issue male before he attained the age of eighteen. The doctrine of Stocker v. Edwards upon this point was recognized in Bromfield v. Crowder, 1 Bos. & P. N. R. 313, where testator devised all his estate to D. and R. for their lives successively, and after the death of the survivor, to B., if he lived to attain the age of twenty-one, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) but not otherwise, and, in case he died before attaining that age, over. Both D. and R. died while B. was under twenty-one. Held, that B. took a vested estate in fee simple, defeasible on his dying under the age of twenty-one. In Phipps v. Ackers, supra, the earlier English cases were reviewed and the doctrine established by them reaffirmed.

There is still another class of cases to which this case belongs, in which the same rule of construction is applied, and that is where the contingency is the devisee's surviving the life tenant. In Williamson v. Field, 2 Sandf. Ch. 533, it is said: "When the person to whom a remainder after a life estate is limited is ascertained, and the event upon which it is to take effect is certain to happen, it is a vested remainder, although by its terms it may be entirely defeated by the death of such person before the termination of the particular estate." In Blanchard v. Blanchard, 1 Allen, 223, there was a devise to the wife for life, and, after her death, to five children by name, with a proviso that, if any of the children named should die before the wife, the property should be equally divided amongst the survivors, except those so dying should leave issue, and, in that case, to the issue. Held, that the portion of the will preceding the proviso was a devise to the wife for life, remainder, at her death, to the children named; and, there being in that portion of the will no such words of contingency as "if they shall be living at her death," or "to such of them as shall be living at her death," or other words apt and proper to create a condition precedent, and thereby make the remainders contingent, the remainders were vested, subject to be divested by the happening of the condition. In Mercantile Bank v. Ballard, 83 Ky. 481, 4 Am. St. Rep. 160, the devise was to the use of B for life, after her death, to be conveyed to her children and their descendants in the same proportion as if it had descended from her; but, if she left no child, nor descendant of a child, to the use of C. Held, that the children of B living at the death of testator took a vested fee simple, subject to be divested by their dying before B. The court said: "A devise to A for life, remainder to B, but, if B is dead at the termination of the life estate, then to C, passes to B a vested estate, and a contingent interest to C." In Avery v. Everett, 110 N. Y. 317, 1 L.R.A. 264, 6 Am. St. Rep. 368, 18 N. E. 148, a devise to the testator's wife for life, remainder to his son, C. H., and, in case C. H. should die without children, then, after the wife's death and the son's death, to A. S., a nephew, was held to give C. H. a vested fee at testator's death, subject to be defeated by his death without children. In Ducker v. Burnham, 146 Ill. 9, 37 Am. St. Rep. 135, 34 N. E. 558, a devise to the testator's wife for life, with full power of sale, remainder to five children named, to be divided equally amongst them, in case of the death of any of them, without issue, either before testator, or before receiving the portions given them, the share of such to be equally divided amongst the survivors. Held, each of the children took a vested remainder, subject to be devested by the exercise of the power of sale or by death, without issue, before the life tenant. In Finch v. Lane, L. R. 10 Eq. 501, the devise was to testator's wife for life, remainder, as to part, to his brother for life, and after the death of the wife, subject to the brother's interest in the part, to M. in fee, if she should be living at the death of the wife, but, if she should die before the wife, without leaving issue, then over. M. died before the widow, but left issue. Held, that M. took a vested remainder. That case seems to be directly in point, and as near on all fours with this case as well can be. It was decided on the authority of Phipps v. Ackers.

Both the master and the circuit judge seems to have based their conclusion in part, at least, upon the application of a test laid down in Faber v. Police, 10 S. C. 388, for determining whether a remainder is vested or contingent, to wit: "To inquire whether the person claiming such remainder, being sui juris, could, by uniting with the owner of the particular estate, convey a fee-simple title. If he could, such a remainder must be regarded as vested; otherwise, it is contingent." Whatever may be said of the applicability and reliability of that test in ordinary cases, it is obvious that it fails when applied to the case of a remainder which is vested subject to a devastating contingency, and also to the case of a vested remainder to a class some of whom are not in esse. That there are such vested remainders all the authorities are agreed.

The cases above cited fully illustrate the principles upon which this case must be decided. Our conclusion is that Roxana took a vested interest, subject to be devested by her death before the life tenant, leaving no heir or heirs. Her interest, therefore, passed under the sheriff's deed, and she cannot recover.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

FRED SCHOENFELD, Plff. in Err.,

v.

BENJAMIN W. BOURNE et al.

(159 Mich. 139, 123 N. W. 537.)

Process — publication — name — idem sonans.

A published notice to "Dunton" is not sufficient to support an attachment against property of Denton, although a codefendant was correctly named, if no personal service was secured on either.

(December 10, 1909.)

Note. — Applicability of doctrine of idem sonans to substituted or constructive service of process.

Since the method of obtaining jurisdiction over one's person or property in an action commenced by substituted or constructive service of process is exceptional, and in derogation of any common-law method of procedure, some courts take the position that no presumptions, in order to make good the service, should be indulged that are not strictly and clearly warranted by the law sanctioning such practice, and that if the service of such process is made under the wrong name, the service will not be validated by a resort to the doctrine of idem sonans. This is the view taken in SCHOENFELD v. BOURNE. Likewise, in Steinman v. Jessee, 108 Va. 567, 62 S. E. 275, wherein it appeared that the appellant was made a party to a bill in a certain suit, but was proceeded against only by order of publication, the notice of which, as published, gave his name as "A. J. Stainmau," and nowhere in the publication was his correct name of "Steinman" given, the court said: "In order to bind appellant by those decrees, the proceeding against him by publication must have been strictly in compliance with the statute authorizing notice to a party to a pending suit by publication. Such a notice is constructive only, and the order of publication, as well as the statute authorizing it on prescribed conditions, is to be strictly construed; otherwise a party's rights cannot be taken from him without a day in court. Unquestionably the doctrine of idem sonans may be invoked to cure immaterial variations in the spelling of a name, but the authorities agree that the combination of letters and syllables must produce the same sound as the true name. To apply the doctrine to this case, where, in the caption to the order of publication, the name is spelled 'Stainmau,' which is the notice, while in that part of the publication regarded as the warning, the name is spelled 'Stinman,' and hold that appellant should have understood that 'Steinman' was meant, would be not only to carry the doctrine beyond any authority cited, or that we have been able to find, but beyond sound reasoning. That the initials of the Chris-

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Gratiot County to review an order setting aside a judgment in plaintiff's favor, and quashing a writ of attachment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hollis C. Johnson, O. G. Tuttle, and John T. Mathews for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Stone & Watson, for defendants in error:

Attachment is a harsh and extraordinary remedy, unknown to the common law, and the statutory provisions upon which the right depends must be strictly construed, and cannot be extended beyond their terms.

The error in the spelling of the name in the notice of publication rendered the service fatally defective.

Gaylord) 104 Minn. 165, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 236, 124 Am. St. Rep. 615, 116 N. W. 357, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 114; Hubner v. Reickhoff, 103 Iowa, 368, 64 Am. St. Rep. 191, 72 N. W. 540; Fantian name of the party for whom the notice is intended are correctly printed is of no importance, except as a matter of secondary consideration, since the attention of one reading the notice, perchance it might be, would not be attracted by the initials of the Christian name, but by the surname, far less commonly in use in the great majority of cases than the initials of a Christian name."

In Hubner v. Reickhoff, 103 Iowa, 368, 64 Am. St. Rep. 191, 72 N. W. 540, cited in SCHOENFELD v. BOURNE, it was held that the doctrine of idem sonans did not apply where service of process was made by publication, in an action of divorce against a nonresident. The court said: "Where a service is by publication, which is made conclusive because of a presumption that it comes to the notice of the person, can the court assume, as a matter of law, that the name 'Keesel' would or should be understood as 'Keisel'? Can it be said to be a rule of law that one of the latter name, on seeing the former name in a notice, must or should understand it to mean him? Let it be conceded that, if he were in court, the identity of the person as the one intended might be shown; but can it be assumed as a legal conclusion that 'Keesel' should be understood as 'Keisel'? It is hardly to be doubted that, while 'Reed' could be held to apply to 'Read' or 'Reade,' with the person in court, and an issue of identity made, a court would not assume, in a publication service, that it meant, or should be understood to mean, either of the others. The danger of such a holding is apparent, because of the fact that all three words are names of persons, pronounced alike, but of different orthography. Under some conditions, either name might be held to apply to either of the persons, but not in a case where a name, not his own, is published in a notice, to which he has not responded."

In McRee v. Brown, 45 Tex. 506, where an effort was made to sustain a judgment by default against "Robert McRee," on citation by publication to "Robert McKee," Moore, Associate Justice, observed: "If there is a mere immaterial discrepancy in the manner of writing or spelling the name of the defendant in the citation and the judgment, the doctrine of idem sonans may be invoked to sustain the judgment, because, in such case, it is manifest to the court that the party against whom the judgment is rendered is in fact the same person upon whom the citation was served. And when personal service is had on the proper party, though he has failed to appear, there may be more reason in holding him bound, notwithstanding an error in the citation, than when notice is given merely by publication. In support of a judgment against a non-resident on constructive service, evidently the court should indulge in no presumption not strictly and clearly warranted by the record. Certainly, the names McKee and McRee, neither to the eye nor ear, convey the idea that they refer or apply to the same person. There may be some sort of euphony in their pronunciation; but there is no more similarity of sound between them than there is between 'Doe' and 'Roe;' and from reading them it would not be supposed that the same person was referred to more readily than would we come to a like conclusion from reading the names of these celebrated legal entities."

In New Orleans v. Cordeviollé, 10 La. Ann. 727, it was observed: "No reasonable pronunciation can make the word published 'Cordoviatti' sound like Cordeviollé. The name advertised is not the name of the defendant. It is hardly necessary to observe that a case of this kind differs somewhat from a suit commenced by citation, where the personal service of the citation would demonstrate who was intended to be made defendant."

In Buchanan v. Roy, 2 Ohio St. 251, the court said it was by no means clear that a notice by publication to Sarah Ray, without further description or means of identification, could be held to be a notice to Sarah Roy, under the doctrine of idem sonans, but no opinion was expressed, because it was not deemed necessary to decide the point.

In Thornily v. Prentice, 121 Iowa, 89, 100 Am. St. Rep. 317, 96 N. W. 728, where it

ning v. Krapf, 61 Iowa, 417, 14 N. W. 727, 16 N. W. 293; Thornily v. Prentice, 121 Iowa, 89, 100 Am. St. Rep. 317, 96 N. W. 728; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 122.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a resident of Ohio. The defendants reside in the Republic of Mexico. Plaintiff proceeded against the defendants in the circuit court for the county of Gratiot, by attachment, by reason of the nonresidence of the defendants. The writ issued July 10, 1908. Plaintiff attempted to publish a notice of attachment, but in the published notice named the defendants as "B. W. Bourne and William H. Dunton." On October 15, 1908, an affidavit of publication was filed, made by one of the publishers of the Gratiot Journal, stating therein that the notice annexed thereto had been published in said paper at least once in each week, for six weeks, and that the first publication thereof was on the 27th day of August, 1908. This affidavit was subscribed and sworn to on October 9, 1908. On November 6, 1908, the plaintiff filed his declaration, and on the following day entered the default of the defendants. On Novemappeared that a judgment was obtained against William M. Thornily, on a substituted service "on W. M. Thornily by leaving a copy of notice with Paul Thornily, over fifteen years of age, his son," when the defendant's real name was Willis H. Thornily, the court held that the names were not idem sonans, and that the judgment was void. It was said: "A judgment rendered upon such service will bind no one not properly named in the record. This does not mean that the name must be correctly spelled, but it must be so nearly correct as to come within the rule of idem sonans; that is, if the name, as spelled or written in the record, when pronounced according to commonly accepted methods, conveys to the ear a sound practically identical with the sound of the correct name, as commonly pronounced, the designation is sufficient, and no advantage can be taken of the clerical error. . . . Where, however, the record of a judgment entered upon a notice of this kind presents not a mere discrepancy or variation in the spelling of a defendant's name, but the use of a name other and different than that borne by the person against whom such judgment is sought to be enforced, the rule of idem sonans is not applicable, and the adjudication is of no validity against such person. . . . Where the rights of a person are to be concluded by a notice which is merely constructive, not actual, it is right and just that the party who wishes to avail himself of its benefits be held to follow the forms provided by statute."

In other cases it has been held that the doctrine of idem sonans does apply to 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) ber 12, 1908, plaintiff took a judgment against the defendants for $6,070.66, and costs. On January 4, 1909, defendants entered a motion to set aside the judgment and quash the writ. On March 4, 1909, the court entered an order granting defendants' motion. The case is brought here by writ of error.

The contentions of defendants are: (1) That, because of the failure of the plaintiff to publish the notice of attachment, as required by statute, the court never acquired jurisdiction in the case. (2) That, because of the plaintiff's failure to file proof of publication of the notice of attachment, as required by statute, the court, in any event, did not acquire jurisdiction to render judgment in the case. Both of these contentions are opposed by the plaintiff, and while he concedes that, because of lack of personal service of process, it would be the duty of the court to set aside the judgment, and permit the defendants to come in and defend, yet it is his contention that his proceedings and judgment are regular, and the court has only discretionary power to set aside the judgment. In our view of the case, the only question necessary to be considered is whether the publication of notice cases involving the question of the substituted or constructive service of process under the wrong name.

Thus, in Puckett v. Hetzer, 82 Kan. 726, 109 Pac. 285, it was said: "The notice only need be considered. If the proper party were duly served, other mistakes are inconsequential. Where service by publication is undertaken, the notice must state the name of the party to be served; and the question is whether the name 'Joseph Renner,' appearing in a printed notice of that character, looks enough like, and when pronounced sounds enough like, 'Joseph Renner' to stand for the same person. Perfect orthography is not required. Perfect identity of sound is not required. Grant that there is some orthoëpical standard in existence, pronunciation modeled after it will vary in different localities, with different individuals in the same locality, and with the same person at different times; and practical similarity is all that can be insisted upon. . . . Besides what has been said in reference to sound, the appearance of the printed words 'Joseph Renner' was enough like that of 'Joseph Renner' to put a fairly prudent person on guard against a clerical or typographical error. Much mail has been opened without hesitation when the divergence from correct orthography was much greater."

In Rowe v. Palmer, 29 Kan. 337, it was held that a judgment in an action against "Joseph Shaffer," to quiet the title to a certain piece of land, where the service of process was by publication, was valid against "Joseph Shafer," the correct name of the owner of the land. Horton, Ch. J., was fatally defective because defendant William H. Denton was called therein William H. Dunton.

The claim of plaintiff as to this feature of the case is stated by counsel as follows: "It seems to me clearly the name of 'Dunton' is idem sonans to 'Denton,' or perhaps, more properly speaking, the names of 'Bourne and Dunton' are idem sonans to 'Bourne and Denton.' Especially is this so where they are brought into court at the suit of Fred Schoenfeld, and declared against as joint defendants under a written contract relation. It will be interesting in this connection to examine some of the cases in Michigan upon the question of idem sonans. The name of Kinney and Kenney are held idem sonans. Kinney v. Harrett, 46 Mich. 87, 8 N. W. 708. Also Dixon and Dickson. Reading v. Waterman, 46 Mich. 107, 8 N. W. 691. Also Brearley and Brailey. People v. Gosch, 82 Mich. 31, 46 N. W. 101. Also Rutty and Ruthe. Ruthe v. Green Bay & M. R. Co. 37 Wis. 344; Van Benschoten v. Fales, 126 Mich. 176, 85 N. W. 476." An examination of these cases will show that they are clearly distinguishable from the one before us. Only one of them, the last one, was an attachment case. There an alias writ was taken out, and the names of the defendants were therein correctly given, and a personal service of the writ was had upon one of the defendants. In the case at bar there was no personal service.

In Granger v. Superior Ct. Judge, 44 Mich. 384, 6 N. W. 848, Justice Campbell, speaking for the court, said: "Where cases and proceedings are not according to the usual course, and are special in their character, they are held void on slighter grounds than regular suits, because the courts have not the same power over their records to correct them. So where there has been no personal service within the jurisdiction, the doctrine prevails that proceedings not conforming to the statutes are void; but this is on the ground that there has been no service whatever, and the party, therefore, has not been notified in any proper way of anything. The purpose of the statutory methods is to furnish means from which notice may possibly or probably be obtained; but, as a court acting outside of its jurisdiction is not recognized as entitled to obedience, the special statutory methods stand entirely on their own regularity, and, if not regular, cannot be said to have been said: "Within the doctrine of idem sonans, the variance between Shaffer and Shafer is not sufficient to render the judgment . . . a nullity."

In Stein v. Hanson, 99 Minn. 387, 109 N. W. 821, it appeared that the original notice of the expiration of the time for redemption of land from a tax sale was directed to "Hans E. Hanson," while the notice as published was directed to "Hans E. Hansen." It was held that this was a mere irregularity, and that "the rule of idem sonans deprives the contention of merit."

In Lane v. Innes, 43 Minn. 143, 45 N. W. 4, it was held that a published summons which named the defendant as "Berlah M. Plimpton," whereas her true name was "Beulah M. Plimpton," was not such a material change as to be misleading, citing the note in 13 Am. Dec. 233, on the doctrine of idem sonans. Gilfillan, Ch. J., dissents for the following reason: "I think in statutory proceedings to obtain substituted service,—service by notice given through a newspaper,—inserting the name 'Berlah' instead of the true name 'Beulah,' no matter how it occurred, by mistake or otherwise, would vitiate the service. One name is not idem sonans with the other."

The doctrine of idem sonans has been applied in a great number and variety of cases where the service of process was by substitution on publication under the wrong name, and the service was upheld or invalidated without any discussion as to the applicability or nonapplicability of the doctrine to such exceptional cases. No attempt has been made to exhaust these cases, but among them are the following: Grober v. Clements, 71 Ark. 568, 100 Am. St. Rep. 91, 76 S. W. 555; Seaver v. Fitzgerald, 23 Cal. 93; McCash v. Penrod, 131 Iowa, 631, 109 N. W. 180; Harrell v. Neef, 80 Kan. 348, 102 Pac. 838; Entrekim v. Chambers, 11 Kan. 377; Jenne v. Jenne, 7 Mass. 94; Graton v. Chatterton, 2 C. C. A. 402, 10 U. S. App. 267, 51 Fed. 614.

conducted under the statutes. The distinction is obvious, and is not imaginary."

In Steere v. Vanderberg, 67 Mich. 530, 35 N. W. 110, Justice Champlin, speaking for the court, said: "It is a settled rule of law that all exceptional methods of obtaining jurisdiction over persons not found within the state must be confined to the cases and exercised in the way precisely indicated by the statute; and it may also be regarded as settled law that a failure to comply with the statutory requirements where the jurisdiction conferred is special, and no personal service is obtained, renders the judgments null and void. Thompson v. Thomas, 11 Mich. 274; King v. Harrington, 14 Mich. 532; Millar v. Babcock, 29 Mich. 526; Johnson v. Delbridge, 35 Mich. 436; Woolkins v. Haid, 49 Mich. 299, 13 N. W. 598; Rolfe v. Dudley, 58 Mich. 208, 24 N. W. 657."

In Jaffray v. Jennings, 101 Mich. 515, 25 L.R.A. 645, 60 N. W. 52, Justice Hooker, speaking for the court, said: "We start with the proposition that attachment is a harsh and extraordinary remedy, unknown to the common law; and the statutory provisions upon which the right depends, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed, and cannot be extended beyond their terms. See cases cited in 1 Jacob & C. Dig. p. 96, § 1; Estlow v. Hanna, 75 Mich. 219, 224, 42 N. W. 812."

In the opinion in the case of Fanning v. Krapf, 61 Iowa, 417, 14 N. W. 727, 16 N. W. 293, is found the following language: "In considering the question, we must not be misled by the singularity of the name. If a notice to A. B. Smith would not be sufficient if published as to B. A. Smith, then we think that the notice in this case is not sufficient. The question before us concerns the title to real estate, and it would not be possible to base any safe rule upon the distinction between names that are peculiar and those that are not peculiar. Notice by publication, even where there is no misnomer, does not afford a very strong natural presumption that the fact of the pendency of the action will be brought to the defendant's actual knowledge. Notice by this mode is allowable only out of necessity. It must often happen that great injustice is done and great hardship suffered. We are not disposed to open the door any wider than necessity requires. Whoever undertakes to give notice by publication, and misnames the defendant, is without excuse. It requires very little care to publish the defendant's name correctly. We are evidently justified in holding the plaintiff who gives notice by publication to a considerable degree of strictness. If we were to adopt the rule contended for by the ap- 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

pellee, that not only can the Christian names be entirely omitted, but the initial letters of the Christian names transposed, this might become the favorite mode of giving notice by publication. It appears to us that we should open the door to mischief of which no one could see the end."

In Hubner v. Reickhoff, 103 Iowa, 368, 64 Am. St. Rep. 191, 72 N. W. 540, it was held that where service in an action for divorce against a nonresident is by publication, and defendant makes default, the court cannot assume that the name "Keesel" in the notice should be understood as "Keisel," the name of the defendant, on the principle of idem sonans, and the decree was held void. See also Estlow v. Hanna, 75 Mich. 219, 42 N. W. 812, and Cochrane v. Johnson, 95 Mich. 67, 54 N. W. 707.

Applying the principles stated in these cases, we think it clear that in an attachment case against Benjamin W. Bourne and William H. Denton, nonresidents, where no one is personally served with process, the court does not get jurisdiction because of the publication of a notice describing the defendants as Benjamin W. Bourne and William H. Dunton.

Judgment is affirmed.

FRANK W. MOLLOY, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF NEW ROCHELLE, Resp't.

(198 N. Y. 402, 92 N. E. 94.)

Municipal contracts — letting in violation of statute — remedy of bidder.

1. A statutory requirement that contracts for the performance of municipal work shall be let to the lowest bidder does not

Note. — Remedy of lowest bidder for refusal of authorities to award contract to him.

It is assumed in this note that the bidder who is seeking to enforce his rights is the lowest bidder, or the lowest responsible or best bidder, so that, under the law, it is the duty of the proper public officials to award him the contract; and the question to be treated here is whether, assuming that he is entitled to the contract and its benefits, he has any remedy, and, if so, what remedy, if the officials refuse to accept his bid, or, having accepted it, refuse to enter into a formal contract with him, or otherwise seek to deprive him of the benefit of his bid. What constitutes a bidder the lowest bidder is not discussed.

give such bidder a right of action against a municipality for his lost profits in case the contract is, contrary to the statute, awarded to a higher bidder.

Same — bid as effecting contract.

2. The making of the lowest bid for the performance of municipal work, in response to an advertisement, does not effect a contract with the municipality, a breach of which will give the bidder a right of action, although the statute requires the contract to be let to the lowest bidder, where the advertisement reserves the right to reject any or all bids.

(May 10, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment entered upon an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second De-

Hence, the right of the officers to exercise a discretion as to who is the lowest bidder is not treated. So, too, cases are omitted where the deciding point was the right to reject any and all bids, and to abandon the work or readvertise. As to right of lowest bidder on a public contract, see note to Anderson v. St. Louis Public Schools, 26 L.R.A. 707. As to sufficiency of specifications where public contract is required to be awarded to lowest bidder, see note to Hannan v. Board of Education, post, 214.

If a duty is imposed for the benefit of one person or class of persons, and another's advantage from its discharge is merely incidental, and not a part of the design of the statute, no such right is created in favor of the latter as forms the subject of an action at law or of a suit in equity. As sustaining this general proposition, see, inter alia, Colorado Paving Co. v. Murphy, 37 L.R.A. 630, 23 C. C. A. 631, 49 U. S. App. 17, 78 Fed. 28, appeal dismissed for want of jurisdiction in 166 U. S. 719, 41 L. ed. 1188, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 987; Talbot Paving Co. v. Detroit, 109 Mich. 657, 63 Ann. St. Rep. 604, 67 N. W. 979,—which are all cases relating to rights of lowest bidder.

The usual provision in municipal charters, that contracts for public work shall be awarded to the lowest or lowest reliable and responsible bidder, was not enacted to furnish employment for contractors, or to benefit a bidder for such work, but with the design to benefit and protect the property holders and taxpayers of the municipalities. Colorado Paving Co. v. Murphy, supra; Vincent v. Ellis, 116 Iowa, 609, 88 N. W. 836; Talbot Paving Co. v. Detroit, supra; East River Gaslight Co. v. Donnelly, 93 N. Y. 557; Carmichael v. McCourt, 27 Ohio C. C. 775; Com. ex rel. Snyder v. Mitchell, 82 Pa. 343; and other cases.

This principle, therefore, has been held to be fatal to the right of the lowest bidder to any relief, either in law or equity, for failure of the authorities to award him the contract, or to prevent the contract being awarded to another. It goes not to defeat any particular cause of action, but to department, overruling exceptions by plaintiff which were ordered by a Trial Term, Part 2, for Westchester County, to be heard by the Appellate Division in the first instance, and dismissing the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful failure to award plaintiff a contract for certain public work. Affirmed.

Statement by Chase, J.:

The defendant's charter provides: "Whenever any expenditures to be made or incurred by the common council or city board or any city officer in behalf of the city, for work to be done, or materials or supplies to be furnished, . . . shall exceed $200, the city clerk shall advertise for and re-feat the right to any relief. Colorado Paving Co. v. Murphy, supra.

Injunction.

Hence, although taxpayers and property holders, whose rights of property may be injuriously affected by the fraudulent or arbitrary violation of this and similar provisions of city charters, may maintain a suit to enjoin such action by public officers whose duty it is to comply with them, yet the lowest reliable and responsible bidder for a contract for public work has no such vested or absolute right to a compliance with such provisions of the statutes as will enable him to maintain an injunction against their violation by public officials, because these provisions were not enacted for his benefit. Colorado Paving Co. v. Murphy and Carmichael v. McCourt, supra; Adams v. Ives, 63 N. Y. 650.

But it has been held that where the officials are vested with the right to reject all bids or accept the lowest, the court, at the suit of the lowest bidder, may enjoin the officials from entering into a contract with a higher bidder, but will not, by mandamus, compel them to award the contract to the lowest bidder. Akron v. France, 24 Ohio C. C. 63.

One claiming to be the lowest bidder for cleaning certain streets cannot, when his bid is rejected and the contract awarded to another, have a temporary injunction against the officials, forbidding them from proceeding under such contract, continued in force until litigation regarding the rights of such bidder is finally determined, since such injunction could be of little value to such bidder, and might seriously affect the public health. McCafferty v. Glazier, 10 How. Pr. 475.

The lowest bidder for laying a street car track, whose only competitor was an existing street railway company, cannot, when the council rejects both bids, and allows the street railway company to exercise a right given in their franchise to build the track as an extension of their existing tracks, have such construction of the tracks ceive proposals therefor, in such manner as the common council, or as the board or officer charged with making such contract, shall prescribe, and the contract therefor shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, who shall execute a bond to said city, with one or more sureties, being freeholders, for the faithful performance of the contract." Laws 1899, chap. 128, § 33. The city clerk, in pursuance of said statute and resolutions of the common council of the defendant, published a notice as follows: "Sealed proposals will be received by the city clerk at his office . . . for the regulating and grading of . . . in the city of New Rochelle, upon plans and specifications prepared by the city engineer, which may be procured upon application at his office in the city hall building. . . . A certified check to the amount of $1,000 must accompany each bid. . . . The common council reserves the right to reject any and all bids. . . ." In pursuance of such notice, six bids were filed in accordance with said advertisement. The bids were in items which required a computation to determine the aggregate amount of each bid. Accompanying the plaintiff's bid was a certified check for $1,000, and a written statement by a responsible surety company that in case the contract was awarded to the plaintiff, such surety company would become bound as such surety and guarantor for the faithful performance of the contract, and execute a bond therefor, as required by the statute. The plaintiff was a responsible enjoined. Johnson v. West Side Street R. Co. 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 71.

In Campbell v. Philadelphia, 10 W. N. C. 221, it was held that the lowest bidder, whose bid had been accepted, was entitled to an injunction forbidding the officials from inserting in the formal contract a provision not contained in the advertisements, whereby payment of part of his compensation would be delayed. Here the acceptance of his bid was treated as making a contract, the terms of which would be gathered from the advertisement and bid, and which the officials could not change, and the case is distinguished from one where the officials had refused to accept the lowest bid.

Injunction will not lie at the suit of the lowest bidder, who claims to have a valid contract with the municipality, to prevent the municipality from entering into a contract with another, since, if his claim is correct, he has an adequate remedy at law. Riker v. Oakland Circuit Judge, 138 Mich. 181, 101 N. W. 229.

A taxpayer having a substantial interest in the controversy as such is not debarred from bringing an action to enjoin the awarding of a contract to one not the lowest bidder, by the fact that he was himself the lowest bidder, and has thus also an ulterior motive. Times Pub. Co. v. Everett, 9 Wash. 518, 43 Am. St. Rep. 865, 37 Pac. 695; Mazet v. Pittsburgh, 137 Pa. 548, 20 Atl. 693; Times Printing Co. v. Seattle, 25 Wash. 149, 64 Pac. 940; Hannan v. Board of Education (Okla.) post, 214, 107 Pac. 646.

Mandamus.

Principally on the ground that such statutes were not enacted for the benefit of the lowest bidder, it has been held that mandamus will not lie at the suit of the lowest bidder, to compel the public officials to enter into a contract with him. Vincent v. Ellis, supra; People ex rel. Belden v. Contracting Board, 27 N. Y. 378; People ex rel. Ryan v. Aldridge, 83 Hun, 279, 31 N. Y. Supp. 920 (where bid was accepted, but no formal contract made); Com. ex rel. Snyder v. Mitchell, supra; American Pav. Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Wagner, 139 Pa. 623, 21 Atl. 160 (where, however, the official reserved and exercised the right to refuse to grant the contract to anyone); Com. ex rel. Hackett v. Philadelphia, 13 W. N. C. 61; State ex rel. Phelan v. Board of Education, 24 Wis. 683 (will not lie as matter of right).

But a contrary ruling has been made in many cases, usually without much, if any, discussion of the reason. State ex rel. Whedon v. York County, 13 Neb. 57, 12 N. W. 817 (in which mandamus was issued, it being assumed without argument that relator was entitled thereto if he was shown to be the lowest bidder); State ex rel. Woodruff-Dunlap Printing Co. v. Cornell, 52 Neb. 25, 71 N. W. 961; People ex rel. Putnam v. Buffalo County, 4 Neb. 150 (dictum); Marsh v. State, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 372, 96 N. W. 520; People ex rel. Vickerman v. Contracting Board, 46 Barb. 254; People ex rel. Mathews v. Buffalo, 5 Misc. 36, 25 N. Y. Supp. 50; Boren v. Darke County, 21 Ohio St. 311; Beaver v. Institution for Blind, 19 Ohio St. 97; State v. Marion County, 39 Ohio St. 188.

Mandamus will not be granted in favor of the best bidder, to compel the execution of a contract with him by the municipal authorities, after one has been in fact let to another. State ex rel. Prince v. Police Jury, 108 La. 311, 32 So. 363 (whether it would lie before, not decided); Talbot Paving Co. v. Detroit, 91 Mich. 262, 51 N. W. 933; People ex rel. Belden v. Contracting Board, supra; Weed v. Beach, 56 How. Pr. 470; People ex rel. Gibb v. Board of Education, 5 N. Y. Supp. 392; Re Hilton Bridge Constr. Co. 13 App. Div. 24, 43 N. Y. Supp. 99 (where successful bidder was not made a party); Capital Printing Co. v. Hoey, 124 N. C. 767, 33 S. E. 160; State ex rel. Nevina v. Printing Comrs. 18 Ohio St. 386; Deckman v. Oak Harbor, 10 Ohio C. C. 409 (in which 90 per cent of the work had been done by another, to whom the contract had been awarded); Detroit Free Press v. State Auditors, 47 Mich. 145, 10 N. W. 171.

The reason sometimes given is that the result of ordering a second contract for the same work would be to subject the state to bidder. After the opening of the bids, the common council referred all the bids to the street and sidewalk committee and the city engineer to tabulate and report at an adjourned meeting, and the meeting then adjourned to a day specified. On the adjourned day, the committee to which the bids were referred reported, by which report it appeared that the aggregate amount of the plaintiff's bid was $61,626.30, and that he was the lowest bidder. Without discussion or further consideration, a resolution was then offered and passed, as follows: "Resolved, that the bid of F. W. Molloy (plaintiff) be rejected." Thereupon a further resolution was adopted, as follows: "On motion . . . the contract for the improvement of North avenue, Horton avenue, and Brook street is awarded to Ensignor Brothers, at the sum of $64,204.40." The plaintiff thereupon filed a protest against the action of the common council, and subsequently brought this action.

At the trial term, the plaintiff, in addition to showing the facts as stated, offered evidence to show that his profits on the contract would have been $16,889.40, and rested. The court thereupon dismissed the complaint, and ordered that the exceptions taken during the trial be heard in the first instance at the appellate division, and that entry of judgment upon the verdict aforesaid be suspended in the meantime until the hearing and decision by said appellate division of said exceptions. The appellate the payment of double compensation. People ex rel. Belden v. Contracting Board, supra.

Of course, jurisdictions which hold that mandamus will not issue at all at the suit of the lowest bidder, to compel the award of the contract to him, would, a fortiori, make the same ruling when the contract was awarded to another.

But the contrary ruling has been made. Marsh v. State and Boren v. Darke County, supra (in which some work had been done by the successful but higher bidder).

And mandamus was allowed in favor of the lowest bidder for an entire work, although the public officials had, contrary to law, divided up the work, and attempted to award portions of it to others. State ex rel. Woodruff-Dunlap Printing Co. v. Cornell, supra.

The highest bidder at a tax sale may enforce his bid by compelling the treasurer to issue a certificate of sale for the land purchased. Richardson County v. Miles, 7 Neb. 123 (dictum).

An official whose duty is limited to passing on the sufficiency of bonds of bidders, who refuses to pass on the sufficiency of the bond of the lowest bidder, on account of certain untenable objections to the legality of the work itself, may, at the suit of such lowest bidder, be compelled by mandamus to make a decision; but as his duty calls for an exercise of judgment, the court will not control his discretion by indicating what his decision shall be. People ex rel. McKown v. Green, 50 How. Pr. 503.

In People ex rel. Mathews v. Buffalo, supra, where the board of aldermen wrongfully rejected a bid because of the insufficiency of the bond, when no bond was required by law, a mandamus was issued, requiring the board to consider the relator's bid as valid and regular, and that they determine whether or not the relator is responsible, and the lowest bidder, free from deception, fraud, or collusion, and if they find in the affirmative, to award the contract to the relator.

that when a city council by resolution lets a contract for paving a street to the lowest bidder, the latter has a right to have the proper contract written out, in accordance with his bid, so accepted, and mandamus will issue to compel its execution.

It was also held in People ex rel. John Single Paper Co. v. Edgcomb, 112 App. Div. 604, 98 N. Y. Supp. 965 (two judges dissenting), that where the advertisement for bids for printing contains the illegal requirement that only union labor be employed on the work, and the lowest bid is accepted, the board whose duty it is to pass on the sufficiency of the bond, which refuses to approve it on the sole ground that it does not contain the illegal requirement, may be compelled by mandamus to accept the bond. The above two cases were doubtless decided on the theory that the acceptance of the bid completed the contract.

One who was the highest bidder for the privilege of leasing public lands, who refused to accept the lease when offered at the amount of his bid, cannot compel the board of public lands to accept a lower bid made by him at a subsequent competition, though he was then the highest bidder, since he did not act in good faith. State ex rel. Reed v. Scott, 18 Neb. 597, 26 N. W. 386.

As to right of lowest bidder to mandamus after acceptance of his bid, see also infra, under title "Damages."

Action for damages—in general.

The lowest bidder, whose bid has been rejected in favor of another, has no right of action at law to recover against the municipality profits which he might have made had his bid been accepted. Talbot Paving Co. v. Detroit, 109 Mich. 657, 63 Am. St. Rep. 604, 67 N. W. 979; Smith v. New York, 10 N. Y. 504.

Nor has he a right of action for damages against the official personally, when the latter, in good faith, refuses to award him the contract. American Pav. Co. v. Wagner, 139 Pa. 623, 21 Atl. 160.

And it has even been held that he has no right of action for damages against the division overruled the exceptions, and judgment was entered, dismissing the complaint.

Messrs. L. Laflin Kellogg and Alfred C. Patté, with Messrs. Kellogg & Rose, for appellant:

The plaintiff being concededly the lowest responsible bidder, the arbitrary rejection of his bid, and the acceptance of a higher bid by the common council, was absolutely unauthorized and illegal.

People ex rel. Coughlin v. Gleason, 121 N. Y. 631, 25 N. E. 4.

The mandatory provisions of the charter entitled the plaintiff, as the lowest responsible bidder, to the contract, as a matter of law; and a refusal by the city to enter into a written contract with him therefor was a breach entitling him to damages.

officials who refused to declare him to be the lowest bidder, and to award the contract to him, even though it be granted that he was in fact the lowest bidder, and entitled to the contract, and though this was known to the officials, and though they acted maliciously in refusing to declare him to be the lowest bidder, since their determination is judicial in its nature. But if his bid has been accepted, and he has a clear legal right to have a contract executed, he may sue for damages, but cannot have mandamus to compel the execution of the contract, as his remedy at law is sufficient. ated a contract enforceable at law, rendering mandamus unnecessary.

When a bid has been duly accepted by the proper officials of a municipality, it becomes a contract, and cannot be thereafter revoked by the municipality, and a refusal on its part to carry it out will subject it to an action for damages. Safety Insulated Wire & Cable Co. v. Baltimore, supra.

Right to appeal.

In some states, by statute, an appeal lies from the action of the county board or other body having power to let contracts to the lowest bidder. Under such a statute, it has been held that the court, on appeal from the action of the board in awarding a contract to one not the lowest bidder, may order the contract to be awarded to the lowest bidder. Baum v. Sweeney, 5 Wash. 712, 32 Pac. 778; State ex rel. De Rackin v. Allen, 8 Wash. 168, 35 Pac. 609.

When an appeal lies, resort cannot be had to mandamus, as the right of appeal is an adequate remedy. State ex rel. De Rackin v. Allen, supra.

Certiorari.

In Townsend v. Copeland, 56 Cal. 612, it was held that the action of a board of supervisors of a county in rejecting a bid for county printing is not judicial in its nature, and hence cannot be reviewed by certiorari, at the instance of the lowest bid-

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Provisions similar to the one in the defendant's charter, from which we have quoted, are common in municipal charters everywhere. Such provisions are intended to prevent favoritism. They result from an effort to prevent official action being influenced by improper motives. The same effort to prevent improper official action finds expression in village law (Consol. Laws, chap. 64), § 332, general city law (Consol. Laws, chap. 21), § 3, and in many municipal charters, where it is provided that an officer therein shall not be directly or indirectly interested in a contract which he, or a board of which he is a member, is authorized to make on behalf of the municipality. Municipal officers acting in behalf of the municipality should not have a personal interest in determining who shall be awarded a contract, or be affected in any way in their official action towards a favorite among the bidders. Such contracts should be made with the lowest responsible bidder therefor, because there is less opportunity in contracts so let for improper special agreements to the disadvantage of the corporation, and such contracts are, in consequence thereof, and because of the competition, more economical for the municipi-pality. The meaning and purpose of provisions in municipal charters requiring that contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidders therefor have been repeatedly defined and stated by the courts.

In Brady v. New York, 20 N. Y. 312, 316, the court, referring to a similar provision in the charter of the city of New York, says: "It was based upon motives of public economy, and originated, perhaps, in some degree of distrust of the officers to whom the duty of making contracts for the public service was committed. If executed according to its intention, it will preclude favoritism and jobbing, and such was its obvious purpose. It does not require any argument to show that a contract made in violation of its requirements is null and void." In People ex rel. Coughlin v. Gleason, 121 N. Y. 631, 634, 25 N. E. 4, the court, referring to a similar provision in the charter of Long Island City, says: "This provision was inserted in the charter undoubtedly to prevent favoritism, corruption, extravagance, and improvidence in the procurement of work and supplies for the city, and should be so administered and construed as fairly and reasonably to accomplish this purpose."

Such a statutory provision, enacted as a protection to the corporation, cannot be

der. The court said: "The board, in determining to whom the contract should be awarded, was absolutely obliged to award the contract to the lowest bidder, or it had a right to exercise its discretion in the matter. If it was obliged to give the contract to the lowest bidder, it follows that there was nothing in the power which was judicial in its nature, but it was purely ministerial. If, on the other hand, the board possessed a discretionary power in the premises, the most that can be said against its action is that it was erroneous, and not an act in excess of its jurisdiction. In neither case is certiorari the proper remedy."

It was similarly held in People ex rel. Dean v. Contra Costa County, 122 Cal. 421, 55 Pac. 131, that the action of a board of supervisors in granting a franchise in pursuance of an act requiring it to grant all franchises to the highest bidder is legislative, and not judicial, and hence that certiorari will not lie at the suit of one claiming to be the highest bidder, to annul the action of the board in granting the franchise to another.

So, in Hammer v. Smith, 11 Ariz. 420, 94 Pac. 1121, it was held that though a statute requires "the contract (for public printing) to be let to the best responsible bidder," one claiming to be the best bidder cannot have the action of a board of supervisors in awarding the contract to another reviewed by certiorari, which, by statute, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"shall be granted in all cases where the inferior tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer," since the function exercised by the board is not a judicial one. The court said: "In the case before us there is no issue, although there is demanded the exercise of both judgment and discretion in determining who is the best responsible bidder. There is no issue, because there is but one party in interest,—the public. As against one another, the bidders present an issue, but this issue is merely incidental. Its adjudication is not the ultimate. No bidder has a right to the contract. None has a right or privilege of any sort to be conserved by the board. To be a party to a judicial determination, one must present, as against his adversary, a right or privilege to be maintained or denied. The discretion and judgment exercised in this matter are those of an agent, seeking the best interest of his principal in letting a contract. They are executive discretion and judgment, not judicial."

But there are cases in which certiorari has been successfully resorted to by the lowest bidder to set aside the action of a public board in awarding the contract to another. State, Connolly, Prosecutor, v. Hudson County, 57 N. J. L. 286, 30 Atl. 548; Faist v. Hoboken, 72 N. J. L. 361, 60 Atl. 1120; Jacobson v. Board of Education (N. J. L.) 64 Atl. 609. R. A. E.

used to make a disobedience of its provisions by the municipal officers a double source of punishment to the municipality. If the plaintiff is right in his contention, then a disobedience of the provisions of the statute will make the municipality pay the difference between the lowest bid and the bid for which the contract is made, and also the profit that the lowest responsible bidder would have made if the statute had not been violated. But such is not the purpose of the charter provision. In Strong v. Campbell, 11 Barb. 135, 138, the court says: "Wherever an action is brought for a breach of duty imposed by statute, the party bringing it must show that he had an interest in the performance of the duty, and that the duty was imposed for his benefit. But where the duty was created or imposed for the benefit of another, and the advantage to be derived to the party prosecuting, by its performance, is merely incidental, and no part of the design of the statute, no such right is created as forms the subject of an action." In East River Gaslight Co. v. Donnelly, 93 N. Y. 557, 561, the court, referring to a similar statute, says: "The statute merely provides a scheme for the prudent administration of the affairs of the city, and has imposed a duty upon the defendants to carry it out. This duty appears, from the plaintiff's showing, to have been violated. But the duty is a public duty to the city or people at large, not to the plaintiff or for the benefit of individuals, or the promotion of any private interest, nor has the statute given to the plaintiff or any person an action for its violation." The court used the language quoted in an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, who composed the common council of Long Island City, to recover against them individually the damages which he claimed to have incurred by reason of their failure to obey the statute. Such language, however, is applicable to this action, in which the plaintiff seeks to make the municipality respond in damages for the failure of its officers to obey a statute enacted for the express purpose of protecting the municipality in its property rights. The statute was not enacted for the benefit of the plaintiff, and he cannot recover by reason of its provisions. Talbot Paving Co. v. Detroit, 109 Mich. 657, 63 Am. St. Rep. 604, 67 N. W. 979.

Although the plaintiff asserts rights under the statute, he also claims to be entitled to recover on contract. No contractual relation can arise merely from a bid, unless, by the terms of the statute and the advertisement, a bid in pursuance thereof is, as a matter of law, an acceptance of an offer, wholly apart from any action on 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the part of the municipality or any of its officers. Such, plainly, is not the plaintiff's case. The statute and the advertisement in this case call for proposals. The common council reserved the right to reject any and all bids. Under a statute requiring that all contracts shall be awarded to the lowest bidder, the body awarding the contract, acting in good faith, may refuse to so award the contract if they deem it for the best interest of the city to do so, and may reject all of the bids and readvertise. Walsh v. New York, 113 N. Y. 142, 20 N. E. 825.

This court in Erving v. New York, 131 N. Y. 133, 138, 29 N. E. 1101, 1103, says: "The awarding of the contract on the part of the officer to one of several bidders requires the exercise on his part of judgment and discretion, and the award itself should be manifested by some formal official act on his part, and ordinarily reduced to writing, and made a part of the records in his department. In no other way can the rights of the parties be preserved, at least, prior to the actual execution of the contract. The mere arithmetical operation of ascertaining which bid is the lowest does not constitute an award. The duty of the commissioner to examine the proposals and award the contract is judicial in its nature and character . . . and the award is the result of a judicial act." The plaintiff's bid in this case was never accepted. It was expressly rejected by the common council. The plaintiff, therefore, does not sustain a contractual relation with the defendant, and cannot sustain this action as upon contract. The authorities mentioned by the plaintiff are all distinguishable from this case. They are each based upon an accepted bid.

In Lynch v. New York, 2 App. Div. 213, 37 N. Y. Supp. 798, plaintiff sought to recover damages in consequence of the defendant's refusal to execute a contract whereby the plaintiff was to perform certain work in the construction of a sewer in the city of New York. The plaintiff presented a bid for the work, pursuant to an advertisement, and he was thereafter duly notified that his bid was the lowest, and that the contract had been awarded to him. The notice to the plaintiff was given in accordance with the action and determination of the commissioner of street improvements, to whom the bids were delivered. Six days thereafter, the commissioner notified the plaintiff that his bid was rejected on account of an irregularity therein. The defendant then refused to execute the formal contract with the plaintiff, and this action was brought. It was held that the proposal by the plaintiff and the acceptance thereof by the commissioner constituted a contract, binding upon both, and that it was then too late to reject all bids, and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for his damages. In People ex rel. Lunney v. Campbell, 72 N. Y. 496, 498, the relator sought by mandamus to compel the defendant, as commissioner of public works of the city of New York, to enter into a contract with him for certain grading, etc. It appeared that the relator was the lowest bidder for the contract, and that his bid had been accepted and the contract awarded to him. The special term denied the application for a mandamus, and the order was affirmed by the general term of the supreme court, and also by this court. This court says: "There appears to be no question that if the proceedings were all regular and conducted according to law, as is asserted, and the relator has in all respects conformed to the provisions of the city charter, that he has a right of action against the city for all damages which he has sustained by reason of the refusal of the commissioner to execute and carry out the contract. No rule is better settled by the decision of the courts than that in such a case mandamus will not lie." In Pennell v. New York, 17 App. Div. 455, 45 N. Y. Supp. 229, the plaintiffs were the lowest bidders for certain work in the city of New York. The bid was sent by the commissioner of public works to the comptroller, for his approval of the sureties on the contract. A change in the sureties was made by mutual consent, and the plaintiffs were informed orally by the commissioner of public works that he would execute a contract for the work in question. Subsequently, the commissioner refused to execute the contract. It was held that the bidder was entitled to recover the damages sustained by him by reason of such refusal.

In People ex rel. Ryan v. Aldridge, 83 Hun, 279, 31 N. Y. Supp. 920, the common council of Rochester advertised for proposals for a survey of a portion of the territory of the city, and directed that the mayor execute a contract for the work to the lowest competent surveyor bidding therefor. The bid of the relator was accepted, and the work was awarded to him by resolution. Shortly thereafter, the common council voted to reconsider its previous action, and indefinitely postponed further action thereon. This proceeding was brought to compel the execution of the contract with the relator. Held that, if a municipality has contracted with a party to do certain work, and afterwards refuses to have it done, the municipality does not thereby relieve itself from the obligation of the contract, but the remedy of the contractor is confined to his action for damages resulting from its breach.

It is urged that, unless bidders are given some rights under the statutes mentioned, it will result in the statutes being wholly disregarded. The provisions of such statutes are always rigidly enforced by the courts when their enforcement is sought by one for whose benefit they are enacted. Actions upon contracts let in violation of such statutes are not sustained. Dickinson v. Poughkeepsie, 75 N. Y. 65; McDonald v. New York, 68 N. Y. 23, 23 Am. Rep. 144; City Improv. Co. v. Broderick, 125 Cal. 139, 57 Pac. 776; La France Fire Engine Co. v. Syracuse, 33 Misc. 516, 68 N. Y. Supp. 894; Walton v. New York, 26 App. Div. 76, 49 N. Y. Supp. 615; Smith, Modern Law of Mun. Corp. § 746. The petitions of contractors who have taken contracts in violation of such statutes, to compel municipal officers to pay, in pursuance of such contracts, are denied. People ex rel. Coughlin v. Gleason, 121 N. Y. 631, 25 N. E. 4. Assessments involving expenditures in violation of such statutes are set aside upon the petition of taxpayers. Re Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank, 75 N. Y. 388, People ex rel. Weiss v. Buffalo (Sup.) 84 N. Y. Supp. 434; Re Merriam, 84 N. Y. 596.

An action may be maintained by a taxpayer to prevent any illegal official act by an officer, agent, commissioner, or other person, acting on behalf of a municipal corporation. General Municipal Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 24), § 51; Code Civ. Proc. § 1925. A taxpayer otherwise qualified to maintain an action under the statutes to prevent illegal official acts and a waste of public funds is not otherwise disqualified because specially and peculiarly interested in the event. Gage v. New York, 110 App. Div. 403, 97 N. Y. Supp. 157; Times Pub. Co. v. Everett, 9 Wash. 518, 43 Am. St. Rep. 865, 37 Pac. 695.

Counsel for the appellant, in his oral argument, requested that we should discuss in this opinion the question of the power of the courts in any case to direct by mandamus the officer or board charged with the duty of entering into municipal contracts as to which of several bidders therefor should be awarded the contract. That question is not presented on this appeal for our determination. It should be left for discussion and determination in a case where the question is directly and necessarily involved, unaffected by this decision, except so far as it is controlled by what we have actually and necessarily decided herein.

The plaintiff cannot sustain this action, and the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Cullen, Ch. J., and Haight, Werner, Willard Bartlett, and Hiscock, JJ., concur.

Vann, J., concurring:

I concur in the result upon two grounds: (1) The plaintiff had no right to recover damages from the defendant for breach of contract, because there was no contract, as is clearly shown by Judge Chase, in his opinion. (2) The remedy of the plaintiff was by mandamus to compel the execution of a contract in accordance with the statute. He was the lowest responsible bidder. He tendered adequate security, and the statute commanded the common council, unless they rejected all bids, to award the contract to him. People ex rel. Coughlin v. Gleason, 121 N. Y. 631, 25 N. E. 4. The rejection of his bid, and the acceptance of one higher by several thousand dollars, was arbitrary and illegal. It was presumptively corrupt, for favoritism is one form of corruption. For such a violation of law by those who represent the city, there should be a remedy against the city, and, as it cannot be by way of damages for breach of contract, it should be by mandamus. Otherwise competition may be stifled through the want of inducement to bid for public work.

The opinion in People ex rel. Lunney v. Campbell, 72 N. Y. 496, in so far as it declares that there is no remedy by mandamus in such cases, was obiter, and should be disregarded. At least, if the court is of the opinion that mandamus will not lie, a suggestion should be made to the legislature, for the public as well as the lowest bidder need protection. In many cases the public can be adequately protected only through the lowest bidder. According to the law, as apparently left by the decision about to be made, the city is helpless, because it is in the hands of the wrongdoers, and, if the lowest bidder has no remedy, there is no one impelled by duty or self-interest to prevent the violation of an important provision, common to nearly all municipal charters, designed to protect the public, but now practically useless.

JAMES F. GOODLOVE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF OHIO.

(82 Ohio St. 365, 92 N. E. 491.)

Indictment — descriptive matter — surplusage.

1. An allegation in an indictment, descriptive of that which is essential to the charge therein made, is a material allegation, and cannot be rejected as surplusage.

Homicide — identity of deceased — evidence — sufficiency.

2. Where an indictment charges the accused with having assaulted and killed one "Percy Stuckey, alias Frank McCormick," evidence that the defendant assaulted and killed a person commonly known as Frank McCormick will not sustain a verdict of guilty against the defendant, unless it also be shown that the Frank McCormick assaulted and killed and Percy Stuckey were one and the same person.

Headnotes by the COURT.

Note. — Necessity of proving that person bore both real name and the alias by which the indictment purports to describe him.

No other case has been found in which the exact question presented in GOODLOVE v. STATE has been raised.

In Evans v. State, 62 Ala. 6, it was held unnecessary to prove that the defendant, designated under an alias, was known and called by both names, but that where he was identified by one of them, and it was shown that he was known in the community by that name, that was all that was necessary.

In Falkner v. State, 151 Ala. 77, 44 So. 409, where an indictment for murder alleged the killing of "Asaria Simmons, alias Dummy," the court said that proof of the alias "Dummy" met all the requirements; but this was apparently in reply to a contention that the indictment required proof that the deceased was known as "Asaria Dummy" or "Dummy Simmons;" and it does not appear whether or not it was proven that the true name of the deceased was "Asaria Simmons."

Under the rule that the indictment must be drawn with sufficient certainty fully to apprise the accused of the crime with which he is charged, it is generally held that this is sufficiently done in an indict-

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wyandot County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, convicting defendant of manslaughter. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sheets & West and Meck & Stalter, for plaintiff in error:

The name of the assaulted person, being a necessary allegation, must be proved as laid, and any variance therein will be fatal.

Messrs. H. H. Newell and D. C. Parker, for the State:

The name "Percy Stuckey" was surplusage, not vital to the case.

Com. v. Hunt, 4 Pick. 252; Com. v. Randall, 4 Gray, 36; State v. Craighead, 32 Mo. 561.

An indictment for homicide which states the name by which deceased was known among acquaintances is sufficient, even though it be not the true name.

No prejudice could accrue to the accused for any change or omission of one or more of the names given in the indictment as those of the deceased, or even of the accused, if the identity of the deceased or accused was established by the proof.

Crew, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the October term, 1908, of the court of common pleas of Wyandot county, the grand jury of said county found and presented against James F. Goodlove, the plaintiff in error herein, a certain indictment of which the following is a copy.

The State of Ohio } ss:
Wyandot County }

In the court of common pleas, Wyandot count, Ohio, of the term of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight. The jurors of the grand jury of the county of Wyandot and state of Ohio, then and there duly impaneled, sworn, and charged to inquire of and present all offenses whatever committed within the limits of said county, on their said oaths, in the name and by the authority of the state of Ohio, do find and present that James F. Goodlove, late of said county, on the 6th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight, at the county of Wyandment for murder when the evidence shows that the deceased was known to the accused by the name alleged.

An illustration of the application of this test is furnished by People v. Lake, 110 N. Y. 61, 6 Am. St. Rep. 344, 17 N. E. 146. An indictment for incest gave the name of the daughter as Georgiana Towne, commonly known as Georgiana Lake; but the proofs showed that she was named Georgiana Jeanette Lake, and generally spoken of as Nettie Lake. It was nevertheless held that the indictment was sufficient to sustain a conviction, she being present at the trial and identified by the witnesses.

If the name "Percy Stuckey," in GOODLOVE v. STATE, had been altogether omitted, and the indictment had referred to the deceased merely by his assumed name, "Frank McCormick," the indictment would undoubtedly have been good, for the accused could not have been prejudiced.

In Walter v. People, 32 N. Y. 147, it was held that an indictment for homicide which states the name by which the deceased was 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

known among his acquaintances is sufficient, even though it is not his true name.

And in Rye v. State, 8 Tex. App. 163, it was held that the requirement that an indictment must allege the name of the injured party is to apprise the accused of the accusation against him, and is sufficiently complied with in an indictment for murder, where the evidence shows that he was known to the accused by the name charged.

In Thomas v. State, 49 Fla. 123, 38 So. 516, it was held that where the evidence shows that the person killed was known by the name alleged in the indictment, a conviction will not be set aside because there was evidence that he was also known and called by another name.

So, also, in the following cases, it was held that the person murdered may be described in the indictment by the name by which he was commonly called, though differing from his name by baptism: Com. v. Desmar-teau, 16 Gray, 1; Pyke v. State, 47 Fla. 93, 36 So. 577; People v. Woods, 65 Cal. 121, 3 Pac. 466.

Goodlove, a certain pistol then and there charged with gunpowder and leaden bullets, which said pistol he, the said James F. Goodlove, then and there in his right hand had and held, then and there, unlawfully, purposely, and of deliberate and premeditated malice, did discharge and shoot off to, against, and upon the said Frank McCormick, with the intent aforesaid, and that the said James F. Goodlove, with the leaden bullets aforesaid, out of the pistol aforesaid, by force of the gunpowder aforesaid, by the said James F. Goodlove then and there discharged and shot off as aforesaid, him, the said Frank McCormick, in and upon the upper right side of the back of him, the said Frank McCormick, then and there unlawfully, purposely, and of deliberate and premeditated malice did strike, penetrate, and wound, with the intent aforesaid, so as aforesaid discharged, and shot out of the pistol aforesaid, by the said James F. Goodlove, in and upon the upper right side of the back of him, the said Frank McCormick, one mortal wound of the depth of 4 inches and of the breadth of half an inch, of which mortal wound he, the said Frank McCormick, then and there died: and so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths and affirmations aforesaid, do say that the said James F. Goodlove him, the said Frank McCormick, in the manner and by the names aforesaid, unlawfully, purposely, and of deliberate and premeditated malice, did kill and murder, contrary to the statutes in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Ohio.

H. H. Newell,
Prosecuting Attorney.

Wyandot county, Ohio.

The defendant, James F. Goodlove, being duly arraigned upon this indictment pleaded thereto not guilty. Thereafter and during said October term, 1908, the defendant was put upon trial upon said indictment, and by the verdict of the jury was convicted of the crime of manslaughter. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and thereupon the defendant was sentenced by the court to imprisonment in the Ohio penitentiary at hard labor for a period of fifteen years. This judgment of the court of common pleas was affirmed by the circuit court. To obtain a reversal of the judgments below, James F. Goodlove now prosecutes error in this court. While the petition of plaintiff in error in this case contains numerous assignments of errors alleged to have occurred on the trial of this cause in the court of common pleas, the only one of these assignments material to be noticed or considered in this opinion is the alleged error of the trial court in overruling the motion of defendant, made at the close of all the evidence, to direct the jury to return a verdict of not guilty; for if this claim of error be resolved in favor of the accused, as upon this record we are of opinion it must be, it is necessarily fatal, and the other errors assigned become wholly immaterial. That in every indictment for injury to the person the law imperatively requires that the name of the injured party shall, if known, be stated, is too well settled to admit of controversy, and it follows therefrom as a logical and necessary sequence that the name of the person injured, if known, being indispensable matter of allegation, is essential matter of proof, and, when stated, must be proved as laid, unless such proof is excused by statute. The indictment in the present case charged the accused, James F. Goodlove, with having assaulted and killed one "Percy Stuckey, alias Frank McCormick." Hence, under the charge so made, the name of the party assaulted becomes and is essential matter of description and identification, and to warrant conviction upon such charge it was incumbent upon the prosecution to establish by the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the person assaulted and killed was in fact Percy Stuckey. This indictment does not charge, nor was it intended thereby to charge, that James F. Goodlove assaulted and killed both Percy Stuckey and Frank McCormick, but the charge is that he assaulted and killed one Percy Stuckey, called or otherwise known as Frank McCormick. The names therein mentioned were intended to be, and are, but different designations or descriptions of the same person, namely, Percy Stuckey, and, the rule being well settled that no allegation in an indictment descriptive of that which is essential to the charge can be disregarded or rejected, the crime thus charged in this indictment is not made out or established by proof only that the accused assaulted and killed one Frank McCormick, there being no evidence whatever to show that said Frank McCormick and Percy Stuckey were one and the same person. In the case now before us not only is there a total absence of evidence that Percy Stuckey and Frank McCormick were one and the same person, but there is not in this case, from beginning to end, a scintilla of evidence even tending to show, or that would suggest, that any such person as Percy Stuckey ever had an existence. There was therefore in this case a total failure of proof as to an essential allegation and material part of the offense charged in the indictment, and such defect not being one of mere variance that is excused or rendered harmless by the curative provisions of § 7216, Rev. Stat., it was and is necessarily fatal, and the motion to direct a verdict in this case should have been sustained. The conclusion reached by us finds abundant support in the reasoning of the authorities cited in the briefs of counsel.

Judgments of the Circuit Court and of the Court of Common Pleas reversed, and plaintiff in error discharged.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA et al.

(— Okla. —, 107 Pac. 929.)

Carrier — free storage — interstate commerce.

1. That part of order No. 167, rule 10, of the state corporation commission, which provides that ten days' free storage shall be allowed on less than car-load shipments, when destined to consignees who live at interior points 5 miles or more from the railroad station, in so far as it applies to interstate commerce, is void, for the reason that it is in conflict with and is superseded by §§ 1 and 2 of an act entitled, "An Act to Amend an Act Entitled, 'An Act to Regulate Commerce'" (act June 29, 1906, chap. 3591, 34 Stat. at L. 584, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 1149), and for the further reason that it interferes with and imposes upon interstate commerce an unreasonable burden.

Pleading — amendment — verification — error.

2. An amendment to an affidavit charging a railway company with having violated a certain order of the state corporation commission, so as to make the amended affidavit charge the violation of an order other than that charged in the original affidavit, must be certified; and an order of the corporation commission, directing that the original affidavit shall be amended, and thereupon, over the objection of defendant, proceeds with the trial upon the theory that it has been amended, where such amendment was never made, verified, and filed, is reversible error.

Note. — Power of state as to demurrage charges by carrier on interstate shipments.

Few cases have considered the question here annotated.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Edwards (Ark.) 127 S. W. 713, an action was brought to recover a penalty for a failure to give notice of the arrival of goods, as provided by a statute which also provided for demurrage charges against consignees for a failure to remove freight. The act was held to be a reasonable regulation in aid of commerce, and therefore valid as to interstate shipments, provided Congress or the Interstate Commerce Commission had not made regulations covering the same matters. The court here said: "We understand the rule established by the various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States to be that, where Congress or the Commission created for that purpose has prescribed regulations upon a particular subject relating to interstate commerce, the same are exclusive in their operation, and the states no longer have power to make regulations on that subject; but that until Congress or the Commission has acted upon a particular matter of regulation, a state may enforce its regulations which do not directly burden interstate commerce. There being no regulation, as we have seen, either by Congress or by the Interstate Commerce Commission, on the particular subject now under consideration,—that is, of reciprocal demurrage,—the test as to the validity of the state regulation is whether it is a direct burden upon, or is in aid of, commerce." The court then proceeds to examine into the question of whether the statute before it, requiring the giving of notice, is a burden upon commerce, and concludes that it is rather in aid thereof than in the nature of a burden, and holds the act valid.

In Hardwick Farmers' Elevator Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 110 Minn. 25, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 124 N. W. 819, which was an action brought against the carrier, to recover the penalty prescribed for its failure to furnish cars, a so-called reciprocal demurrage statute, providing that "the period during which the movement of freight or furnishing cars is suspended on account of strikes, public calamities, accident, or any cause not within the power of the railroad company to prevent, or during which the loading or unloading of freight by shipper or consignee is delayed by reason of inclement weather which would make loading or unloading impracticable, or any cause not in the power of said shipper or APPEAL by defendant from an order of the State Corporation Commission punishing defendant for contempt for violation of certain orders of the Corporation Commission. Reversed.

Statement by Hayes, J.:

On the 17th day of April, 1909, appellee filed his affidavit with the state corporation commission, in which he charges appellant with having violated two certain orders of said corporation commission, and asked that it be summoned to appear and show cause why it should not be fined for contempt. He avers in his affidavit that appellant, in violation of order No. 167, rule 10, of the corporation commission, on April 7, 1909, at its Cordell station, demanded storage of appellee on less than a car-load shipment, which, on April 7, 1909, had arrived at Cordell over appellant's railway, and which had been shipped to appellee as consignee; and that appellant, although appellee offered to pay the regular freight charges on the shipment, refused to deliver the same to him, unless he would pay, in addition to the regular freight charges, storage on the goods from forty-eight hours after their arrival until the date on which delivery was demanded. He complained, further, that appellant, in violation of rule 4 of the same order, failed to promptly notify him of the arrival of said freight. By a second count in his petition, he charges appellant with having violated order No. 168, rule 3, of the corporation commission, in that on March 3, 1909, it refused to accept from him, at its freight house or platform, freight for shipment in less than car-load lots, and required him to load the same into a car almost inaccessibly located. During the trial on the petition, appellee was permitted, over objections of appellant, to amend his petition, so as to charge that appellant had refused, on March 20, 1909, in violation of order No. 10, § 2, of the corporation commission, to receive from him at its depot or platform a box of trees for shipment. The commission found that appellant had violated order No. 167 by refusing on April 7, 1909, to deliver the freight without payment to it of storage charges thereon, demanded by its agent, and that it had, on March 20, 1909, violated its order No. 10, § 2, as charged in the amended petition, and thereupon made an order fining appellant for contempt in the sum of $100 on each count. It is to reverse this order that this proceeding is prosecuted.

Mr. R. A. Gleinschmidt, for appellant.
Mr. George A. Henshaw, for the State.

Hayes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Order No. 167, rule 10, of the state corporation commission, with the violation of which appellant is charged and has been convicted by the corporation commission, reads as follows:

"(a) Storage will be charged on all less than car-load freight held in or on railroad warehouses or platforms over forty-eight hours from the first 7 A. M. after notice of arrival, not including Sundays and legal holidays, at the rate of five (5) cents per ton for each twenty-four hours or fraction thereof.

"(b) Double these charges shall be assessed on freight of an explosive character.

consignee to prevent, shall be added to the free time allowed in this act, and counted as additional free time," was held to affect interstate commerce only remotely, and was upheld as a valid exercise of the police power.

In Darlington Lumber Co. v. Missouri P. R. Co. 216 Mo. 658, 116 S. W. 530, a state statute regulating demurrage charges was before the court, but the question of whether it violated the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution was reserved, since the pleadings did not present the question. The court, however, remarked: "That the state has a right within certain limits to regulate demurrage charges is not seriously disputed, nor could it be."

In Ann Arbor R. Co. v. Michigan R. Commission (Mich.) 127 N. W. 746, where one section of an act regulating the powers of the railroad commission provided that it should apply to the transportation of property "between points within the state, and to the receiving, switching, delivering, storing, and handling of such property, and 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

all charges connected therewith," and another section gave the commission power to promulgate demurrage rules, it was held that the power to regulate demurrage was expressly limited to cases where the property in question had been transported "between points within this state," so that it was unnecessary to pass upon the power of the legislature to grant authority to regulate demurrage charges as to goods which were the subject of interstate commerce.

It has been held that the provisions of the interstate commerce act regulating the "delivering, storage, or handling" of freight, and requiring the rates to be reasonable, are broad enough to include demurrage. Michie v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 151 Fed. 694.

For a note as to the validity of penalties for failure to furnish freight cars, and involving the power of the states to pass such acts, see Patterson v. Missouri P. Coal Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 733.

J. T. W.

"(c) The minimum charge for any one shipment shall be 10 cents.

"(d) Ten days' free time will be allowed on less than car-load shipments when destined to consignees who live at interior points 5 miles or more from the railroad station.

"(e) Freight on cars placed on delivery track, and subsequently unloaded in railroad warehouses or platforms, is subject to demurrage rules while on delivery track, and storage rules thereafter."

The shipment of freight involved in this case was a consignment of fruit trees of less than car-load lot, which originated in Shenandoah, Iowa, and was consigned to appellee at Cordell, in this state. That such shipment involves interstate commerce is too evident to require citations of authorities. Appellee resides more than 5 miles from the town of Cordell. When he demanded delivery of the shipment to him, more than forty-eight hours had elapsed since the arrival of the shipment, and notice thereof had been mailed to appellee by appellant's agent, and appellant's agent at Cordell refused to deliver the shipment, without payment of storage charges for the excess time the freight had remained in the depot after the lapse of forty-eight hours after its arrival. Appellee refused to pay the storage charges, and appellant refused to deliver the freight. Counsel for the railway company attacks the order of the commission upon the ground that order No. 167, rule 10, is void. The alleged invalidity of said order is urged by counsel in his brief upon three grounds: First, that it is in violation of a certain act of the territorial legislature extended in force in the state by the enabling act and the Constitution; second, that it is in violation of the act of Congress regulating interstate commerce, approved June 29, 1906, commonly known as the Hepburn act (act June 29, 1906, chap. 3591, 34 Stat. at L. 584, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 1149); third, that said order is a burden upon and interferes with interstate commerce, in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

The first paragraph of § 18, art. 9, of the Constitution, confers upon the corporation commission power and authority and charges it with the duty of supervising, regulating, and controlling all transportation and transmission companies doing business in the state, in all matters relating to the performance of their public duties and their charges therefor. But the third paragraph of the section puts a limitation upon the power and authority granted in general terms by the first paragraph of the section, in the following language: 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"The authority of the commission (subject to review on appeal, as hereinafter provided) to prescribe rates, charges, and classifications of traffic for transportation and transmission companies, shall, subject to regulation by law, be paramount; but its authority to prescribe any other rules, regulations, or requirements for corporations or other persons shall be subject to the superior authority of the legislature to legislate thereon by general laws. . . ." Bunn's Constitution of Oklahoma, p. 60. This provision of the Constitution divides the subject-matters over which the corporation commission is given jurisdiction into two classes. The first class includes those matters over which its authority is paramount, to be exercised, however, under regulations prescribed by the Constitution or by law. The second class includes those matters over which its authority is inferior to the power of the legislature to legislate thereon by general laws. It is contended by appellant that the promulgation by the commission of order No. 167, rule 10, was the exercise of an authority belonging to the second class; that such order is and can be effective only to the extent that it is not in conflict with any general act of the legislature on the same subject-matter.

We think the contention that the making and promulgation of said order is by virtue of authority within the second class above described cannot be sustained. The matters over which the commission is given paramount authority are to prescribe all rates, charges, and classifications of transportation and transmission companies. Said order No. 167, rule 10, undertakes to fix the charges that transportation companies may make and collect for storage services rendered incidentally to the transportation and delivery of freight; and, in so far as it attempts to prescribe the charges that shall be made for such services, it clearly falls within the first class, and its actions thereon, when made in conformity to the regulations prescribed by law, are paramount. The territorial legislature, on the 15th day of March, 1905, passed an act entitled, "An Act to Regulate Demurrage and Storage Charges, and to Prevent Delays in Furnishing Cars and in the Transportation and Delivery by Railroad Freight Other Than Live Stock and Perishable Freight." Sess. Laws 1905, p. 143. Sections 7 and 8 of said act, in so far as said order No. 167, rule 10, of the commission, is involved in this cause, covers the same subject-matter as said order. By § 7, the act prescribes what notice of the arrival of freight shall be given by a common carrier to the consignee, and the manner and time of the service of such notice. Section 8 provides that all package freight unloaded by railroad companies in their depots or warehouses, and all freight which, in order to release cars, is unloaded in the yard space of a railroad company, and not removed therefrom by the owner within forty-eight hours, computing from 7 o'clock A. M. of the day following legal notice of arrival, may be subject to the charge of storage for each day it remains in custody of the railroad company, and prescribes the rates of such storage charge. The validity of these provisions of that act, at the time of its enactment, although, under the terms of the act, they apply both to intrastate and interstate shipments, has not been questioned by either party; and assuming, without deciding, that said act was valid and in force in the territory of Oklahoma at the time of the admission of the state, and was extended in force by reason of § 2 of the schedule to the Constitution and of § 21 of the enabling act (act June 16, 1906, chap. 3335, 34 Stat. at L. 277), the same in all events became inoperative when the state corporation commission, in the exercise of the authority vested in it by the Constitution, promulgated rules and orders upon the subject of storage charges covering the subject-matter of said act, which are in conflict with said act. Whatever may be the power of the legislature to prescribe rules and regulations concerning the matters set forth in the first part of that portion of § 18, art. 9, quoted supra, in the absence of any action thereon by the corporation commission, when the corporation commission exercised its authority, its acts and orders, in so far as they are valid, superseded all rules and regulations by statute theretofore existing and covering the same subject-matter.

Section 35, art. 9, of the Constitution, provides that after the second Monday in January, 1909, the legislature may by law, from time to time, alter, amend, revise, or repeal sections from 18 to 34 inclusive, of said article, or any of them, or any amendment thereof. By reason of this provision, it is within the power of the legislature to enact, at any time after the second Monday in January, 1909, a law changing the powers of the corporation commission, as defined by § 18, supra; and the authority of said commission that, before the second Monday in January, 1909, was paramount to the authority of the legislature to legislate upon any subject within the authority of the legislature, is since that date subject to the superior authority of the legislature to legislate upon any subject of which the commission is given jurisdiction; but § 35 can have no operation in this case, because the general law, to wit, the act of the territorial legislature of March 15, 1905, was enacted and extended as a general law of the state (if it was extended) prior to the time the legislature is authorized by said § 35 to alter, amend, or repeal those sections of the Constitution which confer upon the corporation commission its powers, and define the character of such powers. The time at which said act became a law of the state, the power of the commission over the subject-matter of the act was supreme.

Order No. 167, rule 10, is made to apply both to intrastate and interstate shipments. This proceeding grows out of an effort of the commission to enforce the order as to an interstate shipment. The next inquiry, therefore, that arises under appellant's contentions, is: Is said order incompatible with any act of the Congress of the United States upon the same subject-matter, enacted by virtue of the power delegated to Congress by § 8, art. 1, of the Federal Constitution, to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes? In Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 164 U. S. 204, 38 L. ed. 982, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 649, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1087, the court discussing the power of the states over the subject of commerce, said: "The adjudications of this court with respect to the power of the states over the general subject of commerce are divisible into three classes: First, those in which the power of the state is exclusive; second, those in which the states may act in the absence of legislation by Congress; third, those in which the action of Congress is exclusive and the state cannot interfere at all."

The grant to Congress of the power to regulate interstate commerce does not, in the absence of congressional legislation upon the subject, imply a prohibition on the states to exercise the same power in enacting local laws designed to secure the performance by an interstate carrier of the duties imposed upon it by the common law, and to secure the safety and comfort of passengers. Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 966. The cases in which it has been held that a state may, in the absence of congressional inhibition, enact laws and regulations on matters local in their nature, which tend to enforce the proper performance by interstate carriers of duties arising in the state, and which do not impede, but aid and facilitate, intercourse and traffic, although such laws or regulations may incidentally affect interstate commerce, are numerous, and the doctrine is too well settled to admit of doubt. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, carrier to its penalties, while the national statute ignores the bill of lading, and makes the published tariff rate binding, and subjects the offender, both carrier and agent, to severe penalties. The carrier cannot obey one statute without sometimes exposing itself to the penalties prescribed by the other. . . . It is no answer to say that in this case the defendant might have complied with both the state and the national statute. . . . The question is not whether, in any particular case, operation may be given to both statutes, but whether their enforcement may expose a party to a conflict of duties. It is enough that the two statutes, operating upon the same subject-matter, prescribe different rules. In such case one must yield, and that one is the state law."

Section 1 of the Hepburn act (34 Stat. at L. 584, chap. 3591, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 1149), defines the word "railroad" as follows: "The term railroad, as used in this act, shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad; . . . and shall also include all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind used or necessary in the transportation of the persons or property designated herein, and also all freight depots, yards, and grounds used or necessary in the transportation or delivery of any of said property. . . . The term transportation is defined by the same section to "include cars and other vehicles, and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership, or of any contract, expressed or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration, or icing, storage and handling of property transported. . . ." (Italics are ours.) It is provided by the same section that it shall be the duty of every carrier subject to the provisions of this act to provide and furnish "transportation upon reasonable request therefor, and at just and reasonable rates."

Section 2 of the act requires every common carrier subject to the provisions of the act to file with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and print and keep open to public inspection, schedules allowing all rates, fares, and charges of transportation between different points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier, and provides that "the schedules printed as aforesaid by any such common carrier shall plainly state the places between which property and passengers will be carried, and shall contain the classification of freight in force, and shall also state separately all terminal charges, storage charges, icing charges, and all other charges which the Commission may require, all privileges or facilities granted or allowed, and any rules or regulations which in any wise change, affect, or determine any part or the aggregate of such aforesaid rates, fares, and charges, or the value of the service rendered to the passenger, shipper, or consignee." All changes in the rates, fares, and charges filed and published by the common carrier, as required by the act, except those made after thirty days' notice to the Commission and to the public, are prohibited, and the same section prohibits any carrier, except as otherwise provided by the act, to engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property as defined in the act, unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by the carrier have been filed and published as required by the act; and a carrier is further prohibited from extending to any shipper or person any privilege or facility in the transportation of passengers or property, except such as are specified in the tariffs filed and published by it. It must be borne in mind that "transportation," as defined by the act, includes storage and all services rendered by the carrier in connection with the delivery of property transported. A violation of the act is made a misdemeanor, and subjects the offending corporation to a fine of not less than $1,000, nor more than $20,000, for each offense.

Section 4 authorizes and empowers the Interstate Commerce Commission to hear complaints made against any carrier, charging it with violation of any of the provisions of the act, and to determine whether any regulation or practice whatsoever of such carrier, affecting the rights of complainant, is unjust or unreasonable, unjust or unduly preferential, prejudicial or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of the act, and determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable rate or rates, charge or charges, to thereafter be made, and to prescribe what regulation or practice in respect to such transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be followed thereafter. Rebating and giving advantages and preferences to shippers is prohibited.

A complaint against a carrier for violation of the act may be made by any person, firm, corporation, association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization, or railroad commissioner or railroad commission of any state or territory. Act February 4, 1887, chap. 104, § 13, 24 Stat. at L. 383, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3164.

It appears to us that it was the purpose of Congress to assume jurisdiction over the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

entire subject-matter relative to interstate shipments from the time of the origin of such shipment down to the point where the shipment is entirely at an end and its character as a transaction of interstate commerce ceases. That such was the purpose of Congress is evidenced by the language of the act, and it is further emphasized when the conditions and the circumstances out of which that act originated and the evils it was intended to remedy are recalled. A system of rebating and discrimination by interstate carriers in favor of some shippers and localities, and against other shippers and localities, had become so prevalent, unjust, and disastrous in its effects that it became necessary for Congress to exercise directly, and through the agency of the Interstate Commerce Commission, its power over interstate commerce to an extent that had not theretofore been deemed necessary. But if Congress may not control the storage of interstate shipments and charges therefor, occurring before delivery of the shipment, and require the establishment of uniform rates as to shippers and localities under similar circumstances and conditions, there is left to the carrier a ready means of defeating the object of the law; or where the state law does not prohibit, or where, under a more liberal law in one state than in another, an interstate carrier could give to its patrons, or some of them, storage facilities and rates which it refuses to others in the same state or in another state; or where no state legislation existed upon the subject, carriers could fix a low charge or no charge at all for storage in one state, and a high rate in another state, upon the same class of freight and under similar circumstances; and if all states legislated upon the subject, it is hardly probable that there would be uniformity in the legislation, and by the law of one state a shipper would be required to pay a much lower rate, and probably have a longer free time for delivery, than a shipper in an adjoining state, under a law which would require a higher rate and a shorter free time for delivery of any consignment. Under such conditions, discrimination between shippers and localities could be as effectively accomplished in many instances as if the carrier were permitted to rebate on the charges for services rendered in the transit of the shipment.

The contention of appellee, that storage of freight after its arrival at the point of destination, awaiting the delivery of the shipment to the consignee, and charges therefor, are not part of an interstate commerce transaction, cannot be sustained. An interstate shipment does not come to an end until a delivery of the consignment to the consignee. State v. Eighteen Casks of Beer (Okla.) 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 492, 104 Pac. 1093. And the mere placing of an interstate shipment in the carrier's depot or freight house to await delivery to the consignee does not terminate the interstate transaction, and subject the property to the police power of the state. Heyman v. Southern R. Co. 203 U. S. 270, 51 L. ed. 178, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1130.

The evidence fails to disclose whether appellant has ever filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission a schedule of charges for storage, or a statement of its practice or regulations relative to storage of freight after its arrival at point of destination, and before delivery to the consignee. An agent of appellant testified that the charges demanded on the freight in this controversy were made under the direction of a circular received by the agent of the company at Cordell; but the record does not disclose whether this circular, attempting to fix the rate of charge on storage, had ever been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, or was in conformity with any order of that Commission.

In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Larabee Flour Mills Co. 211 U. S. 612, 53 L. ed. 352, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214, the mill company made application to the courts of Kansas for a mandamus to compel the railway company to transfer for its shipments of grain and flour in car-load lots, consigned from or to other states, from the tracks of the Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fé Railway Company, over the transfer track of that company and a portion of the main track of the defendant, and a spur track to the mill and elevator of plaintiff. The railway company rendered similar services to all other shippers at the same station, but had refused to render this service to the mill company, because of disagreement between them over a demurrage charge on certain shipments of freight. The practice of the railway company of rendering such service to the other shippers, and of refusing it to the mill company, was a discrimination against it, in violation of its common-law duties. From a judgment of the supreme court of Kansas affirming the decree of the trial court awarding the writ, proceedings in error were taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the railway company questioned the jurisdiction of the Kansas courts upon the ground that the services which the mill company sought to require them to render were incidental to and directly affected interstate commerce, and that jurisdiction thereof had been conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. The court, in an opinion by Mr. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Justice Brewer, held that while jurisdiction had been conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by act of Congress to hear complaints involving a practice of an interstate carrier, whereby the carrier discriminates against a shipper, and to make orders correcting the same, a mere delegation of such power to the Commission did not disturb the authority of the state to compel the carrier to discharge its common-law duties, and so render its service to shippers as not to discriminate between them, where it appeared that the Commission had not acted upon the matter directly involved. Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the majority of the court, said: "But the fact that Congress has intrusted power to that Commission does not, in the absence of action by it, change the rule which existed prior to the creation of the Commission. Congress could always regulate interstate commerce, and could make specific provisions in reference thereto, and yet this has not been held to interfere with the power of the state in these incidental matters. A mere delegation by Congress to the Commission of a like power has no greater effect, and does not disturb the authority of the state."

But we think that the facts in the case at bar, and those parts of the interstate commerce act and acts amendatory thereof to be applied, distinguish the case at bar from that case. We understand the effect of the decision in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Larabee Flour Mills Co. to be that, where a railway company renders a service to some shippers which it refuses to others, the remedy provided by the Federal act is only cumulative, and does not prevent a complaining party from resorting to the state courts to compel the carrier to discharge his common-law duties to him by process of that court, where the Interstate Commerce Commission has not acted upon the subject. But, as to what services a carrier shall render in connection with an interstate commerce shipment, and what charges it shall make therefor, the Federal statute not only makes it the duty of a carrier to file with the Commission a schedule of its storage charges and all services to be rendered by the carrier in connection with the shipment and delivery of same, and prohibits it to charge any other rates than those specified in the tariff filed with the Commission, but also prohibits it from engaging or participating in transporting any property until it does file such rates and charges as required by the act; and if a carrier violates the act by making charges without having filed its schedule of rates, as required by the act, or charges rates in excess of those fixed by its tariff filed, it may be punished therefor, and a tribunal is provided in which complaint may be made of such violation of the act, and a procedure prescribed, and a remedy provided. If a state may, after the Hepburn act became effective, regulate by statutes, or by order of some commission vested with administrative or legislative power, the service that a carrier shall render in connection with an interstate shipment, and the delivery thereof, and fix the charges for such services, then we have the Federal act prohibiting a carrier from making any charge until the same has been fixed by the filing of its tariff with the Commission, and from rendering any other free service in connection with the delivery of the property than that named in the tariff; and at the same time may have a regulation by state authority, authorizing and requiring it to do the very thing the Federal act directs, that all charges made shall be just and reasonable, and, for an unjust and unreasonable charge, a remedy is provided.

We have been able to find no case from the Supreme Court of the United States, whose decision upon the question here involved would be controlling, that is decisive of this case; but State ex rel. Railroad Commission v. Adams Exp. Co. 171 Ind. 138, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 93, 85 N. E. 337, 966, if not directly in point, strongly supports the conclusion we reach. That was a proceeding to compel an express company by mandamus to deliver, in cities having a population of 2,500 or more, express free to the places of business and residences of the consignees, as required by a certain act of the legislature of the state of Indiana, approved March 6, 1901 (Laws 1901, chap. 62). It was held that the state statute had been superseded by the Hepburn act, and that the writ of mandamus should be denied.

We also think that the reason urged against the validity of the order of the corporation commission under appellant's third contention is sound. A state, in the exercise of its police power, may, by act of its legislature or by rule of some administrative agency upon whom the power has been conferred to make reasonable regulations, regulate by reasonable rule the place, manner, and time of delivery of merchandise moving in the channels of interstate commerce; but it must not make such regulations as will burden or interfere with interstate commerce. McNeill v. Southern R. Co. 202 U. S. 543, 50 L. ed. 142, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 722; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Mayes, 201 U. S. 321, 50 L. ed. 772, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 491; American Steel & Wire Co. v. Speed, 192 U. S. 500, 48 L. ed. 538, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 365. See also Central R. Co. v. Murphey, 196 U. S. 194, 49 L. ed. 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

444, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 218, 2 A. & E Ann. Cas. 514; and Southern R. Co. v. Com. 107 Va. 771, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 364, 60 S. E. 70. In Central R. Co. v. Murphey, supra, it is held that imposition by state statute upon the initial or connecting carrier of interstate commerce of the duty of tracing a shipment of freight and informing the shipper where and how the same was lost, damaged, or destroyed, when applied to interstate commerce, was void as in violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. In Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Mayes, a statute of the state of Texas, requiring that when a shipper of freight shall make requisition for a number of cars to be furnished at any point indicated within a certain number of days from the receipt of the application, and shall deposit one fourth of the freight with the agent of the company, the company, failing to furnish the cars, shall forfeit $25 per day for each car to be furnished, providing, however, that the law should not apply in case of strikes or other public calamities,—was held an infringement upon the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and declared void. In McNeill v. Southern R. Co. supra, it was held that an order of the state corporation commission requiring railway companies to deliver cars from another state to the consignee on a private siding beyond its own right of way was a burden on interstate commerce and void.

In the case at bar, the order of the corporation commission requires the railway company, in every case where the consignee lives 5 or more miles from the station of the railway, to give to the consignee ten days' free storage of his shipment, irrespective of any and all contingencies, conditions, or circumstances. In the absence of congressional legislation upon the subject, a state may, in the exercise of its police power, require that a consignee shall have a reasonable time after the arrival of an interstate shipment to receive and take the same from the premises of the carrier, without extra charge than that made for the service of transporting the shipment, and might prescribe and require of the carrier to give notice of the arrival of any shipment; but the rule in question undertakes to do more than this. Although the consignee be present when the consignment arrives, or although, not present, he has immediate notice of its arrival, and no cause exists to prevent his receiving same immediately, and removing it from the charge of the carrier, the order directs and compels the carrier to become his warehouseman for a period of ten days, free of charge. It gives to the consignee who has notice of the arrival of his freight, and an opportunity to remove it, the same privilege and free service that it gives to him who has not or may not have such notice; the only condition being that the consignee lives 5 miles or more distant from the station. It is true, in this case, that the consignee went to receive his freight immediately upon receipt of notice; but the constitutional validity of a law is to be tested, not by what has been done under it, but what may be done. Southern R. Co. v. Com. supra; Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 191, 30 Am. Rep. 289. The common law imposes no duty upon the common carrier to render services as warehouseman other than such as are necessarily incidental to the transportation of the property. The order of the corporation commission, requiring that free storage of ten days be given on all shipments to consignees living 5 or 10 miles distant from the carrier's depot, although the consignees, have notice of the arrival of the freight and opportunity to remove it, requires the carrier to give its property to such shippers for said period of time to be used as a warehouse. It thereby imposes an additional and unreasonable burden upon the carrier, and is, as to interstate shipments, void. Whether or not the order is not void, both as to interstate commerce and as to intrastate commerce, in that it requires certain free service to be given, in cases not necessarily incidental to the performance of its duties as a common carrier, and thereby takes property without due process of law, need not be determined here, for the application of the order to an intrastate shipment is not involved in this proceeding.

For reversal of the decree of the commission adjudging appellant guilty of contempt upon the second count of the affidavit or petition of appellee, appellant urges that the commission erred in permitting appellee, during the progress of the trial, to amend, or to have considered amended, his affidavit so as to allege a violation of order No. 10, instead of order No. 168, as originally alleged in the affidavit. During the progress of the trial, it was made to appear that order No. 168, with violation of which appellant was charged in the second count of the affidavit, was not in force and effect, either at the time the alleged offense was committed, or at the time of the trial. The commission, on its own motion, ruled that the affidavit could be and should be amended so as to show a violation of order No. 10, instead of order No. 168. These two orders are in most respects the same; there being, however, in some respects a difference in their provisions. The trial proceeded upon the theory that the amendment had been made, but no amendment in fact was made, nor a new affidavit filed. The action of the commission was error.

On May 29, 1908, the legislature enacted a statute providing for the punishment of any corporation, person, or firm for contempt for the violation of any order or requirement of the corporation commission. Sess. Laws 1907-08, p. 228. Section 1 of the act makes any corporation, person, or firm that violates an order of the commission subject to a fine of not exceeding $500, and each continuance of the violation a separate offense. Section 2 of the act prescribes the procedure for contempt proceedings. It is provided that such proceedings may be instituted by any citizen of the state or other parties affected by the order of the commission, by filing an affidavit with the corporation commission, setting forth the acts of omission or failure to comply with such order or requirement.

Since the adjudication provided by the statute in these proceedings is wholly punitive, a proceeding thereunder must be deemed quasi criminal, if not criminal, and, in the prosecution of such proceeding, the procedure prescribed by the statute should be strictly pursued. 4 Enc. Pl. & Pr. pp. 767, 770, and authorities there cited. Before any proceeding for contempt may be begun, an affidavit setting forth the fact prescribed by the statute must be presented to and filed with the commission, and an amendment to such affidavit must likewise be verified, and to permit the same to be amended by interlineation, without the amendment being sworn to, is error. State ex rel. Thompson v. Lavery, 31 Or. 77, 49 Pac. 852; State v. Kaiser, 20 Or. 50, 8 L.R.A. 584, 23 Pac. 964. See also Back v. State, 75 Neb. 603, 106 N. W. 787.

Since, for the foregoing reason, this portion of the order of the commission must be reversed, it is unnecessary to decide whether, if the amendment of the affidavit had been made by the filing of a new affidavit of appellee, the proceeding would have had to have been treated as a new proceeding, and whether it would not have been error for the commission to have continued with the trial over the objections of defendant, that it had not had an opportunity to prepare its defense to the new charge. Appellant also urges that order No. 10 is void, for the reason that it attempts to regulate interstate commerce. Section 2 of order No. 10 provides: "Freight to be transported in less than car-load lots shall be delivered to and received by each initial carrier at its freight houses, platforms, or sheds, as may be customary, properly marked, and immediately after such delivery, and upon demand made to the office agent of the carrier or other agent in charge of each station, junction, or intersection, together with proper tender of freight charges, if demanded in advance, and proper notification of the name of the consignee and destination, a proper bill of lading thereof shall be delivered to the shipper, and the carrier's control over and responsibility for such freight shall commence." But neither the affidavit filed in this case nor the evidence discloses whether the consignment of freight which appellee is alleged to have tendered to appellant's agent, the acceptance of which was refused by the agent, was an interstate or intrastate shipment, and we therefore do not pass upon this contention.

The order of the Commission is reversed, and the cause remanded.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

KENNER WHITTAKER ALLISON, Sr.,
Appt.,
v.
ANNA BRYAN.

(Two Cases.)

(— Okla. —, 109 Pac. 934.)

Pleading — dismissal — docketing case — prejudice.

1. In the absence of a showing of prejudice, a petition filed in the office of the clerk of the district court, the object and purpose of the action being to secure the right of visitation on the part of a parent deprived of the custody of a child, will not be dismissed because entitled in, and by the clerk given, the same docket number as a former case between the same parties, which had been finally closed in that court.

District court — child — parent's right of visitation — jurisdiction.

2. The district court is a court of general jurisdiction, in which jurisdiction of actions both legal and equitable is vested, and, in the exercise of its equity power, it has jurisdiction to entertain, hear, and determine the question of the right of visitation on the part of a parent denied the custody of a child.

Pleading — failure to reply — effect.

3. Where a defendant voluntarily goes to trial without a reply being filed to the answer, when he is not bound to do so, he is thereby held to have waived it, and is regarded as consenting to go to the proof of the answer, as if it were denied.

Appeal — briefs — points — waiver.

4. It is essential that all points upon which counsel rely for a reversal of a cause be made in the brief, and properly made; if not so made, they are waived. It is not enough to assert in general terms that a ruling of the trial court is wrong; a fair effort must be made to prove that it is wrong, or the point will not be considered as having been made.

Illegitimate child — adoption — consent of mother.

5. Under § 4900, Comp. Laws (Okla.) 1909, the mother of an illegitimate, unmarried minor child is entitled to its custody, services, and earnings, and under § 4919, id., such child cannot be adopted without her consent, if she be living and has not forfeited her rights therein, and an adoption sought to be made without her consent is not valid as to her, notwithstanding the consent of the father of the child, who, acting under § 4931, id., had previously received the child into his home, and in a lawful manner effected its legitimation.

Same — adoption by father — right of mother to visit — contempt of court.

6. The mother of an illegitimate, unmarried minor child which has been legitimated by its father under the provisions of § 4931 of the Compiled Laws of Oklahoma 1099, does not by reason of such legitimation, where same will not conflict with the best interests of the child, forfeit the right to visit the child or to have it visit her,

Note. — Validity of adoption without consent of natural parents.

As to the right of parties to adoption proceedings, or their privies, to attack a decree of adoption, see Phillips v. Chase, post, 159, and note thereto.

Necessity of consent or notice to parents — in general.

The status of adoption was unknown at the common law, and hence is governed entirely by statute; since it involves a change of status primarily affecting rights of the natural parents, the child, and the adopting parents, it is generally necessary that the consent of these parties to the adoption be obtained; but as it is a duty of the state of the child's domicile to act as parens patriæ, to the extent, at least, of finding a home and protector for every child within its borders, it is sufficient that the state consent to the adoption of the child, or authorize by legislative enactment the adoption of a child within its borders, under prescribed conditions. While ordinarily the consent of the natural parents to the adoption of their child is necessary in order to deprive them of their parental rights, these rights are not absolute in their nature, and it is lawful for the state to provide for the forfeiture of such rights, and for the adoption of a child, without notice to, or consent of, the parents, where, in accordance with such statutory provision, they have forfeited their parental rights.

In Stearns v. Allen, 183 Mass. 404, 97 and failure and neglect, without sufficient cause, on the part of the father, to observe a valid order of a court enforcing such right, is punishable as a contempt, and in such a case it is no defense that his wife objected or refused to consent to his obedience to the same.

(May 31, 1910.)

CONSOLIDATED appeals from judgments of the District Court for Cleveland County in plaintiff's favor in actions brought to compel the adopting father of an illegitimate child to permit its natural mother to visit it, and to punish him for contempt of court for his alleged failure to comply with a court order directing him to allow the mother to visit such child. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Am. St. Rep. 441, 67 N. E. 349, in considering the general question as to the rights of natural parents in proceedings for the adoption of their child, the court said: "Adoption involves a change of status. So far as the adopting parents are concerned, the change cannot be made without their consent. So far as an infant child is concerned, the state, as his protector, may make the change for him. The natural parents of the child should be considered and their natural rights should be carefully guarded, but their rights are subject to regulation by the state, and if these come into conflict with the paramount interests of the child, it is in the power of the state by legislation to separate children from their parents when their interests and the welfare of the community require it."

—where child has been abandoned.

It is frequently provided by statute that the consent of natural parents need not be obtained or notice given them of proceedings to adopt a child whom they have abandoned, or who has been taken from them by some judicial proceeding on the ground of improper guardianship, or other similar ground. In such cases the existence of the fact authorizing the adoption is jurisdictional, and the court has jurisdiction of the proceeding on the finding by it of the existence of this fact, whether based upon proper evidence or not; and the judgment or order of adoption entered therein is conclusive, at least as to the parties to the proceedings, and those claiming through or under them. Re Camp, 131 Cal. 470, 82 Am. Dunn, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant has appealed to this court two cases in which judgments have been rendered against him in the district court of Cleveland county; as they are closely associated, they have been consolidated, and will be considered together. The primary

N. Y. Supp. 1094, affirmed without opinion in 167 N. Y. 601, 60 N. E. 1121; Parsons v. Parsons, 101 Wis. 76, 70 Am. St. Rep. 894, 77 N. W. 147; Nugent v. Powell, 4 Wyo. 173, 20 L.R.A. 199, 62 Am. St. Rep. 17, 33 Pac. 23.

The fact that parents were not served with notice of proceedings to adopt their child does not render an order of adoption entered in such proceeding invalid as to the parties thereto and their privies, although the proceeding might be successfully attacked by the parents for that reason. Coleman v. Coleman, 81 Ark. 7, 98 S. W. 733; Woodward's Appeal, 81 Conn. 152, 70 Atl. 453; Sullivan v. People, 224 Ill. 468, 79 N. E. 695; Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 37 Am. Rep. 321; Beatty v. Davenport, 45 Wash. 555, 122 Am. St. Rep. 937, 88 Pac. 1109, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 585.

In Woodward's Appeal, the court reasoned that even though the parents of the adopted child had the right to contest the validity of the adoption decree in so far as it deprived them of their legal parental rights, because no notice of the proceeding was given them, it did not follow that a decree giving to the infant statutory capacity of inheritance from a stranger, where rendered in pursuance of jurisdiction conferred by statute, and in the manner prescribed thereby, must be held void for that reason.

Furgeson v. Jones, 17 Or. 204, 3 L.R.A. 620, 11 Am. St. Rep. 808, 20 Pac. 842, asserts a contrary rule. It is there said that if the parents are living, their consent to the adoption of their child must be obtained, and is a prerequisite to jurisdiction; that "without such consent, jurisdiction does not attach, and the court is without authority to act and make a decree of adoption, and if it undertakes to do so its decree will be a nullity; not voidable, but void; and may be collaterally assailed in any action." This language was used in holding that the validity of adoption proceedings could be successfully questioned on the ground of facts out of which they grow are set forth and considered in the case of Allison v. Bryan, 21 Okla. 557, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 931, 97 Pac. 282, 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 408, an opinion of this court delivered June 25, 1908, and they will not be reviewed here further than is necessary to state the subsequent acts out of which the controversies in these cases arose.

Under the judgment rendered in the opinion mentioned, exclusive custody of the child involved (a boy of tender years) was taken by Kenner Whittaker Allison, Sr. No provision or arrangement was entered into between him and the child's mother to permit her to visit it, and on August 10, 1909, she filed, as plaintiff, her petition in the district court of Cleveland county.

failure to give notice to the parents by parties to the proceeding, or their privies, for the purpose of depriving the child of his right to inherit from his adopted parents.

Where a statute authorizes the depriving of parents of their child where they are unfit to have his custody or control, and a proceeding under such statute is had after due notice to the parent, and the child is taken from their custody and transferred to that of a board, in proceedings thereafter taken to adopt such child, notice thereof to the parents, or their consent thereto, is not necessary. Egoff v. Madison County, supra.

As to a natural parent who did not consent to the adoption of his child, and who received no notice, actual or constructive, of the proceedings to adopt, the order of adoption is not conclusive, and he may dispute the existence of the fact upon which depended the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the proceeding and render the judgment of adoption. Willis v. Bell, 86 Ark. 473, 111 S. W. 808; Miller v. Higgins (Cal. App.) 111 Pac. 403; Sullivan v. People, supra; Lee v. Back, 30 Ind. 148; Re Carter, 77 Kan. 765, 93 Pac. 584; People ex rel. Cornelius v. Callan, 124 N. Y. Supp. 1074; Re Olson, 3 Ohio N. P. 304; Booth v. Van Allen, 7 Phila. 401; Re Sleep, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 256; Beatty v. Davenport, supra; State ex rel. Le Brook v. Wheeler, 43 Wash. 183, 86 Pac. 394; Schiltz v. Roenitz, 86 Wis. 31, 21 L.R.A. 483, 39 Am. St. Rep. 873, 56 N. W. 194.

Thus, in Sullivan v. People, the court said: "A parent has the right to the custody of his child as against all the world, unless he has forfeited his right, or the welfare of the child demands that he should be deprived of it. To divest him of his rights without notice and an opportunity to be heard is not only contrary to every principle of natural justice, but is prohibited by the Constitution. The court cannot be clothed with authority to decree that a parent has deserted his child and forfeited his natural rights without notice to him. . . . Whether the statute requires notice to a parent within the state who is charged 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the home of appellant, in which she charged him, as defendant, with having had the sole custody of the child since the 1st day of October, 1908, and that she had never had it in her possession since that time, nor had she been permitted to see it or exercise any rights of a mother over it for a period of eleven months. That she had applied to the defendant for permission to see her said child, which was being gradually estranged from her, and that, owing to its tender years, she would soon pass from its memory and become unto it as a stranger. That she had a deep affection for her offspring, and a longing for permission to see and commune with it, but that, unless the court made an order requiring defendant to produce the child, with having deserted his child, or not, there can be no valid adjudication depriving him of his parental rights without notice. The decree of adoption was void as against him, and does not entitle respondent to the custody of the child."

This doctrine was applied in Schiltz v. Roenitz, supra, and an order of adoption based upon a finding of abandonment was held not to be conclusive evidence that the natural parent had abandoned the child, or had been lawfully deprived of his services, in an action by him to recover of the adoptive parents for such loss of services and for alienating the affections of his child, the natural parent alleging fraud and bad faith on the part of the adoptive parent in making the charge of abandonment and thereby procuring the order of adoption. As to the effect upon the rights of the natural parent of an order of adoption entered under such circumstances, the court said: "The contention that the county court could, without notice to the plaintiff, or opportunity to him to defend against the charge of abandonment, grant an order depriving the plaintiff of his most sacred natural rights in respect to his child, so jealously guarded and protected by the laws, offends against all our ideas respecting the administration of justice, and is opposed to the principles which lie at the foundation of all judicial systems not essentially despotic in their character and methods of procedure. It is provided by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, that 'no state shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.' Due process of law, as applied to judicial proceedings, includes a charge before some judicial tribunal, and notice to the party in some form, either actual or constructive, and an opportunity to appear and produce evidence in his defense and be heard by himself or counsel. To proceed to adjudicate in the absence of notice to the party 'would be contrary to the first principles of the social compact, and of the right of administration of justice.'"

The rule thus broadly stated in Schiltz v. Roenitz is apparently modified in Parsons and to permit her to visit and enjoy its society, defendant would continue to refuse it. She then prayed the court to make an order requiring defendant to produce the child, and to make an order for such temporary custody as might be just and proper. This petition was by the clerk of the district court given the same number as that of the former case, above referred to, which likewise arose in that court. Defendant filed a motion to strike the petition from the files for the reason that the former case had been finally concluded by the judgment of this court; and for the further reason that plaintiff was in contempt by having unlawfully kidnapped and removed from the jurisdiction of both courts the child in question, after the rendition of judgment by the supreme court, and had taken no steps whatever to exonerate herself from the contempt involved. This motion was by the court overruled.

Thereafter, and on September 21, 1909, an answer was filed in which the defendant admitted that plaintiff was the mother of the child, and set up that he had the exclusive custody, under the judgment and decree of that court, based on the facts and judgment directed and handed down by the supreme court; that the plaintiff was in contempt of both courts, of which she had not purged herself, and that the best interests of the child required the exclusive custody and control of the defendant over it, and required that it be not disturbed, and that the court had no jurisdiction to

v. Parsons, supra, wherein the court said that the fact of abandonment judicially determined was essential to the jurisdiction of the court in a proceeding to adopt a child without notice to the natural parents, and without their consent, where based upon a statute authorizing the adoption of an abandoned child without notice to, or consent of, his parents. And it was further said that it was not essential to jurisdiction that the fact of abandonment should be determined on proper evidence, or in accordance with the truth, because mere error in that regard did not affect the jurisdiction, since, if jurisdiction be obtained to determine the fact, its determination wrong, or on insufficient or improper evidence, was immaterial on the question of the legal right to proceed judicially to the next step, the court adding: "A judicial determination may be contrary to conclusive evidence or legal evidence, or without any evidence, yet cannot be impeached for want of jurisdiction." Referring to Schiltz v. Roenitz, the court said that the conclusion reached therein to the effect that, in the absence of notice to the parents, an order of adoption was not conclusive evidence under this statute of the fact of abandonment, although based upon a finding by the court of that fact, was but affirming what was clearly held inferentially in that case, that the order was nevertheless valid as to the child, obviously meaning the court had jurisdiction that far, which, of course, included jurisdiction of the petitioner who commenced the proceeding.

These cases were both referred to in Re McCormick, 108 Wis. 234, 81 Am. St. Rep. 890, 84 N. W. 148, the Schiltz Case on the point that an order of adoption under this statute, based upon the abandonment of a child by its parents, was clearly a nullity as against them, where no notice was given them, and no finding of abandonment was made by the court. Parsons v. Parsons was referred to and cited to the point that want of notice to the parents, however, did not take away the jurisdiction of a county court to determine whether the parents had in fact abandoned the child.

In Nugent v. Powell, adoption proceedings were sustained so far as concerned the right of the adopted child to inherit from his adoptive parents, although the father had no notice of the proceeding, and did not consent to the adoption; it was, however, conceded that, notwithstanding these proceedings, the father might, at any time since they took place, have brought an action for the recovery of possession or custody of the child, in which case the proceedings would constitute no bar to such action, or be conclusive upon him of the fact of abandonment.

Where a mother has done nothing which will operate as a relinquishment or abandonment of the child, and the adoptive parents know of her residence at the time of the adoption proceedings in a juvenile court, and she is not notified thereof, the proceedings are void for want of jurisdiction. Re Carter, 77 Kan. 765, 93 Pac. 584; Willis v. Bell, 86 Ark. 473, 111 S. W. 808; People ex rel. Cornelius v. Callan, supra.

And where fraud is practised upon the court, and an order of adoption is procured by falsely representing that the child proposed to be adopted has been abandoned by his parent or parents, upon whom no notice is served, and hence no opportunity given to refute the charge, the proceeding will be reopened at the instance of such parent, or a hearing had upon habeas corpus. Lee v. Back; Re Carter; Booth v. Van Allen; Beatty v. Davenport; and Miller v. Higgins,—supra.

Where a father is not a party to a proceeding that resulted in an order for the adoption of his child, and hence has not had his day in court, and is deprived of his right to object to the adoption because of false statements as to his alleged abandonment of the child, the order of adoption cannot be urged as an effective objection to awarding the custody of the child to the father on habeas corpus, when it appears that such custody will be for the best interest of the child. People ex rel. Cornelius v. Callan, supra.

And in Re Carter, the mother was held entitled to maintain habeas corpus proceed-grant the relief prayed for. A trial was had on this petition and answer without a reply, and the court, after hearing the evidence, and considering the same, rendered judgment requiring defendant to produce the said child on the first and third Sundays in each and every month thereafter, at the town of Norman, Cleveland county, and deliver the child to its mother for a period of from 9 o'clock A. M. until 3:30 P. M. on each of said Sundays, in order that the said mother might have the privilege of seeing the child alone and in the absence of any other person. It was further provided that said mother should not remove the said child from the town, and in no wise attempt to prejudice the child against its father or his wife. From this judgment, proceedings in error have been duly prosecuted to this court.

After the judgment in the foregoing case had been entered, and during the time it was in force, defendant ignored the same, and on the 5th day of October, 1909, plaintiff filed her affidavit in the district court of Cleveland county, in which she recited the judgment, and that, at the appointed time and on the day set, she was present for the purpose of enjoying the society of her child under the order made, but that the defendant, in violation and in contempt of the order of the court, failed and refused to produce said child, or cause the same to be produced at Norman, but willfully kept said child away from said town of Norman, and from defendant. Whereings to obtain the custody of her child, where she had been adopted in proceedings of which the mother had no notice, the jurisdiction of the court being based upon the false allegation that the mother had abandoned the child.

So, in Beatty v. Davenport, the mother was held entitled to maintain habeas corpus proceedings to recover her children from adoptive parents, where the order of adoption was made in proceedings of which no notice, constructive or otherwise, was given her, the proceedings being based upon the consent of the father, and the false allegation that the mother had abandoned the children. The court said that the decree of adoption was binding only upon the parties before the court, and their privies, and was not binding upon the mother, because she was neither a party nor a privy thereto; hence it had no jurisdiction to determine her rights.

A stranger to the adoption proceeding may collaterally attack the judgment of adoption as invalid because notice thereof was not given the natural parents, and they did not appear therein or consent thereto. Thus, in Taber v. Douglass, 101 Me. 363, 64 Atl. 653, where written consent to the adoption was given by the father of the child adopted, and the consent of the mother was not given, although she was living at the time, and no notice of the proceeding was given to her, the proceeding was held to be invalid and subject to attack on this ground by a stranger to the proceeding, as a defense to an action by the adoptive parents to recover damages for enticing the child to leave their home and service.

Although statutory proceedings permitting the adoption of abandoned children without the consent of their parents are to be found in most of the states, and have frequently been before the court, the attempt has seldom been made to define the term "abandon," as used therein.

In Winans v. Luppig, 47 N. J. Eq. 302, 20 Atl. 969, it was said that the statutory 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

notion of abandonment did not necessarily imply that the parents had deserted their child, or even ceased to feel any concern in his interests, but it might fairly import any conduct on their part which evidenced an established purpose to forego the parental duties and relinquish the parental claims to the child.

Wood v. Wood (N. J.) 77 Atl. 91, holds that to bring a case within the statute authorizing the adoption of abandoned children without the consent of their natural parents, there need be no actual abandonment, but it is sufficient if there has been such a course of conduct on the part of both the father and mother as to indicate that there was a settled intention to forego parental rights, and to leave the child permanently in the care of others. Applying this doctrine, a mother of a family of children whose father was dead was held to have abandoned one of the children by permitting her to continue to live for a period of some years, with her aunts, after the death of the father, the aunts supporting and educating the child. The fact that the mother thus permitted the child to remain with her aunts was held to authorize the court to permit the adoption of the child by the aunts, against both the consent of the mother and of the child, the court taking the view that the child was influenced by the mother to object to the adoption.

Compare with Booth v. Van Allen, 7 Phila. 401, which holds that abandonment is to renounce and forsake entirely,—to leave with a view never to return; hence, a parent cannot be said to have abandoned her child where she has made careful provision for securing it a home and a care taker.

In Parsons v. Parsons, 101 Wis. 76, 70 Am. St. Rep. 894, 77 N. W. 147, Marshall, J., speaking for the court, said: "The term 'abandon' obviously means no more than neglect or refusal to perform the natural and legal obligations of care and support which parents owe to their children."

And in Nugent v. Powell, abandonment was said to be simply the evidentiary fact upon the court made an order requiring defendant to appear on the 8th day of November, 1909, at the courthouse in Norman, and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for a violation of said order. The defendant, for his answer, set up that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order dated September 21, 1909, for the several reasons set forth therein. Second, he denied that he had wilfully violated the previous order of the court, because of the fact that circumstances under which he had been situated since it had been rendered made it practically impossible to comply therewith. Thereafter a change of judge was asked for and allowed, and on a hearing the court entered judgment against defendant, assessing a fine in the sum of $1 and the costs of said proceeding.

It is first contended that the court was without jurisdiction to entertain this action for the reason that the petition filed was by the clerk given the same number as the old case, which had been finally closed. In the case of Holt v. Holt, 23 Okla. 639, 102 Pac. 187, the converse of this proposition was presented; the contention in that case being that the petition should have been filed in the original action, but that the clerk, although it was entitled as in the original case, had given it a separate number, and filed it as an original case. This court held that this fact would not deplete the court of jurisdiction to try the same, although the statute was susceptible which proved the ultimate fact of relinquishment. In other words, "the relinquishment of one's rights is the fact and result of one's abandonment of those rights."

—nonresidence of parent.

The nonresidence of a parent does not render it unnecessary to give him actual or constructive notice of proceedings to adopt his child without his consent, and an order of adoption entered in a proceeding without notice to him, or without securing his consent thereto, is invalid. Furgeson v. Jones, 17 Or. 204, 3 L.R.A. 620, 11 Am. St. Rep. 808, 20 Pac. 842.

And a nonresident parent not served with actual or constructive notice of proceedings to adopt his child may maintain habeas corpus proceedings against the adoptive parent, claiming under an order of adoption entered in such proceeding. People ex rel. Cornelius v. Callan, 124 N. Y. Supp. 1074; Beatty v. Davenport, 45 Wash. 555, 122 Am. St. Rep. 937, 88 Pac. 1109, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 585; Re Carter, 77 Kan. 765, 93 Pac. 584.

Notice by publication to a nonresident father of proceedings to adopt his child constitutes sufficient notice, where the adoptive parents of the child and the child's mother are within the jurisdiction of the court wherein the proceeding is had. Stearns v. Allen, 183 Mass. 404, 97 Am. St. Rep. 441, 67 N. E. 349. To the same effect where the parents are unknown is Omaha Water Co. v. Schamel, 78 C. C. A. 68, 147 Fed. 502.

—where parents are divorced or living apart.

The fact that parents are divorced or not living together is no ground for denying to either of them the right to notice of proceedings to adopt their child, and the consent of the parent having the custody of the child is not sufficient to sustain the proceeding as against the parent not consenting thereto, who has no notice thereof. Willis v. Bell, 86 Ark. 473, 111 S. W. 908; Miller v. Higgins (Cal. App.) 111 Pac. 403.

In Willis v. Bell, the parents have been dissolved.

and the mother given the custody of an infant child. Thereafter she removed to another state, and consented to the adoption of the child by a relative. The father did not consent thereto, and had no notice of the proceeding. Subsequently to the adoption proceedings, he commenced proceedings in chancery to obtain the custody of the child, and attacked the validity of the adoption proceeding because his consent thereto had not been obtained, and no notice of the proceeding had been given him. In holding the adoption proceeding to be invalid as to the father, for these reasons, it was said that the jurisdiction of the court depended upon the express consent of the parents of the child, unless their residence was shown to be unknown, and it was added that it was not intended that the legal status of a child could be changed by the consent of only one of two living parents, and hence the order was not binding upon the nonconsenting parent.

In Miller v. Higgins, the fact that the parents had been divorced, and the child given into the custody of the mother, who consented to his adoption, was held not to render it unnecessary to obtain the consent of the father, and hence, as to him, the proceeding was invalid, his consent not having been obtained, and no notice of the proceeding given him.

Compare with Younger v. Younger, 106 Cal. 377, 39 Pac. 779, which holds that the adoption of a child, where based upon the consent of the mother, having the custody of the child, under an order of the court granting her a divorce from the father, was an absolute bar to proceedings by the father in the divorce case, for an order giving to him the custody of the child a portion of the time, the adoption proceeding being based upon a statute authorizing the adoption of the child with the consent of the parent having his custody under an order of a court divorcing the parents. The force of this decision is somewhat weakened by the later decision of that court, already noticed (Miller v. Higgins, supra), wherein the two cases are distinguished on the ground that, in the former case, the di-to the construction contended for, as there was no prejudice shown to have occurred to the adverse party, and in our judgment the same rule is entirely applicable in the case at bar. We cannot see that, had the petition been entitled differently, and filed as an original action, that the issue presented would have been different, nor can we see that the trial or the rights of the parties were in any way affected by the fact that it was filed or sought to be filed in the old case, which had been finally terminated. There being no prejudice, there was no error.

The next question which is presented is voice decree gave the custody of the child absolutely to the mother, who consented to the adoption, while in the latter case, the custody of the child was given to the mother, subject to the further order of the court.

At least, as affecting the child's rights of inheritance, a divorce of the parents may, by a statutory provision to that effect, render unnecessary the giving of notice to the parent who, by the decree of divorce, is deprived of the custody of the child, and who does not thereafter contribute to its support, where the proceeding is based on the consent of the parent awarded the custody of the child, and who supports it. Re Williams, 102 Cal. 70, 41 Am. St. Rep. 163, 36 Pac. 407.

A divorce granted the mother of a child on the ground of desertion by the father, together with his absence and failure to aid in the support of the child or mother, makes a sufficient case of desertion of both to sustain proceedings to adopt the child, although based merely upon the consent of the mother, and without notice to the father. Baker v. Strahorn, 33 Ill. App. 59.

It has been held that the consent of the mother of a child to his adoption is necessary only when she is living with her husband, or has the custody and control of the child; and hence, notice to her of the adoption of the child is not necessary when she is living separate and apart from the father, who has the charge and control of the child. James v. James, 35 Wash. 655, 77 Pac. 1082. Although this doctrine was asserted in general terms in the foregoing case, it gives doubtful support to the validity of adoption proceedings not based upon the consent of the parents, and without notice to them, as it was enunciated in a case where one of the adoptive parents, a party to the proceeding, was seeking to invalidate an order of adoption on the ground that the mother of the child had not been served with notice of the proceeding, and had not consented to the adoption.

Necessity of parent's consent to adoption of illegitimate child.

The mother of an illegitimate child has all the parental rights of other parents, and hence is entitled to notice of proceedings to 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the court, independent of this fact, is without jurisdiction to entertain the case and grant the relief demanded. The action which was here brought, as is noted, was for the purpose of requiring the defendant, who had effected the legitimation of this child (Allison v. Bryan, supra), to permit its natural mother to visit and have access to it. The district court is a court of general jurisdiction in which jurisdiction of actions both legal and equitable is vested, and in the exercise of its equity powers it would have jurisdiction to entertain, hear, and determine the questions presented in this case. It is held in the case of Rossell adopt her child. Purinton v. Jamrock, 195 Mass. 187, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 927, 80 N. E. 803; Re Sleep, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 256; Booth v. Van Allen, 7 Phila. 401; and to the same effect, see ALLISON v. BRYAN.

The fact that the mother is a minor when she gives her consent to the adoption of her illegitimate child will not invalidate an adoption proceeding based thereon. Re Bush, 47 Kan. 264, 27 Pac. 1003.

The consent of the mother to the adoption of her illegitimate child is sufficient without obtaining the consent of the father, his consent not being necessary. Gibson's Appeal, 154 Mass. 378, 28 N. E. 296.

The consent of the father is not sufficient, although he has legitimized the child. ALLISON v. BRYAN.

As with legitimate children, the mother of an illegitimate child may forfeit her parental rights to the child by abandonment or other sufficient reason, and the child may be adopted without notice to her. Thus, where the custody of an illegitimate child was taken from the mother after due notice to her, on the ground of her misconduct, neglect, crime, drunkenness, and other vices, and she acquiesced in such proceeding for a considerable period of time, permitting the child to be supported as a pauper, she was not entitled to notice of the proceeding to adopt him. Purinton v. Jamrock, supra.

So, where a mother abandons her illegitimate child, proceedings to adopt him may be sustained, and the child transferred to his adoptive parents, although the mother appears in the proceeding, and objects to the adoption. Richards v. Matteson, 8 S. D. 77, 65 N. W. 428; Winans v. Luppig, 47 N. J. Eq. 302, 20 Atl. 969.

But a mother cannot be said to have abandoned her illegitimate child, where she has made careful provision for it and secured for it a home and a care taker,—one who has agreed to stand in the relation of a parent to the child, and perform for him the duties of a mother,—the mother reserving the right to reclaim the child under certain circumstances; and hence, adoption proceedings without the consent of the mother, and based upon the claim that she had abandoned her child, will be set aside at her instance. Booth v. Van Allen, supra.

A. G. S.

v. Rossell, 64 N. J. Eq. 21, 53 Atl. 821, that "under proceedings invoking the general power of the chancellor over the affairs of infants and their custody during minority, . . . the chancellor may, by decree or order, award the custody of an infant child of parents living in a state of separation without being divorced, to one of them, and incidentally provide for the access of the other parent to the child, under proper restrictions."

The supreme court of Arkansas, in the case of State v. Grisby, 38 Ark. 406, says: "The jurisdiction of a court of chancery extends to the care of the person of an infant so far as necessary for his protection and education; and whenever it appears that a father is guilty of gross ill-treatment or cruelty towards his infant children, or that he is in constant habits of drunkenness and blasphemy, or low and gross debauchery, or that he professes atheistical or irreligious principles, or that his domestic relations are such as to tend to the corruption and contamination of his children, or that he otherwise acts injuriously to their morals or interest, in every such case a court of chancery will interfere and deprive him of their custody, and appoint them a suitable guardian to take care of them and superintend their education; and this jurisdiction is not taken away by the like power conferred by statute on the probate court." To the same effect, see Bowles v. Dixon, 32 Ark. 92; Re Lundergan, 30 N. Y. S. R. 382, 8 N. Y. Supp. 924; Com. ex rel. Strickland v. Strickland, 27 Pa. Super. Ct. 309; State, Baird, Prosecutor, v. Baird, 21 N. J. Eq. 384.

Nor is it true, as contended, that the failure to reply to the answer in the case admitted the allegations thereof, and thereby concluded the plaintiff as to the jurisdiction of the court. The case went to trial and was tried in all respects as if a reply had been filed, and the rule is that where a defendant voluntarily goes to trial without a reply, when he is not bound to do so, he is thereby held to have waived it, and is regarded as consenting to go to the proof of the answer, as if it were denied. Holt v. Holt, supra.

The defense set up in the motion and answer, that plaintiff could not be heard in this action because of her alleged contempt, is waived by counsel by not insisting thereon and urging it in their brief. It is not claimed that any proceedings have been taken against her, or judgment had therefor, nor is there any argument or citation contained in the brief, insisting thereon, and the same, if possessing any merit, is considered waived; the rule in 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such cases being stated by Judge Elliott, in his work on Appellate Procedure (§§ 444, 445), as follows: "It is essential that all points be made in the brief, and properly made; if not so made, they are waived. . . . It is not enough to assert in general terms that a ruling of the trial court is wrong; a fair effort must be made to prove that it is wrong, or the point will not be considered as having been made. Counsel cannot make a point in an appellate tribunal by a naked general assertion, for such an assertion will not be heeded. . . . But, in order to secure so much as notice of the point stated, they must support it by a fair effort, adducing arguments, and, if they can, citing authorities. A bare designation of a ruling as erroneous, without discussion, is not sufficient to entitle counsel to successfully insist that he has made a point."

We now come to the consideration of the merits of the case. To defeat the claim of right in the plaintiff to be permitted to have the right of visitation, and to be permitted at reasonable intervals to enjoy the society and to see and be with her child, aside from contending that it was against the best interests of the child, defendant relies upon an alleged adoption which it is contended took place on the 8th day of December, 1905, in the probate court of Cleveland county, wherein the defendant and his wife joined in a decree of adoption, thereby making the said child, in addition to being legitimated, the child of himself and wife by adoption. And it is argued that by reason of the fact that the defendant had legitimated the child, it was no longer illegitimate, and that being its legitimate father by virtue thereof, he had the power and the right to give consent to its adoption by himself and wife. This claim, in our judgment, cannot be sustained. At common law, so long, as the mother of an illegitimate child was living, she was entitled to its custody as against all the world. Inhabitants of Peter-sham v. Dana, 12 Mass. 429; Young v. State, 53 Ind. 536; Robalina v. Armstrong, 15 Barb. 247; People v. Mitchell, 44 Barb. 245. The infant was said to be the child of no one, and its putative father had no common-law right so long as the mother was living; his right attached only after her death, whereupon he became entitled as against the world to the care and custody of the child. Pote's Appeal, 106 Pa. 574, 51 Am. Rep. 540; Aycock v. Hampton, 84 Miss. 204, 65 L.R.A. 689, 105 Am. St. Rep. 424, 36 So. 245.

The common-law principles annunciated in the foregoing authorities find expression in our statute, § 4900, Compiled Laws of Oklahoma, 1909, as follows: "The mother of an illegitimate unmarried minor is entitled to its custody, services, and earnings." This is a statutory recognition of the right of the mother in an illegitimate child, as it existed at common law, and which cannot be denied her, except by force of some statute or by a court acting in the interest of the infant. Section 4919, Okla. Comp. Laws, 1909, provides: "A legitimate child cannot be adopted without the consent of its parents, if living, nor an illegitimate child without the consent of its mother, if living, except that consent is not necessary from a father or mother deprived of civil rights, or adjudged guilty of adultery or of cruelty, and for either cause divorced, or adjudged to be an habitual drunkard, or who has been judiciously deprived of the custody of the child, on account of cruelty or neglect."

The mother of this child was living at the date of the alleged adoption, and it is not claimed that she gave her consent to the adoption mentioned, nor that she had ever been adjudged guilty of adultery or any of the other grounds contained in the statute. But, as is seen, it is contended, by the circuitous route mentioned and the fact that the legitimation of the child could be accomplished without the consent of the mother, that the child could then be adopted by securing the consent of the legitimating parent, and in this way validate an adoption which could not otherwise be effected.

By adoption, a child in law ceases to be the child of its natural parents; they cease to have any legal rights therein; and it no longer owes to them any duty. So declares the statute, § 4930, Okla. Comp. Laws 1909, which is as follows: "The natural parents of a child so adopted shall be deprived by the decree of all legal rights as respects the child, and the child shall be decreed from all obligations of maintenance and obedience as respects such parents."

The statute of legitimation, § 4931, Okla. Comp. Laws 1909, contains no such terms, but provides that the father of an illegitimate child, by acknowledging it as his own, etc., and treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such, and such child is thereupon deemed legitimate from the time of its birth. The word "adopts" is used in the sense of "legitimizes," and the child is legitimated rather than adopted. Allison v. Bryan, 21 Okla. 557, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 931, 97 Pac. 282, 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 468; Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 19 L.R.A. 40, 31 Pac. 915. The effect of such legitimation on the child is noted in a discussion contained in the case of Pratt v. Pratt, 5 Mo. App. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

539: "A legitimate child has, from the moment of its birth until the day of its legal majority, a common-law right to a support from the father. It is entitled to bear his name, even though never acquired by common reputation. If designated in a grant or devise as the child of a named person, who is known as its father, the identification is established and the acquisition made secure. It may inherit, not merely from the father, but from remoter ancestors and from collateral kindred. It may also be inherited from, in an ascending, descending, or collateral direction. These and other incidents are the legal insignia of legitimate birth. Bastardy has none of them. The illegitimate son is filius nullius. He has no claim to a support from his father, unless by statutory provision. He cannot take his father's name, or any name, except such as may be appropriated through common reputation. He can acquire nothing from a grant or devise in which he is only designated by a reference to his putative father. He cannot inherit, either from his father, or from any remoter ancestor, or from a collateral kinsman. He cannot be inherited from, except by his own descendants. All these several adjuncts or incidents, in either classification, make up the status or condition which is called legitimacy, or bastardy, as the case may be."

Adoption as we see, cannot be legally made where the parents of a legitimate, or the mother of an illegitimate, child are living, except through and by their consent; and while doubtless all parental rights are yielded in the case of adoption, we have found no foundation for the claim that all rights on the part of the mother of an illegitimate child, consistent with its best interests, are lost in the mere exercise by the father of his right of legitimation. The interests of the child are of first and controlling importance; some mothers of illegitimate children, considering solely their best interests, might be willing to waive all rights of every kind and character which they possessed therein in order to have them adopted and thereby enabled to enjoy the privilege of legitimate persons. Others, seemingly forgetful or indifferent to the best interests of the child, or even taking a different view, might refuse an opportunity of this character, the result of which would be to the child's detriment; and it was to provide for cases of this character that the law, in its great interests in the child's welfare, empowered the father to exercise the rights given under the legitimating statute.

But no case has been called to our attention, and a most diligent search has failed to reveal one, which has gone to the extent of holding that the father, after having, against the mother's wishes and will, legitimated the child, could then further ignore the mother's affection and interest in it, and again act against her consent, and effect an adoption, with all its legal consequences. It is true that, acting under the statute, the father has completely legitimated the child; it now enjoys all of the rights and privileges of a legitimate child, as mentioned in the case of Pratt v. Pratt, supra, and "the father of a legitimate, unmarried minor child is entitled to its custody, services, and earnings" (Okla. Comp. Laws 1909, § 4899), and the reciprocal rights and duties between the father and the child are the same as those existing between legitimate parents and their legitimate children; still, as to its mother, when her rights are involved, it is an illegitimate child, and the law is that an illegitimate minor child cannot be adopted without the mother's consent, and that which cannot be done directly cannot be done indirectly. Except for the legitimating statute, no one could have disturbed this woman's complete right of custody in and to her child, and in our judgment it would be a strained and unnatural construction of this statute and the rights of the parties under it to yield to the contention of counsel for defendant, for "the law should never receive such a construction as would tend to dry up the sources of natural affection." Barela v. Roberts, 34 Tex. 554. If the mother desires to give her consent to adoption, she, of course, may do so; but she cannot be lawfully stripped of her inherent right to say no.

In conjunction with the foregoing we notice the claim of counsel that the father made, executed, and had recorded, a deed of adoption in Kansas City, Missouri, in June, 1903. This, it is contended, was done with the consent of plaintiff, and the claim is made she thereby yielded the right she now asserts. We do not so construe this instrument; that deed was effectual merely to constitute of the infant an heir of his father, and to vest in him a right to look to him for support. This is the specific limitation contained in the deed. It contains the proviso: "With all the right as heir or devisee, and with the same rights as if he had been born to me in lawful wedlock, and with all the privilege and obligation existing between parent and child, according to the provision of an act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri, the same being chapter 90 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, 1899, and as construed by the decision of the supreme court of Missouri in the case of Fosburgh v. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Rogers, 114 Mo. 122, 19 L.R.A. 201, 21 S. W. 82, which act and decision expresses the intention of the parties and by which they will be governed."

An inspection of the case referred to verifies the limitation we here place on the instrument, as it related solely to the child's right of inheritance. The particular section of the statute under which this deed was executed received a construction at the hands of the supreme court of Missouri in the case of Re Clements, 78 Mo. 352, and of its effect in reference to the rights of the natural parents, the court said: "The statute in question, it must be confessed, is quite imperfect and very unskillfully drawn, but, when carefully considered, we think it will be found to contain enough to effectuate its general purpose. The 1st section (§ 599 [Rev. Stat. 1879]) is complete and perfect in itself, and authorizes any person to adopt the child of another so as to make him his heir, without the consent of the parents or other person. Reinders v. Koppelman, 68 Mo. loc. cit. 499, 30 Am. Rep. 802. This the legislature, having undoubted power to enact a statute of descents, may lawfully authorize to be done. This section, it will be perceived, does not undertake to create or establish the relation of parent and child between the adopter and the adopted, further than to give the child adopted a right of inheritance to the same extent as if he or she were the child of the adopter. The privilege thereby conferred may be of no pecuniary or other benefit to the recipient, until the death of the adopter. But the 3d section (§ 601) goes further, and gives the child adopted a right during the life of the adopter to have and receive from him or her, support, maintenance, and proper and humane treatment. The devolution of these parental duties upon the adoptive father necessarily implies that he is to have the custody and control of the child adopted. But as the legislature has no power to authorize one person, whether acting from motives of charity, benevolence, or caprice, to transfer to himself, at his own election, the custody and control of the children of another, it is declared in the last clause of this section that 'this provision,' meaning the whole of the 3d section, wherein the rights, express or implied, hereinbefore mentioned, are conferred, 'shall not extend to other parties, but is wholly confined to parties executing the deed of adoption.' That is to say, parties who do not join in the deed of adoption shall not be affected by anything contained in the 3d section; or, to state the matter differently, the natural relations of parent and child, and the rights and duties spring; ing therefrom, are not to be disturbed without the consent of the natural parent." The mother was not a party to the deed and even had she consented to its execution, it deprived her of no right she now asserts.

We do not dissent from the law of the cases of Hope's Petition, 19 R. I. 486, 34 Atl. 994, and Ousset v. Euvrard (N. J. Eq.) 52 Atl. 1110, relied on by defendant. Each of these cases states the conceded proposition that the custody of the child, either legitimate or illegitimate, where a controversy arises in reference thereto, is granted wherever its best interests and welfare direct. This is virtually all that was passed on in the Hope Case. In the Ousset v. Euvrard Case, the mother of certain illegitimate children, by an instrument in writing, transferred all of her interest and custody in and to them to their father, who, with the consent of his wife, had taken them into his household. He was wealthy and the children had a good home. The mother sought to set aside this instrument and take the children, remove them from the state to a tenement in New York city, where she and her husband lived, both of whom were engaged in gainful occupations for a daily livelihood. The court found specifically that the mother was unfit and the prospective home unsuited for the children, and for this and other reasons refused to set aside the instrument. For sufficient reasons and facts which are made apparent in the case, the mother was denied the custody of the children and also the right to visit them at the home of their father and his wife. The issues presented in that case and in this were likewise in other ways dissimilar; so much so that it can scarcely be considered an authority to a further extent than presenting a recognition of the conceded doctrine that the best interest of the child is the controlling element in all of these cases.

We have made an exhaustive examination of the authorities wherein the question of the right of parents to visit children whose custody had been taken from one or the other or both, and from them, without detailing the facts of each, we cull the following declarations of the rule laid down by the courts on this subject.

"The privilege of visiting accorded to the mother is a plain dictate of humanity, in the absence of any reason to suppose that the privilege would be abused to the injury of the boy. There was none in this case. The charges of immorality against the mother were not sustained. She is shown to be an industrious, hard-working woman, and a good woman, by all the witnesses, except the defendant. But had it been otherwise, the permission to visit would not be necessarily erroneous. The courts should regard the maternal instinct in the veriest trull that walks the streets, taking proper care that it do not lead to the corruption of the offspring. It is the strongest and holiest sentiment of humanity; the freest from selfishness or impurity; and often the last hope of redemption for fallen natures." Haley v. Haley, 44 Ark. 429.

"Under our statutes, the father is given the right to the custody of his minor children, yet this right is not an absolute legal right, beyond the control of the courts. The cardinal principle in such matters is to regard the benefit of the infant paramount to the claims of either parent. While the courts will not lightly interfere with what may be termed the 'natural rights' of parents, yet the primary object of all courts, at least in America, is to secure the welfare of the child, and not the special claims of one or the other parent. Under the facts of this case, we cannot see that the trial court at all abused its judicial discretion in giving the custody of this infant to its mother, subject to the conditions, however, that she should not remove it from the city, and that the father should have the right to visit it at seasonable hours three times a week, and to take it to his home or for a walk or drive for five hours every Sunday. Of course, all such orders are merely provisional and temporary, and may be changed at any time when conditions change." State ex rel. Flint v. Flint, 63 Minn. 187, 65 N. W. 272.

"The future welfare and happiness of the child is entitled to the highest regard, if not to paramount consideration. Her worldly prospects in life are mainly dependent upon her father, and it is not to be disguised that there is great danger from the existing state of things that his natural love and regard for her may by degrees become weakened, and be followed by alienation and estrangement. The daughter is now of a suitable age to be placed at a boarding school, under the especial charge of some lady of character; and while I cannot assent to any plan which will deprive her mother of her care, or of her society, so far as is compatible with her position in a school, yet I am persuaded that a scheme may be framed upon that position, which will enable her father to visit her with more freedom, and with more advantage to her cherishing due respect and affection for him, than can be afforded in her present situation." Ahrenfeldt v. Ahrenfeldt, 4 Sandf. Ch. 493.

"As a matter of strict law, it cannot be denied that in this state, as at common law, the general rule is that the claim of the father to the persons of his infant children is paramount to those of the mother. This rule is so entirely axiomatic that it would be idle to cite authorities in its support. But this rule has only a subordinate application whenever a court of equity is called upon to exercise its authority in that branch of its capacity just referred to. On such an occasion it is not the dry, technical right of the father, but the welfare of the child, which will form the substantial basis of judgment. The legal right of the father will not be passed by, except when, in the opinion of the court, the well-being of the child requires such supersedure. . . . Provision should be made in the decree for the reasonable access of the parents, respectively, to the children, and a privilege should likewise be reserved that either party, in case of any material change of circumstances, should be permitted to come into court for further directions or assistance." State, Baird, Prosecutor, v. Baird, 21 N. J. Eq. 384.

"The general rule is that the father is entitled to the custody of his child; but the chancellor will look to the happiness and comfort of the child, and will confide his custody to the parent whose time and attention can be best devoted to its care and welfare. See Irwin v. Irwin, 96 Ky. 318, 28 S. W. 664, 30 S. W. 417, and McBride v. McBride, 1 Bush, 15. We are of opinion that the court did not err in awarding the custody of the child to its mother, it being of tender years and in delicate health; but the court erred in not providing in the order that the appellee, the father, should be permitted at reasonable times and places to visit and enjoy its society." Barlow v. Barlow, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 664, 90 S. W. 216.

"The enforcement of the prima facie right of Mrs. Smith to the custody of her minor children is resisted upon the ground of her unfitness, arising from excessive use of intoxicating drinks. The existence of this deplorable habit at one period of her life is admitted in the traverse by the petitioner of the return of the respondent; but she also asserts that she has reformed this habit and that for months before filing this petition she had abstained from the use of liquor; and that she conquered this appetite upon her promise of the respondent that, upon effecting this reformation, her children would be given her. . . . Mrs. Smith must not, however, be denied access to her children. At reasonable times she must be permitted to visit them, and to have them to herself on such occasions, if she desires it. It is right that her offspring should be taught to love their mother, and it depends upon herself whether the legal right to which I have referred shall at a future day be granted to her." Com. ex rel. Smith v. Smith, 1 Brewst. (Pa.) 547.

"Our decision is that, for the present, at least, the child be allowed to remain with the mother. We wish to add, however a single monitory remark. The mother should remember that this decision is not necessarily definitive, and that while the custody of the child is confided to her, the father's right has not been forfeited. It will be her duty to respect his right and allow him every proper opportunity to cultivate the affection of the child. Especially will it be her duty to refrain from any attempt to alienate the child from the father, or to instill into her mind any thought or feeling which a daughter ought not to cherish for her father. A failure to observe this monition may be good ground for another application on the part of the petitioner for the custody of his child." McKim v. McKim, 12 R. I. 462, 34 Am. Rep. 694.

And finally, this court, in its former opinion, after holding that the father, by virtue of his acts under the legitimating statute, was entitled, as against the mother or the world, to the possession of the child, in consonance with the holding of all the courts, declared: "We would not have it understood, however, that, in thus declaring the law, we hold he should not see his mother, be with her, or be permitted to enjoy her society, nor she his. Not at all. Under the judgment rendered in this cause in the lower court, provision was made for the father to visit the child, and the successful respondents should not be deaf to those common promptings of humanity which dictate that the child and the mother be granted the utmost possible latitude for social communion consistent with the new duties placed upon all. In case of sickness or accident the mother should be promptly notified, and, if she desires, permitted to attend, care for, and nurse. The treatment to be accorded the child is that usually accorded legitimate children. Such children are frequently permitted to go from home to visit their friends and kindred, and friends and kindred are frequently permitted to visit them, and this is the treatment that the father, in this instance and in this case, should accord to this child, and which should now establish its relationship toward its mother." [21 Okla. 573.]

From the foregoing it will be seen that under practically every and all conditions the parent, in some instances the father and in others the mother, while losing the right of custody of their children, have in every instance received at the hands of the court recognition of their right of visitation. It is true the foregoing cases, other than the opinion of this court, present those only in which the question arose between parents of legitimate children, but the underlying reason for the rule was in each instance that the one accorded the right was a parent, and that it was in accord with humanity and right living and the best interests of the child that it should not forget and be estranged. The father of this child has, perforce of the law in this state, been enabled to take from this mother, against her will, this child, and to take to himself its care and custody. We have no doubt of his sincere affection for it, nor do we question that he and his wife desire to retain it in their home, nor do we doubt that, when the best interests of the child are taken into consideration, the force and effect of this law and their action under it will result in effecting the best interests of the child. While granting the foregoing, there is no law, either written or unwritten, which denies to its mother, where it will not conflict with the interest of the child, the right of visitation accorded by the courts to all other parents.

Mrs. Allison is not a necessary party in either of these cases. The child by the act of the father was not made her heir. Barnes v. Allen, 25 Ind. 222; Keith v. Ault, 144 Ind. 626, 43 N. E. 924. Nor did it enter her household as her child. The statute under which it was legitimated would have been rendered in very many instances nugatory and its effectiveness largely curtailed, if, acting under it, the child to be legitimated were to take as an heir of the wife of its father, as but few if any wives could be found who would consent to receive into their homes such children, when to do so would make them heirs equally with their own children, and in practically all of such cases the wife would refuse to permit its entrance in the family. The legitimation of the child under this statute was accomplished by the father, and the wife's sole connection with the transaction was the giving of her consent to its reception into the family, where it might be treated as if it were legitimate. It has been represented to us that Mr. and Mrs. Allison are without other children; that she is possessed of considerable means, and has by will made it her heir; also that she entertains toward it a deep and sincere affection,—all of which is highly praiseworthy, tending to the child's welfare and happiness, and further justifying its father in his commendable course resulting in its legitimation. The defense tendered by Mr. Allison in the contempt proceeding is that Mrs. Allison refused to permit him to comply with the order of the court; this cannot be allowed him, as his wife has no legal right to the custody and control of the child. If the best interests of the child require it, or the father contumaciously bids defiance to its orders, there is full authority in the court to take it from their household and place it with the mother or elsewhere, and if the mother's deportment is such that, by permitting her to visit with the child, it would be detrimental to its best interests, then this privilege may be denied her, so that the relationship of both parties to this controversy toward this child depends upon their conduct.

We desire just here to drop this word of admonition to both parties. This child is entitled to the affection of both its father and its mother, and they likewise are entitled to the affection of the child; and it is the positive, affirmative duty of each, abiding constantly with them, to say nothing to cause it to think ill of the other, nor should they permit others in its presence to harshly criticize the absent one.

There is no evidence in this record to justify us in finding that detriment would come to the child by permitting its mother to see it for the brief period granted in the order of the court, twice each month. If a change of situation occurs, justifying a change in any of its terms, the power still remains with the court, on application, to modify it in any particular; but neither party has a right to violate it. The happiness which has come to Mr. and Mrs. Allison in the companionship of this little child ought to cause them to reflect most seriously upon the situation in which their privilege places its unfortunate mother, and this thought should cause them to turn a tender side to the one who has lost all, and more than that which they have gained, and they should ungrudgingly grant and permit her the small measure of happiness which she can secure by the brief opportunities afforded by this order to see her offspring. The status of this child has once more had the careful, painstaking consideration of this court, and in affirming the judgments now before us, it is with the hope that it will put a finality to the controversy.

The judgment of the trial court in both cases is accordingly affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

LEONARD H. PHILLIPS et al.
v.

HORACE CHASE, Appt.

(203 Mass. 556, 89 N. E. 1049.)

Evidence — sufficiency — undue influence.

1. A finding of undue influence in securing an adoption by a woman of the son of her husband by a former wife is supported by evidence that the husband, being her physician and she an invalid, married her after she had secured a divorce from a former husband, about which she was peculiarly sensitive, and within a few months threatened to leave her unless she would adopt his son, which under the circumstances she could not bear, and that she subsequently said many times that she was forced to adopt the son against her will.

Adoption — fraud — setting aside decree.

2. One who so dominates the will of his wife as to force her against her will to bring a petition in court for the adoption of his son by a former wife commits a gross fraud upon the wife, and such fraud upon the court that the decree of adoption will be set aside in a proper case.

Appeal — objections — sufficiency — probate decree.

3. An objection that a decree of adoption entered by a probate court cannot be set aside on the facts entitles one appealing from a subsequent decree attempting to set it aside, to raise the question wheth-

Note. — Right of parties to adoption proceeding, or their privies, to attack decree of adoption.

As to the validity of adoption without notice to the natural parents, see Allison v. Bryan, ante, 146, and note thereto.

The rule is well settled that neither the parties to adoption proceedings, nor their heirs, privies, or personal representatives, are entitled collaterally to attack a judgment of adoption, for failure to comply with the statutory requirements in the adoption proceedings, after the order of adoption has been recognized and treated as valid by the parties thereto. Coleman v. Coleman, 81 Ark. 7, 98 S. W. 733; Woodward's Appeal, 81 Conn. 152, 70 Atl. 453; Sullivan v. People, 224 Ill. 468, 79 N. E. 695; Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 37 Am. Rep. 321; Nugent v. Powell, 4 Wyo. 173, 20 L.R.A. 199, 62 Am. St. Rep. 17, 33 Pac. 23; Nelson v. Nelson, 127 Ill. App. 422; Re McKeag, 141 Cal. 403, 99 Am. St. Rep. 80, 74 Pac. 1039; Cubitt v. Cubitt, 74 Kan. 353, 86 Pac. 475; Mullany's Adoption, 25 Pa. Co. Ct. 561; Brown's Adoption, 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 259; Wolf's Appeal, 10 Sadler (Pa.) 139, 22 W. N. C. 93, 13 Atl. 760; Parsons v. Parsons, 101 Wis. 76, 70 Am. St. Rep. 894, 77 N. W. 147.

As said in Parsons v. Parsons, supra: "Proceedings to avoid the judgment of adoption are clearly of an equitable nature, and after the lapse of many years, during which time the status of the subject of adoption has been recognized as legally fixed by the judgment of the county court by all parties to the proceedings, one of those parties on whose motion the judgment was rendered is in no position to appeal to the equity powers of the court to declare it void. The plainest principles of estoppel apply to the situation. Appellant petitioned for the judgment. It was entered on her motion. The person most interested, the child, was a ward of the court, and its status for life was entirely and irrevocably changed by the result of the proceedings, if they were valid. Their validity was recognized by the appellant till she became pecuniarily interested in changing her position. Clearly she cannot be aided by a court of equity to do that to the injury of the person she was instrumental in locating in her family as her adopted son."

And in Re McKeag, the court remarked: "There is nothing that can be said against the policy of adoption laws; there is everything that can be said in their favor. Under them, innocent, parentless, and abandoned children are withdrawn from the charity of public institutions, and provided with comfortable homes and affectionate foster parents. Unfortunate children whose parents, through overwhelming adversity, or the infirmities of their nature, are unable to care and provide for them, are placed in cheerful homes under the care and control of adoptive parents, willing and able to provide for their protection and comfort. Under the beneficent provision of these statutes, such children are accorded advantages and opportunities for better moral, intellectual, and material advancement; a measure of happiness is secured to the adoptive parents and the child adopted, under the reciprocal influences of filial and parental affection, and, inasmuch as the development of the child into a valuable member of society and an upright citizen depends upon healthy, moral home influences and parental solicitude, to that all-important extent, then, under these laws, are the best interests of society and the state conserved. Recognizing these good results, courts are more and more inclined to an abandonment of the old rule of strict construction, and to place a fair and reasonable construction upon proceedings under the statute, with a view of sustaining the assumed relationship, particularly against a collateral attack by strangers to the proceedings, whose only interest is to defeat the relations which the adoptive parents always recognized and never questioned, so that they may succeed to an estate from which, by the very fact of adoption, the adoptive parents intended they should be excluded in favor of the adopted child."

But see Furgeson v. Jones, 17 Or. 205, 3 L.R.A. 620, 11 Am. St. Rep. 808, 20 Pac.

er or not petitioner is entitled on all the facts to any relief, and to raise objections not specified as objections to the decree, where under such an appeal the case is heard de novo in the appellate court.

Fraudulent decree — setting aside — fraudulent beneficiary — innocent party.

4. A man who by fraud induces his wife to adopt his son by a former wife, thinking that if the son gets her property the father will benefit thereby, cannot, after the son's death, assert title to the property as his heir against the next of kin of the wife, on the theory that the decree of adoption cannot be set aside because the son was not a party to the fraud.

Decree — death of parties — setting aside.

5. A decree secured by fraud, whereby a

842, wherein it is asserted that adoption proceedings invalid for a failure to obtain the consent of the father, or to serve him with notice, actual or constructive, of the proceeding, may be successfully attacked on that ground by any person who may be interested in or affected by such decree.

An order of adoption will be revoked by mutual consent of the parties, where, upon investigation by the court, such a course is found to be for the best interests of the child. Re Gatkowski, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 191.

Where the right of inheritance depends upon the recording of the decree of adoption, and it is not recorded, the adopted child cannot claim to inherit the property of his adoptive mother as against her legal heirs. James v. James, 35 Wash. 650, 77 Pac. 1080.

There is nothing in the nature of a decree of adoption to take away the power of the court wherein the proceeding was held to revoke and annul the decree on the ground that it was procured by fraud practised upon the court, at least where practised by a party to the proceeding, when the other party thereto is seeking relief therefrom because of such fraud. Tucker v. Fisk, 154 Mass. 674, 28 N. E. 1051, approved in Fiske v. Pratt, 157 Mass. 83, 31 N. E. 715; McKay v. Kean, 167 Mass. 524, 46 N. E. 120; PHILLIPS v. CHASE.

Applying this doctrine in Tucker v. Fisk, the heirs and legal representatives of an adoptive parent, after her death, were permitted to attack the validity of an order of adoption on the ground that such parent, at the time of the adoption proceeding, was of unsound mind, and the adoption was procured by undue influence exercised upon her by the person adopted; these facts being concealed from the court in order to obtain the decree of adoption.

It is, however, not sufficient that fraud be practised upon the party to the adoption proceeding, but, in order to render the decree of adoption open to attack on the ground of fraud, it must further appear that a fraud was practised upon the court in procurating the decree; hence it is not error for the probate court to refuse to frame an issue of fact for the jury on the question whether fraud was practised upon a party to the adoption proceeding, it being a question properly for that court to determine whether a fraud was practised upon it. Fiske v. Pratt and McKay v. Kean, supra.

Appeal — probate decree — sufficiency of objections.

6. The question of ratification of a decree of adoption procured by fraud, or of laches and the statute of limitations, cannot be raised on appeal from a subsequent decree of the probate court setting aside the former one, where no objections to the decree on those grounds were filed on appeal, although upon such an appeal the case is heard de novo in the appellate court.

(November 23, 1909.)

The mere silence of an infant in proceedings to adopt him by a person of unsound mind does not constitute a fraud upon the court which will entitle the heirs of the adoptive parent, after the parent's death, to have the order of adoption set aside, since the infant has no part in the proceedings, the whole matter resting with the court, whose duty it is to make such an investigation as it deems proper. Brown v. Brown, 101 Ind. 340.

That the grandfather of a child practised a fraud upon the mother by inducing in her mind the belief that her child was dead, and thereby obtained her consent to the adoption by third parties of a child claimed to be hers, but the parentage of which was in doubt, is not sufficient to entitle the mother to have the order of adoption set aside, where the adoptive parents acted in good faith in the proceeding, and relied upon letters of the mother indicating her consent to the adoption without reference to whether the child adopted was actually her child. Barclay v. People, 132 Ill. App. 338.

That the father practised a fraud upon the adoptive parents by representing the mother to be dead, and thereby induced such parents to adopt the child, which they would not have done had they known the mother was living, is not a ground for setting aside the decree of adoption at the instance of the adoptive parents. James v. James, 35 Wash. 655, 77 Pac. 1082.

The consent of a mother to the adoption of her child, under the mistaken belief that she has not long to live, is no ground for thereafter setting aside the order of adoption. Nelson v. Nelson, 127 Ill. App. 422.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree the Supreme Judicial Court for Essex County affirming a decree of the Probate Court revoking a former decree of that court by which Mrs. Jeannie P. Chase adopted De Forest Woodruff Chase. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frederic D. McKenney, with Messrs. Robert M. Morse, Joseph H. Soliday, and Richard Y. Fitz Gerald, for appellant:

A wrongful appeal to motives not absolutely dominating was the utmost undue influence that the evidence could be held to have proved, and that is not sufficient to warrant setting aside a status.

Silsbee v. Webber, 171 Mass. 378, 50 N. E. 555; Re Brigham, 176 Mass. 227, 57 N. E. 328; Fairbanks v. Snow, 145 Mass. 153, 1 Am. St. Rep. 446, 13 N. E. 596.

There was no such undue influence as would at any time have warranted annulling the decree.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On April 23, 1889, the judge of the probate court for the county of Essex made a decree, after hearing, by which De Forest Woodruff Chase, son of her husband by a former wife, became the adopted son of Mrs. Chase. Mrs. Chase died on September 13, 1905. A month later (on October 14, 1905) a petition was filed by those who, but for the adoption, would have been her next of kin, to set aside the decree of adoption. On October 20, 1905, De Forest Woodruff Chase voluntarily accepted service. He gave his deposition on November 10, in the presence of the judge of probate who entered the original decree of adoption, and died on December 19, 1905. The same judge, after hearing, found that the petition for adoption and the decree entered thereon "were procured by the undue influence of her husband, the said Horace Chase, and were a fraud upon said court," and entered a decree revoking the decree of adoption. This was on February 19, 1906. On March 8, 1906, Horace Chase took two appeals from this decree, one as sole heir of Woodruff, adopted son, and interested in the estate of Mrs. Chase, and the other as administrator of the estate of Woodruff, adopted son and interested in Mrs. Chase's estate.

The appellant filed five objections to the decree of the probate court.

On his motion the following issues were tried by a jury: "(1) Did Jeannie P. Chase of her own free will adopt De Forest Woodruff Chase on April 23, 1889? (2) Was she unduly influenced in the making of said adoption by Horace Chase or any other person?"

On the first issue the jury answered "No," and on the second, "Yes."

After these issues had been tried the appeal came on for hearing before the chief justice of this court on the other issues involved in it. The appellant introduced in evidence the evidence taken before the jury. No other evidence was offered by either party. The chief justice, on the answers made by the jury and on the evidence introduced before him, found for the appellees, and entered a decree affirming the decree of the probate court revoking the decree of adoption. The case is before us on an appeal from that decree.

1. The first question raised is that covered by the fifth objection filed by the appellant, to wit: "The procuring of said adoption did not constitute a fraud upon said court."

We are of opinion that the answers given by the jury on the two issues tried by them settle that question in the affirmative.

The second of the two issues settled by the verdict of the jury in the case at bar is not in the usual form. But we are of opinion that the verdict must be taken to be tantamount to a finding on an issue in the usual form, and to mean that the adoption was procured by the undue influence of Horace Chase or some other person; and we are further of opinion that we ought to construe it in the light of the evidence on which (as appears from the evidence at the later hearing) it was founded. So construed, it must be taken to be a finding that the adoption was procured by the undue influence of Horace Chase. There is nothing in that evidence showing undue influence by any other person.

Undue influence in procuring another to adopt his child means the same thing as undue influence in procuring another to make a will, for example, in favor of his child. It is established that that means that the person exercising the influence so far dominated the will of the other person as to substitute his will for that of the other person, with the result that the action brought about by the undue influence is not in reality the act of the person whose act it is in form, but the act of the person exercising the undue influence. Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Woodbury v. Woodbury, 141 Mass. 329, 55 Am. Rep. 479, 5 N. E. 275.

The appellant has argued that the finding of the jury in the case at bar should not be taken to be a finding of undue influence in that sense of the term. But the record does not disclose what the instructions were under which the jury made their finding on this issue. The instructions given to the jury should have been those stated above, and, in the absence of the charge actually given, must be taken to have been so.

The appellant now seeks to raise the further point that the evidence did not warrant a finding that there was undue influence on the part of Dr. Chase, if that is what undue influence means.

It is not clear that this argument does not come too late. The proper time for raising that question was at the trial of the issue, by asking for a ruling that the evidence did not warrant a finding that the adoption was procured by undue influence, or by an exception to the instructions under which the jury were allowed to find that it was. No such question was then raised. See Phillips v. Chase, 201 Mass. 444, 131 Am. St. Rep. 406, 87 N. E. 755. But all the evidence before the jury is before us, and (without intimating that the appellant has a right to raise the question now) we prefer to put our decision on the ground that the evidence did warrant the finding, giving to it the meaning that we have held must be given to it.

The principal argument of the appellant on this point is that "Mrs. Chase stated to her brother that the doctor gave her a week to decide whether she should adopt his son, or have him leave her (Evidence of Leonard Phillips, p. 152); and on Mrs. Chase's fear of a possible scandal arising out of the separation, the whole claim of the petitioner is based. But this was merely an appeal to motives, and an appeal to motives does not constitute duress." "Duress must overpower the mind, not merely influence the choice."

Undue influence must overpower the mind, and in our opinion the evidence in the case at bar warranted a finding that Mrs. Chase's mind had been overpowered by her husband. What is true of duress is true of undue influence, namely, it is of no consequence how the domination over the mind was acquired; it is enough that it was acquired. Silabee v. Webber, 171 Mass. 378, 50 N. E. 555. If the evidence in the case at bar had shown nothing more than the presentation by one person to another of a choice between two courses of action, the jury would not have been warranted in finding that the adoption was procured by undue influence. But the evidence in the case at bar was not merely that. The marriage between Dr. Chase and Mrs. Chase took place on January 26, 1889, and the adoption on April 23 of the same year. Dr. Chase made the acquaintance of the woman who afterwards became his wife in 1884 or 1885. She was then Mrs. Culliton, and came to him as a patient. By his own account she was then in a very pitiful condition, a physical wreck, anemic and unable to walk more than a short distance without fatigue, or to read without her eyes paining her. There was another trouble which need not be mentioned. He did much to relieve her, and in six months she had greatly improved. She remained under his care as a physician continuously thereafter, and in his own words: "There never was a day, as I lived with her, that I didn't have a suggestion to make for her physical benefit." She obtained a decree of divorce nisi from her first husband in December, 1887, and this was made absolute in June, 1888. It turned out that Culliton had married her from mercenary motives only, and in another way the marriage and the reason for her leaving her husband made her peculiarly sensitive about it. It was also in evidence that Mrs. Chase, as she afterward became, looked upon it as a scandal so humiliating to her that she could not endure a similar one. The jury were warranted in finding that this was so, that Dr. Chase knew it, and, to force her to adopt his son, told her within three months after the marriage that if she did not do so he would desert her. There was no pretense that the adoption was made by reason of any affection which she then bore to Woodruff. Their acquaintance up to that time was casual only. Woodruff testified that he was asked to come to Swampscott and that he did so; that he was then asked to go to Salem with Dr. and Mrs. Chase, and while on the train to Salem he learned for the first time that the reason why he had been summoned to Swampscott, and was going to Salem, was to be adopted by Mrs. Chase. He was asked if he had any objections. "I told her, 'No;' that if I could be of any service I should be glad. She said that, owing to certain conditions in her mother's will and certain conditions that the trust fund had been left in, she wanted to have it so that she could leave her money as she wished to, and she found that she could not do so without adopting some lawful heir; that she wished that her money should go to my father and to me." And Dr. Chase himself testified that the reason Mrs. Chase gave for the adoption was to protect him: "If my son had it, I presume my son would be kind enough, if I needed it, to share with me." In addition there was evidence that Mrs. Chase frequently spoke in later years of the adoption "bitterly," that she said that she had been forced to do it against her will, and when her husband left for a time at a later date, she tried to kill herself, and finally asked him to come back on his own terms. This case therefore could be found not to be a case where one at arm's length gives another a choice of action. Dr. Chase stood in the twofold confidential relation of physician and husband; Mrs. Chase, though better, was not well; and the jury were warranted in finding that, to his knowledge, she was not willing to submit to a second scandal arising out of marriage, and that she at many times said that she was forced against her will to adopt Woodruff as her son. The evidence was conflicting, and the jury could have taken a different view of the case. But the evidence authorized a finding that the adoption was procured by undue influence, and that view of it was taken by the jury.

We are of opinion that if one so dominates his wife's will as to force her against her will to bring a petition in court for the adoption by her of his son by a former wife, he commits a gross fraud upon his wife, and such a fraud upon the court that the decree of adoption should be set aside in a proper case. For that proposition no authorities are necessary.

2. The next contention of the appellant is that on the facts found by the jury, and on any facts which could have been found on the evidence before the chief justice, the decree of adoption cannot be set aside. This contention is based on the fact that the fraud was not committed by Woodruff Chase, the other party to the petition for adoption, that the wrong done was a wrong done to Mrs. Chase, not to her next of kin, that the status created by the adoption cannot, or at any rate will not, be changed after the death of both parties to it, and that Dr. Chase, in defending the petition for revocation, is defending in the right of his son, and consequently that the petition must be disposed of as it would be disposed of if Woodruff Chase were alive and defending the petition.

The appellees have argued that these objections, not having been specified by the appellant as objections to the decree, are not now open to him.

Where an appeal is taken to the supreme judicial court from a decree of the probate court, the case involved in that decree is heard de novo in the appellate court. Ordinarily no answer is filed in the probate court by the respondent. In cases where the appeal is taken by him, the objections to the decree appealed from serve the same purpose as an answer; and in all cases the purpose of Rev. Laws, chap. 162, § 10, is to give notice to the other party of the issues which the appellant intends to raise. Objections to an appeal required by Rev. Laws, chap. 162, § 10, are not like assignments of errors under the eleventh rule of the United States circuit court of appeals (79 C. C. A. xxvii. 150 Fed. xxvii.), which requires the appellant, with his petition for a writ of error or appeal, to file "an assignment of errors which shall set out separately and particularly each error asserted and intended to be urged." For that reason Oswego Twp. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 17 C. C. A. 77, 36 U. S. App. 13, 70 Fed. 225, and the other cases in circuit courts of appeal of the United States cited by the defendant, are not applicable here; and the other cases cited by the appellant seem to be decisions under similar requirements. The rule of construction to be applied in case of objections to an act appealed from under Rev. Laws, chap. 162, § 10, was laid down in Codwise v. Livermore, 194 Mass. 445, 80 N. E. 609.

An objection by a respondent that the decree appealed from is against the law gives the appellee notice that at least the appellant contends that the facts do not entitle the petitioner to any relief, and we are of opinion that the first objection in the case at bar entitles the appellant to raise the question which would be open under a general demurrer, to wit, is the petitioner entitled on all the facts to any relief?

The issues involved in this case were greatly simplified by the death of Woodruff Chase. On the evidence it hardly could have been found as a fact that he was a party or even privy to the fraud committed upon Mrs. Chase by his father. Had he lived, he could have invoked with great force (as his father has attempted to do in the case at bar) the doctrine of Fairbanks v. Snow, 145 Mass. 153, 1 Am. St. Rep. 446, 13 N. E. 596. The doctrine of Fairbanks v. Snow is that where one party to a contract is forced to enter into it through duress exercised upon him by a stranger to it, no ground for its avoidance is made out as against the other party to the contract who was not privy to the duress.

Dr. Chase was required by Rev. Laws, chap. 154, § 1, to join with his wife in the petition for the adoption of his son by a former wife, and he in fact did join with her in that petition. Dr. Chase and his wife were the parties on one side of the petition and Woodruff Chase was the party on the other side of the petition. The undue influence was exercised by one petitioner on the other petitioner, not by one party to the petition on the other party to it.

The rule of Fairbanks v. Snow does not apply in all cases where a fraud has been committed on a court. There are cases where a court will set aside a decree or judgment made by it, because of a fraud practised upon it by a stranger, that is to say, a person who is not a party to the cause in question, and who is not acting with the privity or consent of one of the parties to it. The bribery of one of the jury which rendered the verdict on which a decree or judgment is founded is doubtless an example. Such a case was before this court in Crocker v. Crocker, 198 Mass. 401, 84 N. E. 476.

But we do not find it necessary to consider these questions in deciding the case at bar. On the death of Woodruff Chase without leaving a will, his father became entitled to all his property. There is no evidence that he left any creditors. It follows that his father alone became entitled thereto. It was established by the answers given by the jury on the issues tried by them that the adoption of his son, Woodruff, was procured by a gross fraud practised by Dr. Chase upon his wife and upon the court.

The law will not allow a man to profit by his own wrongdoing. Adopting and adapting the words of Mr. Justice Field in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 600, 29 L. ed. 997, 1000, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, 881, "it would be a reproach to the jurisprudence of the country" if the law did allow that.

It is settled that the English common law is not open to that reproach. It has been twice laid down in Great Britain, once by Lord King in Bovey v. Smith, 1 Vern. 60, and once by Lord Redesdale in Kennedy v. Daly, 1 Sch. & Lef. 355, 379, that one who obtains property by a breach of trust, and afterwards buys it from a bona fide purchaser for value, does not get a good title to it, although everyone else in the world buying under those circumstances would get the title of the bona fide purchaser for value. And that has been decided in New York (Clark v. McNeal, 114 N. Y. 287, 11 Am. St. Rep. 638, 21 N. E. 405), and in Maine (Bailey v. Bailey, 61 Me. 361). The same principle was applied in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, where the holder of a valid policy on the life of another murdered him to secure immediate payment (see also Burt v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 187 U. S. 362, 365, 47 L. ed. 216, 218, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139, 140, where the court says that "the maturity of which [the policy] was accelerated by his execution for crime"), and in Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 5 L.R.A. 340, 12 Am. St. Rep. 819, 22 N. E. 188, where the beneficiary under an existing will of his grandfather murdered him to prevent a revocation of the will, and to secure the share of his property thereby given to him. It is true that in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong and in Riggs v. Palmer the murders were committed for the direct purpose of securing money in the one case and property in the other, and that could not be found to be the case here. It could not be found that the respondent in the case at bar procured the adoption of his son by Mrs. Chase because he expected to outlive them both. But that element did not exist in the cases where it has been laid down or held that one who has possessed himself of property through a breach of trust cannot set up the title of a bona fide purchaser for value, which he has subsequently acquired.

It is not necessary in the case at bar to go so far as the court went in those cases, for it is plain that the appellant here procured the adoption in order to secure his wife's property for his son, thinking that if his son got the property he would benefit thereby. That is enough to bring the case within this doctrine, if it is not enough that the adoption was procured through his fraud, and the property has now come to him.

Where the fraud committed by a defendant entitles him without disentitling the plaintiff, the proper remedy is a bill in equity to prevent him from taking or from retaining property to which he is entitled by or under the decree procured by his fraud. That was the remedy employed in Riggs v. Palmer, supra, where (as we have said) the legatee murdered the testator to prevent a revocation of the will, and to secure immediately the legacy thereby given to him.

But the peculiarity of the case at bar and of the case before the court in Tucker v. Fisk, 154 Mass. 574, 28 N. E. 1051, is and was that the decree which entitled the respondent disentitled the petitioners. See McKay v. Kean, 167 Mass. 524, 46 N. E. 120. If the adoption of Woodruff as Mrs.

Chase's son is not set aside, the petitioners are not entitled to her property as her next of kin. Under those circumstances no relief can be given unless the decree of adoption is set aside. If a decree of adoption is ever to be set aside to prevent a person taking or keeping property obtained through his own fraud, it can be properly done when (as in the case at bar) the adoption was originally made not for the personal relations thereby created, but for its effect upon property, where both parties to it are dead, and where the only person entitled to property by force of it is the person who committed the fraud.

Under the facts existing when the decree of revocation in this case was made, the petition for revocation here in question could be treated as a petition founded on the principle that a wrongdoer will not be allowed to profit by his own fraud, that the only way of preventing the fraud was to revoke the decree of adoption, and that there were no reasons then existing why that should not be done.

For cases where it was decided or laid down that a decree of adoption or divorce will be revoked to prevent such a fraud (or, as it is usually put, where property interests are involved), even after the death of one or both the parties to it, see Tucker v. Fisk, supra; Fiske v. Pratt, 157 Mass. 83, 31 N. E. 715; McKay v. Kean, supra; Collamore v. Learned, 171 Mass. 99, 50 N. E. 518; Lawrence v. Nelson, 113 Iowa, 277, 57 L.R.A. 583, 85 N. W. 84; Wood v. Wood, 136 Iowa, 128, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 891, 125 Am. St. Rep. 223, 113 N. W. 492; Boyd's Appeal, 38 Pa. 241; Fidelity Ins. Co's Appeal, 93 Pa. 242; Brown v. Grove, 116 Ind. 84, 9 Am. St. Rep. 823, 18 N. E. 387; Johnson v. Coleman, 23 Wis. 453, 99 Am. Dec. 103; Bomsta v. Johnson, 38 Minn. 230, 36 N. W. 341; Daniels v. Benedict (C. C.) 50 Fed. 347; Rodgers v. Nichols, 15 Okla. 579, 83 Pac. 923.

3. The appellant's next contention is that the adoption was ratified by Mrs. Chase, who lived for more than fourteen years after the date of the decree.

But no objection to the decree of the probate court on that ground was filed by the appellant. In trying the questions remaining to be tried by the court after it was established by the jury that the adoption was procured by the undue influence of the appellant, the appellees had a right to proceed on the footing that under the objections filed by the appellant no issue of fact of that kind was to be raised. And proceeding on that footing, there was no occasion for them to put in evidence bearing on that issue. The record in this case affords ground for the belief that, under the rule laid down in Phillips v. Chase, 201 Mass. 444, 131 Am. St. Rep. 406, 87 N. E. 755, there were two witnesses who could have testified in support of the appellees' case on that issue, but whose testimony was not put in evidence. The underlying question of fact to be decided in the case at bar was whether credit should or should not be given to the color which Dr. Chase gave in his testimony to the incidents of his life with Mrs. Chase. If credit was not given to his testimony, it is not likely that he could have hoped to succeed in persuading the court that his wife, who died a suicide, ever succeeded in escaping from the domination which the jury found he had over her at the time of the adoption. We speak of this because it is apparent that the appellant has not lost anything by his failure to file an objection on this ground.

4. The defenses of laches and of the statute of limitations are not open to the appellant. No objection to the decree of the probate court on those grounds was filed. But when the true ground on which the relief is given in this class of cases is considered, it is apparent that there is nothing in these contentions of the appellant. The same is true of the constitutional point raised by him.

Decree affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

VIRGINIA BAKING COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
SOUTHERN BISCUIT WORKS.

(— Va. —, 68 S. E. 261.)

Trademark — ordinary words — origin and manufacture.

1. The words "Crown" and "Jamestown" may, when applied in combination with other words to a manufactured article, indicate origin and manufacture, and, as so combined, be the subject of a valid trademark.

Same — different application — validity.

2. One who has applied the words "Crown" and "Jamestown" to crackers and small cakes, respectively, cannot complain that they are respectively applied by another manufacturer to ginger snaps and larger cakes of an entirely different class.

30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court of Richmond in complainant's favor in a suit to enjoin the alleged infringement of certain trademarks, and for an accounting for profits and damages alleged to have accrued from such infringement. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Meredith & Cocke, for appellant:

One is not required to so distinguish his articles that careless and indifferent buyers will know by whom they are made or sold. His competitor has no better right to the monopoly of the trade of the negligent and indifferent than he has.

Note. — Use of tradename or trademark on articles other than those to which it is applied by the owner.

But few cases have considered this specific question; in those that have, it is generally recognized that the use of a trademark or tradename upon articles of a certain class does not preclude the right of others to use the same trademark or tradename upon articles of an entirely different class; that is, of such a different class that the general public would not connect the person originally coining or using the trademark or tradename with the manufacture or production of the class of articles to which it is applied by the other person. To illustrate: A manufacturer of stoves could not claim that his trademark was infringed by the use thereof by another to designate cement products manufactured by him. While the foregoing proposition is well settled, the dividing line between the use of the same trademark or tradename on articles, although not resembling each other, yet of the same general character, is more obscure. In general, the owner of a trademark or tradename will be protected therein as against the use thereof by others upon articles which, in their general characteristics, construction, or use are so closely allied with the products to which the owner applies the same as to render it probable, or at least possible, that the general public may be deceived thereby as to the manufacturer or producer of the article.

As said by the court in Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Garner, 54 How. Pr. 297, the criterion is not the certainty of success in misleading the public, but its probability or even possibility.

On the same subject, Lord Herschell remarked that the proposed use of the same words by another manufacturer, although on a different article, would be calculated to deceive, and added: "But I do not think it is necessary to go so far as this. I think it is enough to say that I am not satisfied that there would be no reasonable danger

R. 30 Ch. Div. 471.

To acquire an exclusive right, the trademark must, either by itself or by association, point distinctly to the origin or ownership of the article to which it is applied, for unless it does, neither can he who first adopted it be injured by any appropriation or imitation of it by others, nor can the public be deceived.

of the public being so deceived." Eno v. Dunn, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 261.

And in determining whether the article to which a trademark is subsequently applied by another is of the same class, so as to be within this rule, the court, as said in Bass, Ratcliff & Gretton v. Feigenspan, 96 Fed. 206, will not be astute to recognize in favor of an infringer fine distinctions between different articles of merchandise of the same general nature, and will resolve against the wrongdoer any fair doubt whether the public may or may not be deceived through the use of the same mark or symbol by another.

The fact that the manufacturer or producer of an article which, in its general characteristics, construction, or purpose resembles that of another, applies to it the trademark or tradename of the latter, is generally considered strong if not convincing proof that the purpose was to mislead the public, and derive an undue advantage therefrom, to the injury of the owner of the tradename. As reasoned by the court in Carroll v. Ertheiler, 1 Fed. 688: "The dominating characteristic of the plaintiff's trademark is the name 'Lone Jack.' His tobacco has come to be known and described by this name throughout the country to such an extent that the accompanying device has ceased to be important, if it ever was so,—doubtless rarely observed and slightly remembered. At home and abroad, to the trade and the public, it is familiarly known as 'Lone Jack,' and is thus designated as the plaintiff's manufacture by purchasers and sellers. The defendant's application of this name to his smoking tobacco is an adoption and use of the essential part of the plaintiff's trademark. Surrounding it with a different device signifies nothing to the public, who attach no importance to the device of the plaintiff. The defendant's name upon the cigarettes, if recognized (and it would not be without close inspection), would not inform the public that the tobacco is not of the plaintiff's manufacture. That the defendant's act is calculated to mislead can hardly be doubted; that it has mislead, the plaintiff 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

tiff's affidavits we think show; and the inference that the defendant supposed it would mislead, and intended it should, cannot well be avoided. Why otherwise did he adopt this particular name? He knew it to be the recognized designation of the plaintiff's tobacco, which had become popular with consumers and the trade. Did he not expect the public to be influenced thereby and his business increased? An affirmative answer cannot well be avoided. If he did not, however, the injunction will do him no harm, for he has not yet had time to establish a reputation of his own under this name."

In denying the right to use the words "Omega Oil" as a trademark for medicated soap, where those words were already in use by another as a trademark for a liniment, in Omega Oil Co. v. Weschler, 35 Misc. 441, 71 N. Y. Supp. 983, the court said: "The adoption of the words 'Omega Oil' by defendants was calculated to deceive the public into the belief that plaintiff's article was being put up for sale in another form; or, at least, into the belief that soap was placed on the market by plaintiff or by its consent. The adoption of green as the color of the soap, and the green wrapper and box, by defendants tended to further such deception, green being the distinctive color of plaintiff's liniment and of the labels on its bottle. Defendant's object in choosing the name and color of its soap is manifest, and, so far as I can see, for but a single purpose . . . 'that purpose a species of competition in trade which courts of equity hold to be unfair.'"

And in American Tobacco Co. v. Polacsek, 170 Fed. 117, on the same point the court remarked: "The logic of the situation may be briefly stated. Either the defendant is endeavoring to profit by the reputation of McAlpine's tobacco, or he is not. If it be true that he is making this attempt, he should be stopped in limine. If, on the other hand, he is only selling his goods on their merits, he does not need the same trademark as the complainant."

Applying the foregoing principles, it was held in Carroll v. Ertheiler, supra, that it

The right of one person to a certain trademark for a certain kind of baked stuff does not cover other kinds, so as to prevent its use by other persons for other kinds.

Smith v. Reynolds, 13 Blatchf. 458, Fed. Cas. No. 13,099; Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Garner, 54 How. Pr. 302; Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Sherrell, 93 N. Y. 331, 45 Am. Rep. 229; Caswell v. Davis, 58 N. Y. 233, 17 Am. Rep. 233; French Republic v. Saratoga Vichy Co. 191 U. S. 427, 48 L. ed. 247, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 145; Delaconstituted an infringement for a manufacturer of cigarettes to use as a trademark the same word symbol as that owned and used by a manufacturer of smoking and chewing tobacco.

The same conclusion was reached under substantially a similar state of facts in American Tobacco Co. v. Polacsek, supra. In approving and following the doctrine of the Carroll Case, the court reasoned: "A trademark is a guaranty that the goods to which it is attached are made by its owner. If the owner has a high character for honesty, good workmanship, and fair dealing, his mark stands for all of these qualities. Those who have been accustomed to his goods see his mark and buy, knowing that they will not be defrauded. Whether a manufacturer confines himself to smoking tobacco, chewing tobacco, or cigarettes, he is still in the tobacco business, just as one is in the clothing business, whether he makes coats, waistcoats, or trousers; just as one is in the whisky business whether he makes rye or Bourbon. A consumer who believes in McAlpin's tobacco, seeing 'Virgin Leaf' cigarettes on the market will naturally think that they are the product of the McAlpin factory, precisely as if 'D. H. McAlpin & Company' had been printed on the package."

And in Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Garner, supra, the use of the word "Amoskeag" as a trademark or tradename for cotton goods, but not calico prints, was held to preclude its use as a trademark by a manufacturer of calico prints. Protection was given the complainant not only on the theory that the use of the trademark to designate calico prints would amount to a deception, or, at least, might amount to a deception of the public as to the manufacturer of the prints, but also upon the theory that such use would be prejudicial to the reputation of the owner of the trademark, since it was applied only upon articles produced by it of superior quality and excellence, while the use complained of was upon calico prints of an inferior grade and quality.

A manufacturer of muslin, using as a trademark the word "Wamsutta," may restrain the use thereof as a trademark by a manufacturer of shirts. Wamsutta Mills v. Allen, 12 Phila. 535.

A manufacturer of knit goods, although confining his operations to knit underwear, acquires a right in the tradename "Northwestern Knitting Company," to designate its manufacturer, which precludes the use thereof by another manufacturer of knit goods, although he applies it only to sweaters, which the original owner of the tradename and trademark does not manufacture. Northwestern Knitting Co. v. Garon (Minn.) 128 N. W. 288.

And in Church & D. Co. v. Russ, 99 Fed. 276, a manufacturer of soda was held entitled to restrain the use of its trademark by a manufacturer of baking powder. The court reasoned that the public would readily suppose that the baking powder bearing complainant's trademark was either manufactured by it, or by someone having its authority and consent, and that it vouched for the superior and high character of the goods bearing such trademark, and added: "Goods are in the same class whenever the use of a given trademark or symbol on both would enable an unscrupulous dealer readily to palm off on the unsuspecting purchaser the goods of the infringer as the goods made by the owner of the trademark, or with his authority and consent."

To the same effect, under a very similar state of facts, is Layton Pure Food Co. v. Church & D. Co. — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 182 Fed. 35, which cites with approval the foregoing case.

The use by a manufacturer of liniment of the words "Omega Oil" as a trademark therefor precludes the manufacturer of a medicated soap from using the same words as a trademark therefor, since liniment and soap are not of such a different character as will permit the use upon the latter of the name created and made valuable as a trademark for the former. Liniment may have a much broader application than a soap, but it also possesses to a certain extent the qualities of a soap, and is used for many of the same purposes. Omega Oil Co. v. Weschler, 35 Misc. 441, 71 N. Y. Supp.

In Collins Co. v. Oliver Ames & Sons Corp. 20 Blatchf. 542, 18 Fed. 561, a manufacturer of edged tools, to which it applied the trademark "Collins & Company" was held entitled to restrain the use by another of this term as a trademark for shovels, although not engaged in the manufacture of shovels itself. Protection was given in this case on the theory of protecting the public against deception, and also because such use was prejudicial to the owner of the trademark, since it was applied by it only upon edged tools of a superior quality, while the application complained of was to shovels of an inferior grade and quality.

Fruit salt and baking powder are not of so essentially different a character that the one could not be supposed to enter into the composition of the other, although one is an aperient medicine, and the other a powder for baking. Hence, the use of the trademark "fruit salt" to designate an aperient medicine precludes its use by another to designate a baking powder, since such use would tend to induce the public to believe that the fruit salt powder was an ingredient of the baking powder, or employed in its preparation, or that the manufacturer of the fruit salt powder was connected with the manufacture of the baking powder. Eno v. Dunn, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 252, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

But a trademark for dry white oxide of zinc is not infringed by its use to designate a paint composed of white oxide of zinc, ground in oil, since the two articles are of an entirely different class. La Société Anonyme des Mines v. Baxter, 14 Blatchf. 261, Fed. Cas. No. 8,099.

A substance named "celluloid," which word is used as a trademark therefor, is not infringed by the use by another of the word "Celluloid" as a trademark for starch. Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. Read, 47 Fed. 712.

In George v. Smith, 52 Fed. 830, the court said that the use of the word "Epicure" as a trademark for canned fruit would not prevent its use by another as a trademark for canned salmon. In further illustration of the distinction between classes of articles which would justify the use of the same trademark by different manufacturers, it was said that beer and nails did not belong to the same class of merchandise simply because both were sold in kegs.

An iron manufacturer who uses a lion's head as a trademark cannot prevent a linen manufacturer from using a lion's head as a trademark for his goods. Ainsworth v. Walmesley, 35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 352. And see to the same effect, the remarks of the court in Hall v. Barrows, 4 De G. J. & S. 150.

Whittle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:.

This suit in equity was brought by the appellee, the Southern Biscuit Works, to enjoin the appellant, the Virginia Baking Company, from the alleged infringement of certain trademarks, the property of the plaintiff, and also to compel an accounting by the defendant for profits and damages charged to have accrued from such infringement.

The litigants are rival corporations located in the city of Richmond, and engaged in the manufacture of biscuit products, such as cakes, crackers, snaps, jumbles, and like goods. The gravamen of the bill is that the defendant has been guilty, not of unfair business competition, but that it has infringed upon the rights of the plaintiff in and to the use of two words, namely, "Crown" and "Jamestown." These words, it is claimed, had been adopted and appropriated by the plaintiff as common-law trademarks, and continuously applied "to distinguish and identify its biscuits in certain styles and varieties," and that it has the exclusive right to use them "for the purpose of distinguishing and identifying its said biscuit products." The bill admits that the plaintiff has hitherto only used its

"Crown" trademark in connection with soda crackers, and the "Jamestown" brand with small cakes, known as "drops;" but the insistence is that the plaintiff's right to the employment of these words is exclusive, and that the defendant may not lawfully use either of them on any kind of cracker or cake whatsoever.

The answer controverts the proposition that the words "Crown" and "Jamestown" were adopted for the purpose of indicating "origin, manufacture, or ownership" of the goods to which they were applied, or for general use, but insists that they were placed upon certain specific articles to denote "class, grade, style, or quality," and therefore could not be upheld as technically trademarks. It concedes the use by it of the word "Crown" in connection with cakes known as "ginger snaps," and "Jamestown" with cakes called "jumbles," but denies that the trade has been deceived, or that any purchaser, either wholesale or retail, could have been misled by such use of these words.

Confining our consideration to the precise issue presented by the pleadings, we are of opinion that the fair result of the evidence shows that the respective businesses of these litigants are conducted under distinct and wholly dissimilar corporate names and general trademarks, the plaintiff doing business as the Southern Biscuit Works, under a trademark consisting of a sheaf of wheat printed on a label in red, white, black, and considered was the right to be protected in a trademark or tradename against its use by another as a trademark for an article of a sufficiently similar class to make it probable or possible that the public might be misled into believing that the owner of the trademark or tradename was connected with the production or sale of the article to which it was subsequently sought to apply the mark or name. The question was considered in these cases with reference to rules peculiar to trademarks and tradenames. In this connection it is of interest to note that relief has sometimes been given the owner of a tradename by restraining its use by another, although as a trademark for an article of an entirely different class than that with reference to which the tradename is used. In such cases, the person using the tradename for a trademark has made such use of it as would make it possible or probable that the public would be deceived into believing the owner of the tradename was connected with, or authorized the manufacture and sale of, the article to which the trademark was applied. The view was apparently taken that the owner of the tradename owed a duty to the public to prevent such use, otherwise he might be estopped to dispute his responsibility for and connection with the production and sale of the article to which the tradename was applied as a trademark. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

This danger of injury to the owner of the tradename was regarded as sufficient to authorize him to invoke the aid of equity to restrain such use by another. Routh v. Webster, 10 Beav. 561; Walter v. Ashton, [1902] 2 Ch. 282. This doctrine was applied in the latter case, and the manufacturer of bicycles was restrained from using as a trademark for his bicycles the word "Times" in such a way as to lead the public to believe that such bicycles were manufactured by, or sold under the authority and superintendence of, the Times Publishing Company, publishers of a paper called "The Times," it appearing that there was a reasonable probability of such company being exposed to litigation, and possibly, or even probably, being made responsible by reason of such use.

And in Kinsley v. Jacoby, 28 Abb. N. C. 451, 20 N. Y. Supp. 46, the proprietors of a hotel known as the Holland House were held entitled to restrain the use of such name by another as a trademark for cigars, where the purpose of the use was to represent to the public that the manufacturer of the cigars was in some way connected with the hotel. The ground upon which relief was given in this case is not entirely clear, as the question is not elaborated in the opinion, which, however, cites as authority cases applying rules peculiar to trademarks and tradenames. A. G. S. light blue; that in addition to this, as subsidiary word symbols, the plaintiff has acquired the exclusive right to use the word "Crown" in connection with its soda cracker style of goods, and "Jamestown" with a certain kind of cake known as "drops;" that the defendant is operating under the corporate name of the Virginia Baking Company, and using a trademark consisting of the obverse of the great seal of the commonwealth of Virginia on a red, white, and blue label. It likewise employs the word "Crown" as a grade symbol in connection with a small variety of cakes known as "ginger snaps," and the word "Jamestown" with cakes called "jumbles." A "jumble" is four or five times as large, and is essentially a different cake from a "drop," having a hole in the center as large as the "drop" itself. These several kinds of cakes are recognized in the trade as distinctive classes of goods. The words "Crown" and "Jamestown" are mere fanciful words, and, standing alone, do not indicate "origin and manufacture;" nevertheless, in association with other words, they have that effect, and entitle the plaintiff to claim a trademark for the combination. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Trainer, 101 U. S. 51, 25 L. ed. 993; Corbin v. Gould, 133 U. S. 308, 33 L. ed. 611, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 312.

Conceding, then, the right of the plaintiff to the exclusive use of these words in the connection in which they occur and to the extent to which they have been appropriated and applied, as against the defendant, the right is coextensive only with such use. If there be any foundation for the claim that it was the intention of the plaintiff to apply these trademarks to other products, it was an undisclosed purpose, resting exclusively in the mind of the plaintiff, and could not affect the rights of the defendant, who cannot be expected to anticipate that the plaintiff might in the future conclude to manufacture and place on the market a "Crown" ginger snap, or a "Jamestown" jumble. The record affords no proof of misrepresentation or unfair dealing on the part of the defendant, and the direct testimony adduced to show that the public has been misled by the alleged infringement of the plaintiff's trademarks in the particulars complained of is extremely meager and inconclusive. Indeed, we think it is apparent that none save the careless and inattentive could reasonably have been misled by the acts complained of.

ternational Loan & T. Co. 153 Mass. 271, 278, 10 L.R.A. 758, 26 N. E. 693, 695, as follows: "It is not sufficient that some person might possibly be misled; but the similarity must be such that 'any person, with such reasonable care and observation as the public generally are capable of using and may be expected to exercise, would mistake the one for the other.'"

In White v. Trowbridge, 216 Pa. 11, 64 Atl. 862, the court held: "The defendant will not be enjoined from using certain trademarks or labels, where they are not so similar to the ones used by plaintiff, in appearance or in the connection of the words, as to deceive a person of ordinary intelligence, using ordinary care."

In Allen B. Wrisley Co. v. Iowa Soap Co. 59 C. C. A. 54, 122 Fed. 796, the court said: "But he is not required to so distinguish his articles that careless and indifferent buyers will know by whom they are made or sold. His competitor has no better right to the monopoly of the trade of the negligent and indifferent than he has."

The rule is stated with equal emphasis by the Supreme Court of the United States in Coats v. Merrick Thread Co. 149 U. S. 562, 572, 573, 37 L. ed. 847, 852, 853, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 966, 970. Mr. Justice Brown, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court in that case, observes: "There is, no doubt, a general resemblance between the heads of all spools containing a black and gold label, which might induce a careless purchaser to accept one for the other. Defendants, however, were not bound to any such degree of care as would prevent this."

. . . In short, they could do little more than place their own name conspicuously upon the label, to rearrange the number by placing it in the border instead of the center of the label, and to omit loops of the plaintiffs' periphery, and substitute their own star between the numerals. Having done this, we think they are relieved from further responsibility."

These decisions sufficiently illustrate the controlling principle in the present case, and, as applied to the evidence, are conclusive against the pretensions of the appellee.

The decree of the Chancery Court must therefore be reversed, the injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, Respt.,
v.

ADOLF DACKE, Appt.

(— Wash. —, 109 Pac. 1050.)

Criminal law — estoppel to defend.

One who has had sexual relations with a child prior to the passage of a statute making it a crime carnally to know a child of her age of previous chaste character is not precluded from relying on her previous unchastity to avoid punishment for acts committed after the passage of the statute, on the theory that he cannot take advantage of his previous wrongdoing to avoid the application of the statute.

(June 30, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Kittitas County convicting him of statutory rape. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pruyn, Streff, & Hoefler, for appellant:

Chaste character means that prosecutrix

Note. — May defendant charged with sexual offense against female of previous chaste character impeach her character for chastity by reason of his own intercourse with her prior to the acts charged.

Although many cases may be found not within the scope of this note, passing upon the question of the competency and relevancy of evidence of specific acts of unchastity on the part of the prosecutrix with the defendant prior to the date of the seduction or rape for which he may be indicted, the point determined in STATE v. DACKE, whether the defendant, charged under a statute with carnally knowing a female child between the ages of fifteen and eighteen years and "of previously chaste character," is estopped from showing that she is not "of previously chaste character," and thus not within the protection of the statute, by reason of his own intercourse with her at some date prior to that charged in the indictment, and when she is chaste as to everyone except himself, appears to have been passed upon in but one other case.

In Bailey v. State, 57 Neb. 706, 73 Am. St. Rep. 540, 78 N. W. 284, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 660, the facts of which are sufficiently set out in STATE v. DACKE, Ragan, C., in delivering the opinion, said: "It is said by counsel for the state that to allow the prisoner to urge as a defense here the intercourse which took place between himself and the prosecutrix in the state of Iowa would be permitting the accused to take advantage of his own wrong. This is simply saying that the accused is estopped from asserting the truth of his unlawful conduct in another jurisdiction, because that 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) shall possess actual personal virtue; and a single act of illicit connection may be shown on behalf of the defendant.

People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 117, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 660.

The chastity of the female must be shown affirmatively by the state.

Crim. Rep. 617.

The presumption in favor of the chastity of the prosecutrix is overcome by the presumption of the innocence of the defendant, and the burden rests upon the state to prove the averment in the indictment.

conduct would establish his innocence of the crime with which he is charged with having committed in this state. But the state, in criminal prosecutions, may not invoke against the prisoner the doctrine of estoppel. . . . To sustain a criminal conviction, it is not enough for the state to show that the prisoner indicted has violated the spirit of the statute, but the evidence must show beyond a reasonable doubt that he has offended against the very letter of the law. . . . Here the prisoner is charged with having had in this state sexual intercourse, with her consent, with a girl sixteen years of age, she being prior thereto chaste. At the time the intercourse occurred in this state, the female was not chaste. Prior to the prisoner's intercourse with her in Iowa, so far as this record shows, she was chaste, and in Iowa—for we must presume the laws of that state to be the same as ours—he robbed her of her virginity, and committed the crime for which he is convicted here."

There is dicta in this case, approved in Blair v. State, 72 Neb. 501, 101 N. W. 17, to the effect that a defendant cannot plead his own defilement of a girl within the statute of limitations as a defense to a later defilement. It was said: "Had the first defilement of the girl by the prisoner occurred in Nebraska instead of Iowa on the date it did, and which was prior to the one charged in the indictment, then the first defilement would be no defense to the prisoner on an indictment for the second, since both would have been within the statute of limitations, and each intercourse a part of the crime charged in the indictment."

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was convicted of the crime of rape, and appeals from the judgment entered.

A number of errors are assigned, but we will refer to only one, which in our opinion is decisive of the appeal. The Criminal Code of 1909 amended the law relating to rape, among other changes making it a crime to carnally know a female child between the ages of fifteen and eighteen 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

years and of previous chaste character. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 2436. Appellant was informed against under this new section, the charge being laid in Kittitas county, and the time as June 30, 1909. The state's evidence discloses that prosecutrix, who was then seventeen years old, and the appellant, first became acquainted in Snohomish county, some time in October, 1908; that in the following November they began having sexual relations, with the full consent of prosecutrix; and that these relations were indulged in whenever opportunity afforded, until the following March, when prosecutrix with her family moved to Kittitas county. In May appellant went to Kittitas county and renewed his acquaintance with prosecutrix, and they again assumed their sexual relations, until July 8th, when appellant was arrested and charged with an offense occurring on June 30th. At the close of the state's case, the prosecutrix having testified to these facts concerning her relations with appellant, his counsel moved for a directed verdict of acquittal, which being denied, he excepted, and now alleges error in the court so ruling.

In construing the statute involved in this information, every requirement must be given effect as constituting an essential element in the offense created. The requirement that the female against whom the offense is committed shall be of "previously chaste character" was unknown to the common law, nor was it an ingredient of any statute of this state defining rape, until the act of 1909. When, therefore, that act went into effect on the 8th day of June, 1909, it brought within its protecting terms a theretofore—so far as this crime is concerned—unknown requirement, that of previous chastity. The carnal knowledge of a female child between the ages of fifteen and eighteen years with her consent, under the old law, constituted rape; but under this act of 1909, under which this information lies, such carnal knowledge is not a crime unless the female child be of "previously chaste character." The act includes within its terms one female child and one male, and since the male person cannot commit the offense described in the statute except upon the female child described in the statute, it follows that, as to the male person charged with the crime, the female child must be "of previously chaste character," not alone as to some other man, nor only as to all other men, but to the particular man named in the information. The female child named in this information having testified to voluntary sexual relations with appellant many times prior to June 30th, she was not on that day within the protection of the statute, in that she was not "of previously chaste character." The term "of previously chaste character" means the same in law as in morals. It describes a condition of sexual purity. It means a female who has never submitted herself to the sexual embrace of man, and who still retains her virginal chastity. It is defined as "chaste in fact when seduced," in Hussey v. State, 86 Ala. 34, 5 So. 484; as "actual personal virtue," in State v. Patterson, 88 Mo. 88, 57 Am. Rep. 374; Lyons v. State, 52 Ind. 426, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 28; Kenyon v. People, 26 N. Y. 203, 84 Am. Dec. 177. "A chaste female is one that has never had sexual intercourse, who yet retains her virginity. A virtuous female is one who has not had sexual intercourse unlawfully, out of wedlock, knowingly and voluntarily." Marshall v. Territory, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 136, 101 Pac. 139. Whatever may be the language which one may choose to define a female of previously chaste character, it certainly cannot be contended that one who, moved by lewd desire and libidinous impulse, submits herself to the carnal embrace of a man from November to July whenever the time and the place are opportune, is a female of such a character on the 30th day of June.

It is argued by the state that, as to the appellant, the prosecutrix is exempt from this requirement of the law; that, being the author of her undoing, he cannot take advantage of his own wrong and hide himself under the cloak of this statutory requirement, as a shield for his protection. Such an argument is purely a sentimental one, and, although it may be abhorrent to the moral sense to permit a man to protect himself with the shield of his own wrong, we are dealing with a legal question, and not one of sentiment nor morals; and, in order to find a man guilty of such an offense as the one named in this information, we must first find a female who can in all its essentials measure up to the requirement of the law charged to be violated. The test of virtue in a woman is a personal and physical test, and when, by reason of her voluntary sin, she has lost her virginal purity, it matters not who contributed to that loss; she is no longer chaste. It is not a sound argument to say that the prosecutrix in this case was immune from rape as to all other men, but not from appellant. The statute makes no such distinction; neither can we. As is said in Shirwin v. People, 69 Ill. 55, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 650: "The right of the accused to defend must be as broad as that of the prosecution to criminate."

Such we believe to be the reasoning of the law. Its authority will be found in similar cases to which we will now refer.

In People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 660, the defendant was charged with seduction on July 28th. The complaining witness testified that the first offense was committed on that day. She then gave evidence of similar offenses committed in the month of August, one of which latter offenses was elected by the prosecution to go to the jury. The court held a conviction upon the latter act could not be sustained, and said: "The object of this statute was not to punish illicit cohabitation. Its object was to punish the seducer." The court then holds there could be no seduction in August, even though made under a promise of marriage, when the evidence showed prior acts. The complaining witness having already fallen in July, there was in August no virtue to seduce. So, in People v. Squires, 49 Mich. 487, 13 N. W. 828, defendant was charged with seduction in September. The proof showed the first act of intercourse between the parties long prior to that. Held, complaining witness was unchaste in September, and could not then be seduced. In Bailey v. State, 57 Neb. 706, 73 Am. St. Rep. 540, 78 N. W. 284, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 660, the defendant was convicted of rape under a statute very similar to ours. The act charged was on June 13th. The evidence disclosed that the first act of intercourse between defendant and prosecutrix took place in Iowa, the previous March. The court held that the conviction could not be sustained, as the prosecuting witness was not previously chaste in June, and said: "The fact that she was first deprived of her virginity by the prisoner does not strengthen the state's case. . . . To sustain a conviction under it, the evidence must show beyond a reasonable doubt, among other things, that the female with whom the sexual intercourse was had was, prior to that intercourse, sexually pure,—chaste as Diana." The court then takes up the argument here made that defendant could not take advantage of his own wrong, and holds that the state in criminal prosecutions cannot invoke the doctrine of estoppel against a defendant; that it is not enough to show a violation of the spirit of the statute; but that its very letter must be offended against. In State v. Patterson, supra, the court says: "Evidence of prior specific acts of unchastity with the defendant himself is now universally received, as well in cases of seduction as in cases of rape. What for? To show that in the latter class of cases there was less likelihood of absence of consent; and that in the former, in consequence of a prior act of the defendant, there was no chastity left to seduce. Can it be material by whom the prior act is performed, whether by the defendant or whether by anyone else?" In People v. Nelson, 153 N. Y. 90, 60 Am. St. Rep. 592, 46 N. E. 1040, the defendant was charged with seduction upon a "female of previous chaste character." Many acts of intercourse between the parties were testified to, occurring prior to the offense charged in the indictment. Held, that the conviction could not be sustained, upon the ground that, having indulged in frequent sexual intercourse with the defendant, the complaining witness was on the day charged not an unmarried female of previously chaste character. In Carpenter v. People, 8 Barb. 603, the act charged was abduction, under a statute describing the female as one "of previous chaste character." The time fixed was June, 1849. Evidence was given of an act of intercourse in 1846. The court held the female was not of previously chaste character, and said: "The word 'previous' in this connection must be understood to mean immediately previous, or to refer to a period terminating immediately previous to the commencement of the guilty conduct of the defendant."

So, in the case before us, the use of those words in the information meant the time just preceding the commission of the crime charged, June 30th. By her own evidence, the prosecutrix was not then a female child of previously chaste character. Neither was she on June 8th, when the law went into effect. She was not then within the description of the statute, and therefore not within its protection; and the motion of the defendant for a directed verdict should have been granted.

We do not wish to be understood as holding that a single act, or a number of acts, of sexual intercourse, will forever deprive a woman of the protection of a statute requiring previous chastity. It has been often held that a woman may reform in law as well as in morals, and for the second time become the victim of the seducer's lust. But we have no such case here. There was no evidence of any reformation prior to June 30th, nor of any assault then upon virtue's barrier. It was from first to last mutual desire and mutual gratification.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to discharge the defendant.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

H. L. SMITH, Appt.,
v.
C. M. ROOT et al.

(66 W. Va. 633, 66 S. E. 1005.)

Equity — jurisdiction — oil lease — removal of oil — injunction.

1. Equity has jurisdiction of a suit brought by the senior lessee in an oil lease against his lessor and a junior lessee of the same land from the same lessor, for the purpose of enjoining the removal of the oil from the leased premises and for specific execution of his lease; and, in such a suit, the court can settle the conflicting claims of the lessees, and grant such relief to either claimant as the pleadings and proof may warrant.

Oil and gas lease — construction — title to minerals.

2. An oil and gas lease giving the lessee the right, for the period of ten years, to explore for oil and gas, and providing that if a well is not completed on the leased premises within three months from the date of the lease, the lessee shall pay to the lessor, in advance, a quarterly cash rental for each additional three months the completion of a well is delayed, is an executory contract, and vests no title in the lessee to the oil and gas in place.

Same — abandonment.

3. Such a contract contemplates development of the leased premises within a reasonable time, and the lessee may lose his rights thereunder before the expiration of the ten years by abandonment of the lease, notwithstanding there is no forfeiture clause in the contract.

Same — establishment.

4. If the lessee has not actually entered upon the land, the relinquishment of his right to do so, or his abandonment, becomes purely a question of his intention, and may be established by proof of such facts and circumstances as evince a voluntary waiver of his rights.

Same — evidence — sufficiency.

5. A case in which the evidence proves a voluntary abandonment of the lease by the lessee.

Note. — Effect of provisions for minimum royalties or an annual rental upon right to forfeit oil or gas lease for failure to prosecute work.

The above title is the subject of a note in 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 417, and it is intended to include herein only cases decided subsequently thereto.

In Howerton v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. 81 Kan. 553, post, —, 106 Pac. 47, the court, in considering the construction of a

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Roane County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin the removal of oil from certain lands under a lease thereof which was alleged to infringe rights granted to plaintiff under a prior lease, and to have such subsequent lease canceled as a cloud on title. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John B. Chapman, V. B. Archer, and George F. Cunningham for appellant.

Messrs. A. D. Follett and Van Winkle & Ambler, for appellees:

The failure of the contract to contain a forfeiture clause does not preclude its abandonment.

Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co. 53 W. Va.

lease of land for the development of gas or oil wells as affected by laches in development, quoted from said note as follows: "Generally all leases of land for the exploration and development of minerals are executed by the lessor in the hope and upon the condition, either express or implied, that the land shall be developed for minerals, and it would be unjust and unreasonable, and contravene the nature and spirit of the lease, to allow the lessee to continue to hold under it any considerable length of time without making any effort at all to develop it according to the express or implied purpose of the lease; and, in general, while equity abhors a forfeiture, yet when such a forfeiture works equity, and is essential to public and private interests in the development of minerals in land, the landowner, as well as the public, will be protected from the laches of the lessee, and the forfeiture of the lease allowed, where such forfeiture does not contravene plain and unambiguous stipulations in the lease. This principle will be more readily enforced and applied by the court as to gas and oil cases because of the peculiar nature of those minerals and the danger of entire loss to the lessor of oil or gas in his lands by reason of well drilling on adjacent lands." The court added that this statement was grounded in reason and supported by the authorities. In that case the lease contained no provision for the payment of an annual rental, and it was based upon the nominal consideration of $1. There was a delay of four years in exploring and developing the land for gas or oil purposes, except that one gas well was developed within one year from the date of the lease. Although there was no express provision for diligence in exploring and developing the land for purposes contemplated by the lease, the court, applying the doctrine quoted from, held that the contract contemplated or implied diligence, and that a delay of four years was unreasonable, and the lease was therefore canceled and set aside as forfeited. Although adhering to the doctrine of the foregoing opinion, the decision in this case was reversed upon a rehearing 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(82 Kan. 367, 108 Pac. 813), on the ground that, in order to entitle himself to the aid of equity to forfeit an oil and gas lease for failure to develop, the lessor must allege and show that he has not an adequate remedy at law by an action for damages, and this it was held the lessor had failed to do. On this point the court said: "The default consisted in the failure properly to develop the leased territory by drilling and operating a reasonable number of wells necessary for that purpose, and the failure to market gas from, and make the payments stipulated for, the well completed. No reason is shown why witnesses of experience, acquainted with the gas field, may not testify with reasonable accuracy as to the number of wells which should have been drilled on the leased land, both for protection from drainage by neighboring leaseholds and to obtain the gas underneath the land. No insurmountable obstacle to such proof is perceived by the court, and, in the absence of evidence that it cannot be produced, it is concluded that the plaintiffs are not entitled to a remedy by forfeiture or cancellation of the lease."

In addition to the many cases cited in said note, and also those cited and commented upon in the original opinion in Howerton v. Kansas Natural Gas Co., as well as those considered and cited in Smith v. Root, the doctrine also finds support in the following cases, which, however, are not within the scope of this note as to the facts: Doddridge County Oil & Gas Co. v. Smith, 154 Fed. 970; Stahl v. Illinois Oil Co. (Ind. App.) 90 N. E. 632; Conkling v. Krandsusky, 127 App. Div. 761, 112 N. Y. Supp. 13; Federal Betterment Co. v. Blaes, 75 Kan. 69, 88 Pac. 555; Mills v. Hartz, 77 Kan. 218, 94 Pac. 142; Jennings-Heywood Oil Syndicate v. Houssiere-Latreille Oil Co. 119 La. 793, 44 So. 481.

The doctrine was also applied in Kimball Oil Co. v. Keeton, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 146, 101 S. W. 887, and the forfeiture clause in a lease was enforced for failure of the lessee to complete a gas or oil well as therein provided, although the provision of the lease was for forfeiture for failure to complete a well within a designated time, or pay a rental. It does not appear that any rental was paid or tendered, and the lease was declared forfeited for the failure to complete a well, without making any reference to the question of the rental.

In Poe v. Ulrey, supra, the lessees of land for purposes of exploring and developing the same for gas and oil did not complete a well thereon within the time agreed upon, but they attempted to exercise an option given them by the lease to pay the sum of $1 per acre per year, payable quarterly, in lieu of such exploration and development. This rental was tendered the lessors, who refused to receive the same, but insisted upon the exploration and development of the land, and later they filed their bill in equity to set aside the lease as void on account of want of mutuality, and because it was unfair, harsh, and unconscionable, and also upon the ground that the lessee had failed to comply with the terms thereof as to completing the well. In refusing to sustain any of these contentions, the court said that the parties having agreed upon an amount to be paid as compensation for rights granted by the lease in case the well should not be drilled upon the lessors' land within twelve months, they could not be relieved from such contract upon the proposition that there was an implied agreement that the lessee would drill wells sufficient reasonably to develop the leased premises for the production of oil and gas, and that the lease should be canceled by the court, and the rights under it forfeited for failure so to do, even though compensation for such failure had been agreed upon. The court 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

said: "The argument would have greater force if the lease had not contained a provision that it could be forfeited for a failure to complete a test well on the block of leases before the 1st day of May, 1905. That agreement would imply an exclusion of other grounds of forfeiture, and the agreement for compensation effectually excludes a forfeiture not stipulated for. The remedy for the breach of that contract would be by an action for damages."

It is of interest to compare the foregoing case with SMITH v. ROOT, which is very similar as to facts, and which holds that equity has jurisdiction to set aside such a lease for failure to explore and develop, although the lease is for a definite period of time, and provides for the payment of compensation for failure to explore and develop, and this, too, although the lease contains no express provision as to forfeiture.

The doctrine that equity will favor the forfeiture of such leases for an unreasonable delay in exploring and developing the leased premises will not be applied to enable the lessor to overreach and defraud the lessee out of his vested rights acquired by the assumption of the risk and the expenditure of large sums of money in the search for and production of the gas or oil with reference to which the lease was executed. Doddridge County Oil & Gas Co. v. Smith, supra.

Neither will equity apply this doctrine to enable the lessor to forfeit such a lease for any default of the lessee caused by his own acts in interfering with the operations of the lessee in exploring and developing the leased premises. Eastern Oil Co. v. Coulehan, 65 W. Va. 531, 64 S. E. 836.

In construing contracts relating to oil and gas in place, and creating reciprocal rights in respect to it, courts recognize an implied obligation or covenant on the part of the lessee to develop the property with reasonable diligence, so that the lessor may come into possession of the benefit which it was intended he should receive, as otherwise the contract would be one-sided, leaving the lessor at the mercy of the lessee, and subject to any arbitrary action he might see fit to take.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Roane county, pronounced on the 29th day of August, 1907, dissolving an injunction which had previously been awarded to plaintiff, and dismissing his bill upon a hearing of the cause.

The suit grows out of conflicting oil and gas leases executed by Mrs. D. M. Hall and C. J. Hall, her husband, on a tract of 106 acres of land in Roane county. The plaintiff claims under a contract executed by the Halls to Lee Goff and A. S. Heck, bearing date February 29, 1904, and the defendants claim under a contract made by said Halls to S. L. Thornily, dated June 27, 1905. Both contracts were duly recorded, the first on May 4, 1904, and the second on August 7, 1905.

The object of the suit is to enjoin the defendants from operating on said land, and from removing and disposing of the oil produced from the wells drilled by them on the premises in controversy, and to have the second lease canceled as constituting a cloud upon plaintiff's title. Defendant demurred to the bill and also filed a cross-bill answer averring an abandonment of the first lease by Goff and Heck, the original lessees, under whom plaintiff claims, and praying for a cancelation of that lease as constituting a cloud upon their title. The demurrer to the bill raises the question of the jurisdiction of the court. It is hardly necessary to discuss this question, because it has been frequently held by this court, and the question apparently settled, that a court of equity has jurisdiction of such a suit. In the present case it has jurisdiction on two grounds: First, to prevent waste,—that is, the extraction and removal of the oil from the land; second, for specific enforcement of the lease contract; and, having jurisdiction, the court will administer complete relief. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 38 L.R.A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891, 27 S. E. 411, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 19; Crawford v. Ritchey, 43 W.

Va. 252, 27 S. E. 220; Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co. 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. 923, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 234; Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co. 53 W. Va. 501, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 44 S. E. 433, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 656; Carney v. Barnes, 56 W. Va. 581, 49 S. E. 423; Starn v. Huffman, 62 W. Va. 422, 59 S. E. 179; Eastern Oil Co. v. Coulehan, 65 W. Va. 531, 64 S. E. 836.

The lease to Goff and Heck was to remain in force for ten years, and as much longer as either oil or gas should be produced. The lessees were to deliver to the credit of the lessors, free of cost in the pipe line, one eighth part of all the oil, and were to pay $200 a year for every gas well the product from which should be marketed and used off the premises. The lease contract contained also the following provision: "Second party (Goff and Heck) covenants and agrees to . . . complete a well on said premises within three months from the date hereof, or pay at the rate of $26.50 quarterly, in advance, for each additional three months such completion is delayed, from the time above mentioned for the completion of such well until a well is completed; and it is agreed that the drilling of such well, productive or otherwise, shall be and operate as full liquidation of all rental under this provision during the remainder of this lease. Such payment may be made direct to lessor, or deposited to their credit in the Roane County Bank, at Spencer, West Virginia. It is agreed that the second party is to have the privilege of using sufficient water from the premises to run all necessary machinery, and at any time to remove all machinery and fixtures placed on said premises, and further, upon the payment of $1 at any time by the party of the second part, their successors or assigns, to the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, said party of the second part, their successors or assigns, shall have the right to surrender this lease for cancellation, after which all payments and liabilities thereafter to accrue under and by virtue of its terms shall cease and determine, and this lease become absolutely null and void."

About the same time Goff and Heck procured oil and gas leases upon other tracts of land in the same neighborhood, some of which were contiguous to the Hall tract. Shortly after obtaining these leases, Goff and Heck and others procured a charter and organized the Lucky Oil & Gas Company. Goff and Heck assigned to it all the working interest in said leases, except one eighth which they retained for themselves. The contract of assignment provided that the Lucky Oil & Gas Company was to pay the rentals thereafter to become due, and 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) was to carry Goff and Heck for the full one-eighth interest free of cost to them, and bound said corporation to drill at least one test well on the territory covered by the leases, and gave it the privilege of drilling other wells on the premises. It further provided "that all surrenders and forfeitures of said leases, or any of them, shall be to said first parties,"—that is, to Goff and Heck; and that "in no event shall any or either of said leases be forfeited or surrendered by the said second party to the original lessors or their assignee or grantee or any person or persons for them."

The first two quarterly rentals falling due on the Hall land were paid by the Lucky Oil & Gas Company. When the third became due, to wit, on November 29, 1904, it was not paid, but Goff and Heck applied to the Halls for an extension of the time without payment of the rent, which was refused. No well was ever drilled on the Hall land by anyone claiming under this lease; but the Lucky Oil & Gas Company did, in the summer and fall of 1904, drill a well on the Conohue tract of land adjoining the Hall tract. It was completed just prior to the time the third quarterly rental on the Hall tract became due, and proved to be a dry well. In the drilling of this well the company had exhausted its capital. It then ceased to do business and immediately surrendered its charter. The casing was removed from the dry well, and the machinery and casing belonging to the company were sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of its debts. Nothing further was done toward the discovery of oil or gas until in the early part of the year 1906, when the defendants began operations on the Hall land under the lease to Thornily, made June 27, 1905. Defendants completed their first well June 28, 1906, and their second well September 28, 1906, both of which produced oil. They began to drill the third well on October 25, 1906, but were enjoined by order of court in this suit before the well was completed. The injunction order was later modified so as to permit the completion of this well, which also proved to be an oil-producing well. All three of these wells are on the Hall tract. The plaintiff, Smith, claims the exclusive right to the oil and gas in the Hall tract and in a number of other tracts in its vicinity, by assignment from Goff and Heck made on the 6th of February, 1906. At the time of this assignment to Smith, five quarterly rentals were past due on the Hall lease to Goff and Heck, and on the day after the assignment Goff and Heck deposited to the credit of the Halls in the Roane County Bank $132.50, to pay these back rentals. This money is now in the bank.

The vital question in the case is whether or not the Goff and Heck lease had been voluntarily abandoned, or their rights thereunder relinquished by them before June 27, 1905, at which time the Halls made the second lease to Thornily, the lease under which defendants claim. It is true, as counsel for appellant contends, that there is no express forfeiture clause in the contract, but this does not prevent the lessees from voluntarily abandoning the lease. The contract expressly gave them the right to surrender the lease at any time, upon the payment to the lessor of $1. This provision in the contract was evidently intended for the benefit of the lessee, and to avoid the payment of any further cash rental. This is one method by which the lease could certainly have been ended, but it did not preclude the possibility of terminating the contract by some other method. If the lessees chose to abandon the enterprise, and thus to put an end to the contract, without an actual return to the lessor of the lease contract and the payment to him of the $1, they could surely do so, but not without liability to him for the cash rental then due. On the other hand, the lessor could waive his right to collect the cash rental, and, in the event of an actual abandonment by the lessees, could release the premises. This contract, commonly called an oil and gas lease, did not invest Goff and Heck with any estate in the oil and gas in place; it simply gave them the exclusive right to make exploration upon this land for oil and gas. Their right was simply an inchoate right, not a vested estate in land. The lease is an executory contract in the nature of a license to enter upon the land and make exploration for oil and gas for a period of ten years, and longer if oil or gas should be discovered, and to extract them from the earth. No estate could vest until discovery. Consequently, the rights of the respective parties under this lease are not to be determined solely by the rules of law applicable in determining whether or not an estate in lands once vested has been forfeited. Neither is it necessary that a lease such as the one under consideration should contain a forfeiture clause before it can be shown that the lessee actually relinquished all his rights thereunder; in other words, that he abandoned the lease. A lessee may abandon the premises notwithstanding there is no forfeiture clause. His failure to pay the cash rentals stipulated in the contract may not alone be sufficient to prove abandonment; but his failure to pay taken in connection with other facts and circumstances evincing a clear intention to abandon the enterprise, coupled with the fact that no operations were ever begun upon the land, is sufficient to prove relinquishment of lessee's right. If abandonment by a lessee who has taken possession and begun operations on the premises can be established by proving a relinquishment of the leased premises, coupled with an intention to abandon, it certainly follows that an abandonment, or what is practically the same thing, a relinquishment of his rights, by a lessee who has never taken possession, or begun operations on the leased premises, may be established by proving that he had abandoned his intention to do so. Urpman v. Lowther Oil Co. 53 W. Va. 501, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 44 S. E. 433, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 656; Steel-smith v. Gartlan, 45 W. Va. 27, 44 L.R.A. 107, 29 S. E. 978, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 315; Parish Fork Oil Co. v. Bridgewater Gas Co. 51 W. Va. 583, 59 L.R.A. 566, 42 42 S. E. 655, 22 Mor. Min. Rep. 145; Crawford v. Ritchey, 43 W. Va. 252, 27 S. E. 220; Toothman v. Courtney, 62 W. Va. 167, 58 S. E. 915; Sult v. A. Hochstetter Oil Co. 63 W. Va. 317, 61 S. E. 307.

There is an implied covenant in the lease under consideration that lessees will use diligence to develop the property. Steel-smith v. Gartlan; Toothman v. Courtney; and Parish Fork Oil Co. v. Bridgewater Gas Co.,—supra. In view of this implied agreement to use diligence in making development, the failure to do so, or to pay the cash rentals for a long time, becomes a potent element of proof of intention to abandon.

Did Goff and Heck actually abandon their right to make exploration? Whether they did or not is a matter of intention; and their intention is to be determined from their conduct and declarations. It is shown by the testimony of a number of witnesses that both Goff and Heck considered that their rights to make further exploration terminated on the 29th of November, 1904, when the third quarterly cash rental became due, and was not paid. But it is argued by counsel for appellant that this was a misconstruction of the contract, a misapprehension of their legal rights, a mistake of law by which they should not be bound. But if such was their understanding of the agreement, and they acted upon it, how can they be heard to complain of their own mistake of law? If such was their interpretation of the writing, then it might well be said that such was in fact their agreement, so long as it did not militate against the rights of the lessor. The lessor and lessees both put the same construction on the contract; they both thought that a failure to pay the cash quarterly rental promptly in advance terminated the contract; and if the lessees abandoned their rights in ignorance of what those rights actually were, they were not misled by the lessor to do so, and they have only themselves to blame. They were not vested with title to real estate by the contract; they simply had the right, by its terms, to hold the lease for a period of ten years, even without making any effort to develop. But they were also bound to pay at the rate of $26.50 a quarter as a consideration for this right; and, thinking their rights would cease if payment was not promptly made, they applied to the lessor for a continuation of the lease through another quarter without pay of rental, and this was refused. This shows the understanding of the contracting parties. Neither was misled by the other. The lessees are now, in effect, asking to be relieved against the consequences of a mistake of law committed by themselves. It is a rule almost universally applied by the courts, that relief cannot be given in favor of one who has committed a mistake of law. Zollman v. Moore, 21 Gratt. 313; Meem v. Rucker, 10 Gratt. 506; Harner v. Price, 17 W. Va. 523; Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Floding, 27 W. Va. 540; Shriver v. Garrison, 30 W. Va. 456, 4 S. E. 660. Consequently, the reason or motive for the abandonment, if one actually occurred, becomes immaterial.

But it seems to be very clearly proven that Goff and Heck regarded the lease of no value, and that this is the reason for their abandoning the enterprise. Goff and Heck were both officers of the Lucky Oil & Gas company, which they had been instrumental in organizing for the purpose of developing this property. This company bored one dry well on a contiguous farm, and exhausted its funds in doing so. It hastened the completion of this well before the 29th of November, 1904, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of the cash quarterly rental then to become due. As soon as the dry well was completed the Lucky Oil & Gas Company ceased to do business and surrendered its charter. Shortly after the third rental became due, Heck told Sherman Nicholson, under whom they held an oil lease in the same territory, that the Lucky Oil & Gas Company had gone out of business, and that if Nicholson wanted to give another lease on his land "to go ahead and lease." This witness further says that Heck told him that the reason why they did not surrender the leases was because it would cost at least $16 to do so. John Nutter, who had also leased to them and whose lands joined the Donohue land, says that he had a conversation with Goff and Heck after the dry well was bored on the Donohue place, and that in that conversation they told him that they had nothing to do with the leases, that they had sold the leases to the Lucky Oil & Gas Company. This was after the third rental had become due to Nutter, whose lease was of the same date as the Hall lease. Linnie Nutter, wife of John Nutter, says that Heck was at their home in January, 1906, and asked her if Nutter had leased his land, and when she told him that he had "optioned it," he replied that he was sorry because he wanted to lease it himself. Adam Goebel, who had also given Goff and Heck a lease for oil and gas on March 2, 1904, and which is also one of the leases transferred to the Lucky Oil & Gas Company by Goff and Heck, and later sold by them to Smith, the plaintiff, says that after the third rental became due on his lease, and was not paid, he had a talk with Heck about December 2, 1904, and that Heck then told him that he had nothing to do with the lease, that the Lucky Oil & Gas Company had surrendered its charter, and that the lease was null and void. J. A. Epling, another one of their lessors, says that he had a conversation with Heck in January, 1906, and Heck wanted to know of him if he had leased his land, and when witness told him he had "optioned it," Heck said that he was sorry; that he would have advanced him 10 cents an acre on the first rental. Similar testimony was given by a number of other witnesses. Some of this testimony is denied by Goff and Heck, but much of it is admitted substantially as related by the witnesses. All of this testimony is in relation to conversations had between the witnesses and either Goff or Heck, before the time of the assignment of leases by Goff and Heck to H. L. Smith. They relate also to leases which Goff and Heck held upon other tracts of land in the vicinity of the Hall tract, some of which adjoined the Hall tract, and are some of the same leases which Goff and Heck turned over to the Lucky Oil & Gas Company, and which, they claim, were later returned to them by the said company at the time of its dissolution. This testimony was admissible only for the purpose of showing the intention of Goff and Heck to abandon the leases in that territory, and the Hall tract was one of them. The Hall tract was also one of the leases which had been assigned to the Lucky Oil & Gas Company. At the time when Heck wanted to know of Epling if he had leased his land, a producing well had been drilled in the neighborhood on a tract known as the "Bee tract," and interest in the oil business was very much revived thereby. This fact, no doubt, explains Heck's anxiety to obtain another lease from Epling at that time. All of this testimony clearly shows that Goff and Heck had abandoned whatever rights they had under their leases which had been once held by the Lucky Oil & Gas Company. The drilling of the dry well, and the expenditure of $6,500 by the Lucky Oil & Gas Company in the drilling of it, seem to have been sufficient to satisfy Goff and Heck that they would be losing money by the payment of any further cash rentals, and they then made up their minds to abandon prospecting any further. Failure to pay the quarterly rentals, taken by itself, would not be sufficient to prove intention to abandon, but it is an evidential fact which may properly be considered in determining intention. It materially strengthens the evidence of intention to abandon which other facts tend to prove. The failure of Goff and Heck to make any exploration for oil and gas on the Hall tract for more than a year after the date of their lease, and their failure to pay three successive quarterly rentals, taken in connection with the other facts and circumstances hereinbefore adverted to, we think clearly prove that they had abandoned their rights under the lease. Such abandonment operated as a surrender in law of their lease, and gave the Halls the right to execute the lease to Thornily, under which the defendants claim.

The fact that Goff and Heck were financially responsible for the cash rentals, and that such rentals could have been collected by legal process, does not affect the merits of the controversy. The Halls could waive their right to sue, and had a right to treat the contract as at an end whenever Goff and Heck voluntarily abandoned their right to make further exploration.

There is another circumstance in the record which tends strongly to show abandonment. It is this, the minutes of the stockholders' meeting of the Lucky Oil & Gas Company held for the purpose of dissolution are entered upon the book of said corporation in two places, one entry on page 9 and another on page 11 of the corporation's book. The entry on page 9 was made a few days after the meeting of the stockholders which was held on the 24th of November, 1904, and appears to have been made by A. S. Heck. The resolution authorizing the return of the leases to Goff and Heck was not entered in the body of the minutes, but was entered on the margin of the page in pencil, afterwards by him. The same minutes are re-entered on pages 11 and 12 of the corporation book by Mr. G. F. Hopkins about fourteen months after the meeting, after the corporation was dissolved. This fact tends to prove two things: (1) That Goff and Heck regarded the leases of no value, and forgot to have a resolution passed providing for the return of them; and (2) that it was desirable to present to Smith an unsuspicious record which would show a return of the leases to Goff and Heck by the corporation.

We think the court below was clearly warranted by the facts in finding that Goff and Heck had voluntarily abandoned their rights under the lease from the Halls prior to the execution of the second lease by the Halls to Thornily, and finding no error in the decree of the lower court, the same will be affirmed.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

MATTHEW SCULLY, Appt.,

v.

LOUISE SQUIER et al., Respnts.

(13 Idaho, 417, 90 Pac. 573.)

Public lands — town site — disposal of lots.

1. The city of Lewiston was located on the public domain of the United States, and under the provisions of § 2387 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1457, was entered by the mayor in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof according to their respective interests. Said section of the statute provides that the execution of such trust as to the disposal of the lots in Headnotes by SULLIVAN, J.

Note. — Right to change lot lines of occupants after entry under the town-site act.

In harmony with the rule announced in SCULLY v. SQUIER, the cases hold that the title to occupied lots becomes vested in the trustee for the benefit of the occupants severally at the time the entry is made, under the act of March 2, 1867, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2387, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1457, and the rights of the parties as beneficiaries must be determined as of that date; that the occupants have a vested interest in the streets and boundaries of their lots as they then existed, which cannot be interfered with by a new plan or survey that diminishes the lines, or cuts off any of their property rights, affirmed in 215 U. S. 144, 54 L. ed. 131, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 51; Parchen v. Ashby, 5 Mont. 68, 1 Pac. 204; Pueblo v. Budd, 19 Colo. 579, 36 Pac. 599; Jones v. Petaluma, 38 Cal. 397; Globe v. Slack, 11 Ariz. 408, 95 Pac. 126; Bingham v. Walla Walla, 3 Wash. Terr. 68, 13 Pac. 408.

In Ashby v. Hall, 119 U. S. 526, 30 L. ed. 469, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 308, it was held that the interests which the occupants of land within the limits of a town site entered under the act of March 2, 1867, had at the time of entry, either in the land occupied by them or any rights of way over adjoining streets and alleys, could not be diminished by the state or territorial legislature under the authority conferred by the town-site act.

In Aleman v. Petaluma, 38 Cal. 553, it such town and the proceeds of the sale thereof must be conducted under such regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the territory.

Same — survey.

2. In compliance with the provisions of said section, the territorial legislature passed an act entitled, "An Act to Provide for the Survey, Platting, and Disposal of the Land in the City of Lewiston, Nez Percé County, Idaho, Pursuant to the United States Statutes Made and Provided," which act was approved January 8, 1873 (Sess. Laws 1872-73, p. 16).

Same — conveyances.

3. Under the provisions of said act, a surveyor was employed to survey and plat the lands in said town, and was directed by said act to so arrange and adjust the plat as to conform to the conditions of the improvements and occupation of the lots, and the mayor was thereafter directed to make and deliver to the bona fide occupants of said lands good and sufficient deeds of conveyance in fee simple and the title to the lots claimed by them according to their respective interests, under the provisions of said law.

Same — change of lot lines.

4. The said plat cut off from the northerly ends of the lots in block 24 about 4 feet, and included the part cut off in D street. At the time said plat was made, said lots, for their entire length, were covered by improvements and possessed and occupied.

Same — surveyor — powers.

5. Said surveyor had no authority or right to cut off a portion of said lots, and include it in a street.

was held that the map which the town authorities were entitled to make under the state statute passed in pursuance of the town-site act was only such as represented the existing streets, alleys, and squares, and such as the occupants of the property might consent to.

To the same effect is Jones v. Petaluma, supra; Jones v. Petaluma, 36 Cal. 230.

So, in Parchen v. Ashby, supra, it was held that the mere fact that the plat and survey, made after the entry, failed to designate a street or alley as it existed before the entry, did not thereby destroy such street or alley, and change the ground so occupied into a lot that could be conveyed. And for the same reason, where the plat and survey designated land which had before entry been occupied, as an existing street, it would not in any manner affect the right of the occupant to his lot, since all the powers of the trustee were exhausted when he conveyed to the occupants their lots according to their rights and interests under the statute.

And in Helena v. Albertose, 8 Mont. 499, 20 Pac. 817, it was held that the act of the probate judge in embracing lands in possession of defendants as a portion of a street in the map filed under the statute 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Same — rights of occupants.

6. The rules and regulations made by the legislature did not enlarge or diminish the rights of the occupants of the lots, as the rights of the occupants accrued at the time of the entry of the town site, and could not be defeated by the surveyor.

Same — entry — effect.

7. The interests which the occupants possessed previous to the entry, either in the land occupied by them or in the rights of way over adjoining streets and alleys, were secured by such entry.

Same — "disposal" of lots.

8. Under the provisions of said § 2387, Revised Statutes, the execution of the trust imposed on the mayor as to the disposal of the lots was conducted under the regulations established by the legislature. The word "disposal" as used in that section must be construed to mean "distribution" when applied to the lots that were actually occupied and possessed, for under said section such lots were already disposed of; that is, they became the property of the occupants, and the occupant of a town lot at the time of the entry of a town site is its real owner.

Same — title.

9. The trust imposed on the mayor of an incorporated town is for the benefit of the inhabitants, first as individuals, and after that, collectively, as a community, and the title to the occupied lots becomes vested in the trustee for the benefit of the occupants severally at the time such entry is made, and neither the surveyor nor the mayor can deprive them of that title.

Same — surveyor — powers.

10. The surveyor cannot make a paper

after entry was void where the land was never used as a street or recognized as such by the occupants, and that the municipality could not afterwards recover the land in ejectment on the ground that it had been dedicated as a public street, since no dedication could result from the survey and the filing of the map under the circumstances.

In Bingham v. Walla Walla, supra, it appeared that a part of the land occupied by a settler formed part of a street as shown by a survey and plat made after the entry, under the town-site statute, and it was held that the acceptance by the occupant of a deed from the town authorities conveying the legal title to only a portion of the land, and describing it as abutting on a certain street as designated on the plan, would not operate as an estoppel against the grantee or those claiming under him from afterwards laying claim to the part not conveyed, and forming part of the street named in the deed as one of the boundaries, where the city authorities were informed by the grantee that he did not intend to relinquish his right to the land not conveyed by them, until paid for the same.

street in such town, and deprive the actual occupants of vested rights, as the only authority the surveyor had was to plat the town in conformity to the use and occupancy of the lots and blocks.

Same — change of lot lines.

11. The surveyor had no authority to establish streets through and over buildings, nor to cut off any portion or parts of buildings for street purposes.

Same — rights of beneficiaries.

12. The mayor or surveyor had no authority to change the beneficiaries under such trust.

(May 18, 1907.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Nez Percé County dismissing a suit to enjoin an alleged encroachment upon a highway by owners of town site lots, and from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Benjamin F. Tweedy, for appellant:

The official survey of the town site is a necessary, essential part of the confirmations accepted in 1875 by the predecessors of the parties to this action, and when the town site occupants accept deeds from the trustee and in confirmation of all their equitable rights, they can never thereafter in a court of law or equity claim that they ought to have had another and different confirmation, and that all their equitable rights had not been confirmed to them; but the official survey and the confirmation thereupon become the exclusive, conclusive, and only evidence of not only their legal rights, but all their equitable rights.

The state courts cannot, upon parol, after confirmation by the trustee, without an official survey of that land claimed by the defendants as private property to be confirmed to them, even attempt to enforce any trust under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2387, when the land has remained surveyed as a part of a street for over thirty years, without an attempt on the part of anyone to have the land claimed surveyed officially as private property.

It was never the intention of Congress to have confirmation of equitable titles by "parcels," one part by the trustees and the other part by the court; and without the land claimed by the defendants being surveyed as private property officially by the trustee, the court is without jurisdiction to enforce any trust under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2387.

The occupation of a part of the officially surveyed, established street in conflict with the official survey and the accepted confirmation upon the official survey by the predecessors of the parties to this action, is the maintenance of a public and private nuisance, and can be abated by the plaintiff, however long continued, in order to protect his rights of equity merging in the confirmation accepted by his predecessor under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2387, as by such section he is the owner of private rights in the street appurtenant to his lot.

Sullivan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to prevent alleged encroachments on D street in the city of Lewiston. The appellant as plaintiff brought this action against the respondents, alleging that they were encroaching upon said D street, and charging them with having taken for their private use approximately 4 feet off the south side of said street, and of extending their buildings over and upon said 4 feet of land wrongfully.

The nature of this action is a suit in equity to abate a nuisance alleged to be a public nuisance, damaging to the public as well as to the plaintiff's private rights, and praying that the same be abated and removed, and that an injunction be issued restraining and prohibiting defendants and each of them from encroaching upon said street, and for a mandatory injunction against the defendants, and to restore said street to its width as claimed to have been established by the official survey of E. B. True, to wit, 80 feet.

The defendants deny any encroachment upon said street, and allege affirmatively the incorporation of the city of Lewiston, surveying and platting of the city long prior to the said True survey; that, according to said original plat and survey, the lots in question were 50 feet in length north and south, except where they widened at the bend in E street (said E street is also called Main street and Montgomery street); that about the year 1874, and long after the rights of the defendants and their predecessors were vested to the premises in controversy, the town site of Lewiston was entered by the mayor, Henry W. Stainton, under the Federal town-site act; that the defendants and their predecessors in interest were, long prior to 1874, in the actual occupancy, the use, and enjoyment of the premises in controversy, which they were enjoying at the time of the commencement of this suit, on which premises they are now attempting to erect the three-story brick buildings referred to in the complaint; that a patent was issued by the United States to the mayor as trustee, and thereafter the official survey was made; that said survey was ordered under the Federal and territorial laws; that the declaratory statement therefor was No. 39, and was made in the United States land office at Lewiston, November 21, 1871, by Levi Ankeny, in trust for the inhabitants of the city of Lewiston, claiming settlement in 1861; that cash entry was made June 6, 1874, therefor, by said Henry W. Stainton in trust; that said True was employed to make the survey, and was commanded as follows: "To so adjust the said plat as to conform to the condition of the improvements of and occupation of the lands affected thereby, and the mayor-trustee was authorized, empowered, and required to make and deliver to the bona fide occupants of such land described in the patent, good and sufficient deeds in fee simple, according to their respective interests, and for that purpose was authorized to carry the act into effect;" that in making said survey, more especially the survey of the south line of said D street, the said True did not pay regard to or attention to the several use and uses of the land as the same was then occupied by the inhabitants of the city of Lewiston, and more especially did not pay any attention to the quantity of land then used and occupied by the defendants and their predecessors in interest, and that said True did not conform said D street as it was known and used prior to said survey, nor did he pay due or any regard to the actual use, occupancy, and improvements of the said lots; that the south line of said D street as surveyed and delineated by said True cut several feet off the north end of the lots of the various inhabitants of Lewiston, which lots had a frontage on D street, and so cut off the lots in controversy owned by these defendants and their predecessors; that said street as surveyed by said True crossed and interfered with buildings then standing on the same, and attempted to divest certain vested rights; that said True did not conform D street to the use of lands, nor did he make D street, as marked on his map or plat, conform to or coincide with the actual south line thereof, as the same had been and then was used and treated as a public street; that thereafter and after the approval of the said True survey, such steps were taken that in many instances the plat and survey were corrected and changed, and that, notwithstanding the erroneous work of said True, the various citizens still continued in the actual use and occupancy of their said lands, and the predecessors of defendants did the same as to the lots involved in this case, and which are owned and possessed by them, and that such claim was by occupancy, buildings, and improvements, continued from the first occupancy, thence hitherto, and that the land involved, being about 4 feet on the north end of said lots, never at any time, nor at all, was used or occupied as a street, but was used and occupied by defendants and their predecessors; that after True had made his plat, it was amended, and the defendants aver that the correct south line thereof is now and was by such amendment shown in red ink, and that the red ink line conformed to the true south line and to the several uses and occupancy of the lands involved; that respondent Moxley owned lot 3 in said block 24, having an area of 1,250 square feet, both prior to and after said True survey, but that said True gave it only 1,136 square feet; that lot 2 in said block as shown by said True survey contained but 1,131 square feet, whereas, long prior to the said survey and at the time thereof and since, the said lot has in truth and in fact contained 1,250 square feet; that the difference between 1,250 square feet and 1,131 square feet is the strip of approximately 4 feet wide by 25 feet in length, which appellant seeks to enjoin the respondent Squier from holding; that such lot as claimed by the said Squier has been actually covered by a building for more than thirty-five years last past, and was so occupied by said building long prior to the survey of True; that respondent Moxley obtained title to lot 3, said block, by direct deed from Henry D. Stainton, mayor-trustee, and that the plat of the True survey and the size of this lot as stated by him were amended prior to the recordation of said plat, and that True's survey gave said lot only 1,136 square feet, but the same with an amendment was deeded to said Moxley by said mayor-trustee, and the strip involved herein is the amendment which said mayor deeded to Moxley.

The answer then alleges the rights of respondent Fix, and avers that his right through predecessors antedates said True survey, and that the land claimed by him in addition to that specified in True's survey never was a street or highway, but that said strip was long prior to said survey in the actual, visible, exclusive, and notorious possession of said defendant and his predecessors in interest, and never constituted a part of D street; that that state of facts existed at the time said True made his survey, and that the appellant when erecting his building did not cover the ground theretofore occupied by his old building, nor by the predecessors in interest of said Scully; that the Grostein building situated on the lot immediately west of the Scully lot, was erected seventeen years ago, and that said building extends far out beyond Scully's building, and was built bordering on the south line of D street then given to said Grostein by city officers; that said Scully placed his building entirely off of and away from the south line of said D street as it then existed; that the field notes and plat of block 24 as made by said True did not correspond, and that the same are incorrect, which errors interfered with vested property rights.

The answer then alleges that said respondents are attempting to use only the same ground that they and their predecessors have always used; that the premises of each of the respondents extends to the south line of D street as actually used.

From the foregoing statement, the real issue in the case is very clearly presented. The appellant claims that the defendants have encroached upon and erected their buildings about 4 feet out on and into said street, while the respondents contend that they have not done so, but that their buildings only extend northward to the line which has been occupied and on which buildings have been erected for more than thirty years. The entire controversy arises over the correctness of the said True survey and his field notes thereof.

After the trial of the case, the court made quite elaborate findings of fact, and deduced therefrom conclusions of law to the effect that the case made on behalf of the appellant was devoid of equity, and that he was without any standing in a court of equity; that he has no such interest as would permit him to maintain this action, and that the defendants were entitled to judgment and decree in their favor, and judgment was entered accordingly, dismissing the action. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

In deciding this case, it becomes necessary to recur to a few of the historical facts connected with the location and settlement of the city of Lewiston. It was first settled in the year 1861, upon what was then a part of the Nez Percé reservation. At that time the territory now included in the state of Idaho was a part of the territories of Washington, Nebraska, Dakota, and Utah. (See People v. Williams, 1 Idaho, 85.) Nez Percé county, in which the city of Lewiston is located, was organized under an act of the legislature of Washington territory on December 20, 1861. The territory of Idaho was organized under an act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, and its first territorial legislature convened on the 7th of December, 1863, and adjourned on the 4th day of February, 1864, which session was held at the city of Lewiston. At that session of the legislature, by an act approved February 4, 1864, the boundaries of Nez Percé county were changed, and that county reorganized. (1 Sess. Laws, p. 628.) Lewiston at that time was a distributing point for the various mining camps to the northeast, east, and southwest. The city of Lewiston was incorporated under the laws of Washington territory, by an act approved January 15, 1863, and was reincorporated by an act of the legislature of Idaho in 1866. (Sess. Laws 1866, 4th Session, p. 87.)

The 1st section of that act defines the boundaries of said city, and recites that the territory incorporated "constitute in square form, as near as practicable, according to government survey, 1 square mile, intended to include the square mile of land stipulated for in favor of said town in the treaty between the United States and the Nez Percé tribe of Indians now pending, is hereby organized into a municipal corporation under the name of 'The City of Lewiston.'" It would appear from this that a treaty was then pending between the United States and the Nez Percé tribe of Indians for the tract of land on which the city of Lewiston stood, to the extent of 1 square mile.

Levi Ankeny was mayor of the city of Lewiston in 1871, and on November 21st of that year filed his declaratory statement No. 39 in the United States land office at Lewiston, proposing to enter the lands included within the borders of said incorporation in trust for the inhabitants of the city of Lewiston, claiming settlement in 1861. Cash entry was made for said lands on June 6, 1874, by Henry W. Stainton, mayor, in trust for the inhabitants of said city.

This entry was made under the provisions of § 2387 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1457, which section is as follows: "Entry of town authorities in trust for occupants. Whenever any portion of the public lands have been or may be settled upon and occupied as a town site, not subject to entry under the agricultural preemption laws, it is lawful, in case such town be incorporated, for the corporate authorities thereof, and, if not incorporated, for the judge of the county court for the county in which such town is situated, to enter at the proper land office, and at the minimum price, the land so settled and occupied in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests; the execution of which trust, as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sales thereof, to be conducted under such regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the state or territory in which the same may be situated."

The trust provided for by this section is dual in its nature. It exists for the benefit of the occupants as individuals, and also collectively as a community. The title to occupants of lots vested in the mayor-trustee for their benefit severally when the entry was made. The title to lots to which no valid claims are held by individuals is taken in trust by the trustee for the occupants of the town site collectively. (See notes to said § 2387, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. p. 344.) Under the provisions of said section, the execution of the trust created, as to the disposal of the lots in such town, must be conducted under such regulations as may be prescribed by the legislature of the state wherein such town is located.

The legislature of the territory by an act approved January 8, 1873, (7 Sess. Laws, p. 16), provided for the survey, platting, and disposal of the land in the city of Lewiston, pursuant to the United 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

States statutes in regard to such matters. Said act provides that the mayor-trustee shall cause to be made and filed in his office by a competent person a plat of the land within said city, divided into blocks and lots, and "to make and deliver to the bona fide occupants of such portions of said land described in said patent from the government of the United States, who may be entitled thereto, good and sufficient deeds of conveyance in fee simple according to their respective rights."

Under the provisions of said laws, one E. B. True was employed to survey and plat the lands in said town, and was commanded to adjust said plat so as to conform to the conditions of the improvements and the use and occupation of such lands by the settler, and the mayor was required to make and deliver to the bona fide occupants of such lands good and sufficient deeds of conveyance in fee simple according to their respective interests, under the provisions of said law.

It appears from the evidence in the case that said True made a plat of said town including block 24, in which block are the lots involved in this case, so as to make the lots about 46 feet long, north and south, when, as a matter of fact, most, if not all, of the lots in that block were 50 feet long north and south, as indicated by the buildings and other improvements thereon. The question is fairly presented as to whether said True had any authority whatever to make said plat so as to interfere with and cut off a part of the buildings and improvements of the occupants of such lots. In other words, whether under the law a surveyor who is employed to plat such a town site after its entry by the proper officer can widen a street, and in doing so cut off a portion of the buildings and improvements of the lot owners bordering on such street.

It must be kept in mind that Lewiston existed prior to the True survey. The settlers did not acquire their right under the plat nor by virtue of it. The survey and plat was made for them; they were not made for the survey and plat.

In Parthen v. Ashby, 5 Mont. 68, 1 Pac. 204, a Montana case, the court had under consideration a controversy over a strip of land 16 feet wide on Rodney street in the town of Helena. That town site was entered by the probate judge, and the court there held that the survey must conform as near as may be to the existing rights and interests of the occupants, and that no valid and subsisting easements could be destroyed by the survey and the acceptance of the plat by the county commissioners. The court, in referring to the requirements prescribed by the legislature of Montana, said: "These regulations could not enlarge or diminish the rights or interests of occupants of the lots. And so our legislature provided that the survey and plat of the town site should conform as near as might be to the existing rights, interests, and claims of the occupants thereof. The lots were to be surveyed, and the streets and alleys as they existed prior to the entry were to be respected and recognized. For in no other manner could the occupants obtain title to their lots according to their several rights and interests. The plat and survey of the probate judge must conform to the old survey, by which the occupants had held and occupied their lots prior to the entry of the town site; otherwise his plat and survey are so far void. . . . The rights of occupants accrued before the entry of the town site by the probate judge, and the mere fact that his plat and survey failed to designate a street or alley as it existed before his entry and survey does not thereby destroy such street or alley, and change the ground occupied by the same into a lot that can be sold. And so, for the same reason, if this plat and survey had designated ground theretofore occupied as a lot, as an alley or a street, such designation would not in any manner affect the right of the occupant to his lot."

It is there held that the plat and survey could not in any manner affect the right of the occupant to his lot. The rights of the occupant had attached prior to True's survey, and the entry of the town site was made in trust for the occupants who were in possession of particular tracts of land as well as for the community in general. The surveyor could not divest them of their rights. The survey was for their benefit, and should have confirmed those rights.

In Ashby v. Hall, 119 U. S. 526, 30 L. ed. 469, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 308, the supreme court of the United States held that the interests which the occupants possessed previous to the entry, either in the land occupied by them or in rights of way over adjoining streets and alleys, were secured by it. The court said: "The power vested in the legislature of the territory . . . was confined to regulations for the disposal of the lots and the proceeds of the sales. These regulations might extend to provisions for the ascertainment of the nature and extent of the occupancy of different claimants of lots, and the execution and delivery to those found to be occupants in good faith of some official recognition of title in the nature of a conveyance. But they could not authorize any diminution of the rights of the occupants when the extent of their occupancy was established." Upon this point, see also Bingham v. Walla Walla, 3 Wash. Terr. 68, 13 Pac. 408.

In Goldberg v. Kidd, 5 S. D. 169, 58 N. W. 574, in commenting upon the word "disposal" as used in § 2387, Revised Statutes of the United States, the court said: "As to the lots actually occupied when the entry was made, we think the word 'disposal' must be understood to mean 'distribution,' which words are often used synonymously, for, as to such lots, they were already disposed of, that is, they became at once the property equitably of their occupants."

In Stringfellow v. Cain, 99 U. S. 610, 25 L. ed. 421, the court said: "The occupant of a lot at the time the entry of a town site is made is its real owner."

In the case of Pueblo v. Budd, 19 Colo. 579, 36 Pac. 599, it is said: "The entry of the town site, therefore, being 'in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof according to their respective interests,' each of such occupants at the time of the entry became, to the extent of their respective holdings, beneficiaries of the trust, and were vested with the equitable ownership of the lot or parcel of land to the extent of their occupancy."

E. B. True had no authority to attempt to take private property for street purposes, nor did the fact that he ran his survey where he did deprive any of the owners of their property rights which were then vested. (Helena v. Albertose, 8 Mont. 499, 20 Pac. 817; Treadway v. Wilder, 8 Nev. 91; Bingham v. Walla Walla and Parchen v. Ashby, supra; Hall v. Ashby, 2 Mont. 489; Aleman v. Petaluma, 38 Cal. 553; Aspen v. Rucker, 10 Colo. 184, 15 Pac. 791; Denver v. Kent, 1 Colo. 336.)

It would appear from the provisions of said § 2387 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, that such land is permitted to be entered by the proper authority for the use and benefit of the occupants thereof according to their respective interests. As above stated, such trusts exist for the benefit of the inhabitants, first as individuals, and after that, collectively, as a community. And the title to the occupied lots becomes vested in the trustee for the benefit of the occupants severally at the time such entry is made. If the surveyor who is employed to plat the town has the authority to cut off 4 feet from the lots on a certain block, he certainly has the authority to cut off more, and where is the line to be drawn? Can the surveyor make a paper street in such a town, and deprive the actual occupants of vested rights? We think not. The occupants possessed certain rights in and to the lots occupied by them before the entry, and the only authority the surveyor had was to plat the town in conformity to the use and occupancy of the lots and blocks. The plat must be made for the benefit and use of the occupants. The surveyor's power was limited; he had no authority to establish streets through and over buildings, nor to cut off any portions or parts of buildings for that purpose. If that were not true, it would have been better for the occupants not to have had the entry made, for they had the right to occupy their lots as they were then occupying them. If the entry was not made in their interests, their rights were not as well established after the entry as before. The object and purpose of the statutes was to benefit the occupants, and not to destroy their rights. In this case the occupants had property rights in the premises occupied by them, and the surveyor had no authority to take private property for street purposes, or to establish any portion of a street on private property. The occupant's right and ownership did not come by virtue of the plat and survey; it came by reason of his possession and occupancy and the improvements that he had placed upon his lot.

As before stated, the trust of the mayor was dual in its nature. The occupants of the lots, each as individuals, were entitled to deeds to their lots as occupied by them. The community of the city as a whole was entitled to the unoccupied lots, and the public in general were entitled to the streets. The individual had no right under the law to encroach upon the streets, and the city had no right to appropriate a portion of the lots of the occupants for a street. The mayor and the surveyor had no authority to change the beneficiaries under this trust.

There is no dispute in the evidence but that the defendants and their predecessors in interest claimed and occupied the lots in question to their full length. Buildings and other improvements had entirely covered the said lots. The owners occupied and possessed said lots 50 feet in length. It is not claimed or shown that any of said lots were ever used as a street, or any part thereof, nor that the city ever claimed any part thereof as a portion of the street, and the city surveyor cannot make any portion of said lots a street by simply making a plat and indicating on such plat that said lots were only 45 or 46 feet in length. The mayor-trustee had no judicial power in this matter,—neither had the surveyor. The surveyor and mayor cannot dedicate to the public as a street parts of lots occupied and possessed by individuals.

The appellant rests his case here on the making and approval of said plat. If private rights can be taken in that way, it is a novel proceeding and a proposition unknown to our law. The record clearly shows that the mayor recognized the incorrectness of the plat, as he executed deeds showing that fact long prior to the time that said plat was filed. While the plat was made and approved in 1875, it was not recorded until 1879. The city of Lewiston is not here complaining of the erection of buildings on the lots referred to in her streets. The record clearly shows that the city has for forty-five years known that the occupants of the lots on said block 24 were claiming that such lots were 50 feet in length, and that they had buildings and other improvements covering said lots.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that none of the respondents can question the boundaries of D street without establishing a legal or equitable title owned by him at the time of the encroachment with the buildings upon the boundaries of such street, and that no equitable title vests in an occupant other than at the time of the day of filing the application in the land office of the United States.

We think it sufficiently appears from the evidence that the lots in question were occupied, claimed, and possessed ever since long before the application was made to enter said land, either by the present owners or their predecessors in interest, and, as heretofore stated, it also appears that they claimed their said lots to be 50 feet in length, and that they or their predecessors have had improvements of some kind covering said entire 50 feet. That being true, the counsel's contention is fully met by the proof in the case.

Taking the whole record, it sufficiently appears that that portion of D street in controversy has never been possessed and occupied and used as a street, although the other parts of the street have been used since 1861, about forty-six years. We have no doubt but what appellant, regardless of the suggestions of the city engineer, has the right to extend his building out even with the other buildings placed along said street and that the city has no right to the use of said 4 feet, or thereabouts, for a part of D street.

The judgment of the court below must be affirmed, with costs in favor of the respondents.

Allshie, Ch. J., concurs.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down June 18, 1907:

A petition for rehearing has been filed in this case. We will say at the outset that no discourtesy to counsel for appellant was intended in any of the statements contained in the opinion in this case. We have the utmost confidence in counsel's honor and ability.

Counsel states that in the commencement of this action and in its prosecution he largely relied on the case of Boisé City v. Flanagan, 6 Idaho, 149, 53 Pac. 453. The facts of that case and the case at bar are not similar or parallel. In that case one James Stout claimed the tract in controversy. A part of it he had inclosed and improved, and the remaining part was not inclosed. Both the inclosed and the unincluded lots he claimed as one tract. On the 2d day of May, 1870, the United States conveyed by patent the land included in said Boisé City town site to Henry Elliot Prickett, then mayor of said city, in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants of said town site. The mayor had the same platted into blocks, streets, and alleys, and the part of the tract so claimed by Stout, which had not been inclosed by him or improved in any way or manner, lay in the street. Upon proper application by Stout to the mayor for a deed to the part so platted, a deed was issued to him by the mayor for said fractional block, as it was called. Stout thereafter, in May, 1871, sold and conveyed said fractional block to one James Dunn, in which conveyance he also described the land in controversy and platted as a street. The land so platted as a street had not been inclosed up to that date, May, 1871, and was not inclosed by said Dunn until June, 1878, and, from the time that Dunn inclosed it on down to the commencement of the action, the city repeatedly asserted its control and right to control over said tract as a part of the streets of said city, and repeatedly notified Dunn to remove all fences and improvements, which he promised to do.

In the case at bar, the defendants and their grantors had been in the exclusive, actual possession of all of said lots, and had them covered with buildings, and the parts not covered with buildings were inclosed by fences. They were in possessio pedis of every square foot of said lots. That being true, the city authorities had notice of their claims, and the surveyor had notice that they were in actual occupation and possession of said lots 50 feet in length, and had improvements thereon.

In the Flanagan Case, when the surveyor came to plat Boisé City, he found no improvements whatever on the tract in controversy, and platted the portion claimed by Dunn as a part of the streets of said city. Said tract laid open as a part of said street until 1878,—for more than six years after Dunn had purchased the fractional block of Stout,—before he fenced it, and when he was notified by the city authorities to remove his fence from said premises, he promised to remove it. That case is very different from the one at bar, for, regardless of the E. B. True survey, and regardless of the city authorities, which authorities never at any time claimed any portion of the lots of defendants in this case, nor notified them to remove their improvements from any part of the lots, the defendants and their grantors had steadfastly claimed the same, and the most of them had received deeds from the mayor for said lots 50 feet in length. Their actions and conduct could not be taken as an estoppel against them; while the actions and conduct of Stout and Dunn in the Flanagan Case clearly show that if they had any rights to the land in controversy in that case, they were such as to estop them from claiming them against the city.

In the case at bar we find no laches, waiver of rights, or ratifications of survey such as would estop the defendants from claiming said lots 50 feet in length. So far as the record shows, the city never has questioned the right of the defendants in this action in and to said lots for their full length, 50 feet.

Counsel also cites Moore v. Walla Walla, 2 Wash. Terr. 184, 2 Pac. 187, as a case supporting his contention. The court held therein that a party may by his acts so recognize boundaries as marked out in a recorded plat of a city as to estop him from denying the correctness of such boundaries. The court in that opinion says: "The only title claimed by defendants was derived from one D. S. Baker, and if the said D. S. Baker was not in a situation to assert his title to said land as against the public at the time he conveyed the land, it will follow, under the circumstances of this case, that defendant will occupy the same situation."

It would seem from that statement in the opinion, that the grantor of the defendants in that case, at the time he sold said lots to them, was not in a position to assert his title to said land as against the city authorities. But not so in the case at bar. The grantors of the defendants in the case at bar were in a position or situation to assert their title to said lots as against the city of Lewiston, for the reason that they had buildings or inclosures covering said entire lots, and were claiming them at the time the entry was made by the mayor. There are other facts stated in the opinion in that case which show that the defendants recognized the boundaries of said streets and lots, and the court held as follows: "These acts and some others of a similar nature appearing in the record, in our opinion, estop him as above stated." That is not a case in point.

Counsel also cites Laughlin v. Denver, 24 Colo. 255, 50 Pac. 917. In that case it appears from the averments of the complaint that Laughlin entered upon the land in dispute, July 13, 1865, under a deed from Andrew and Elizabeth Sagendorf, and had held exclusive, continued, and uninterrupted possession of said land until February, 1893, when the defendant city, without leave and over the protest of plaintiff, forcibly entered upon said land, and removed certain houses and fences, and cut down and removed certain trees, ousted and ejected the plaintiff therefrom, and converted and used said land for a street. It appears that on May 29, 1865, the city surveyor filed with the clerk of said city of Denver a map of the then city of Denver, which was approved by the city council on June 22, 1865, and filed for record with the clerk and recorder of the county in which said city is located on June 29, 1865. There is shown on said map outlot or block No. 257 in what is known as the "western division" of the city of Denver, and to the west of said outlot is marked "Jefferson street." The land in dispute in that case was a part of Jefferson street, and so marked. On August 29, 1865, the probate judge, in pursuance of the territorial statute, conveyed by deed to the defendant city the streets, lanes, avenues, and alleys of the city of Denver lying within the tract of land included in said surveyor's plat, including Jefferson street, which deed was recorded on June 8, 1867. On July 13, 1865, Laughlin bought from Sagendorf and wife, the occupants thereof, a tract of land inclosed by a certain fence, which included the land described in the complaint, upon which there stood at the time a log house, and also the land described in said surveyor's map as outlot or block No. 257, and received from them a quitclaim deed, which Laughlin supposed described the whole tract, but which in fact conveyed only that portion designated as outlot No. 257. Laughlin entered into possession of the land so purchased, and occupied and lived in the log house situated thereon, and in 1866 planted trees and built a stable, corral, barn, and out-houses, and in 1871 built a frame house on the land in dispute, plowed and used the balance of the land for gardening and grazing purposes; occupied and used, cultivated, and possessed said land uninterruptedly from July 13, 1865, to February 10, 1893, when the city, under claim of title as aforesaid, entered upon said land and cut down and removed the trees, houses, and other improvements therefrom, and took possession of the land in controversy as a portion of Jefferson street, which, up to the latter date, had not been opened or used by the defendant.

At the outset the court says in that case that, on the foregoing statement of facts, the question determinative of the right of the parties is whether the execution of the deed of August 29, 1865, by the probate judge, was a valid exercise of his authority as trustee, and vested in the city the legal title and the right to the possession of the land in controversy, and if so, whether such title and right has been lost by nonuser. In that case the plaintiff contended that the deed was unauthorized so far as the land in dispute was concerned, because no street was laid out over the same at the time of its execution, and the court says: "This objection would merit very serious consideration if the plaintiff was in a position to urge it, since the streets which the people or legal authorities have a right to have conveyed are such only as are actually used or laid out at the time of the entry of the town site."

And further says: "A trustee is not authorized to designate any of the site in the possession of an actual occupant, as a part of a street."

This last statement is what we hold in this case; that the trustee-mayor had no authority to designate any part of the town site that was in the possession of an actual occupant, as a part of a street. The court then proceeds and says: "But in view of the relation that the plaintiff holds to the property, in our opinion he is precluded from assailing the validity of this deed upon this ground. He was not an occupant of the land at the time the town site was entered, and the title thereto vested in the trustee, nor has he ever succeeded to the right of the then occupants."

While in the case at bar we hold from the evidence that the respondents did derive their rights from the fact of being on the land at the time it was entered by the mayor, or derived their rights from their predecessors who were on the lots at the time. However, if in fact the rule laid down in that case is contrary to the rule that we have laid down in this case, we are not inclined to follow it. In that case the court held that Laughlin had no right by adverse possession, as the deed under which he claimed did not purport to convey the land in controversy, and therefore did not constitute color of title. In the case at bar, the respondents in their predecessors in interest have been in the actual physical possession of the said lots their entire length, 50 feet, for thirty-five or forty years, and the city has not at any time molested, interfered with, or disputed their right and ownership therein.

Laches cannot be imputed to the respondents because they have not brought an action against the city to determine their rights, as they were in possession and in absolute control of said lots. The respondents and their predecessors in interest having been in possession of the lots involved in this case, with improvements covering the entire lots, claiming them as their own and exercising acts of ownership over them, the principle of estoppel cannot be invoked against them because they have not been more aggressive, and brought suits against the city for the purpose of establishing their rights thereto.

A rehearing is denied.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

BETHANY HOSPITAL COMPANY

v.

NELLE K. HUBBARD PHILIPPI, Appt.

(82 Kan. 64, 107 Pac. 530.)

Jury — right to, in will contest.

1. An action by a devisee under a will conceded to be valid, to cancel and set aside a deed which the maker of the will was fraudulently procured to execute when he was of unsound mind, is equitable in character, and therefore neither party is entitled to a jury trial of the same as a matter of right.

Trial — submission to jury — effect.

2. The trial court, having called a jury to answer special questions of fact, was at liberty either to adopt the answers returned by the jury, or to ignore them and make findings of its own, based upon an independent consideration of the testimony.

Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

Action — by devisee under will — premature commencement.

3. Where the devisee of the will brought the action before the will was probated, and later, when it was probated, filed an amended and supplemental petition on which the cause of action was tried, the objection that the action was prematurely brought became immaterial.

Deed — execution by insane person — validity — cancellation — will — revocation — rights of devisee.

4. A deed executed by an insane person to one who has knowledge of the mental incapacity of the grantor, and who gives no substantial consideration for the property, is an absolute nullity, which does not operate to revoke a valid will previously made by the grantor, and a devisee under the will has sufficient interest to justify him in maintaining an action against the grantee to declare the deed to be void, although there has been no prior disaffirmance of the deed, or a tender back of the nominal consideration paid by the grantee.

Pleading — duplicity.

5. A petition alleging that the deed was void because of the mental weakness of the grantor and the undue influence exercised upon him while in that condition, and asking to have the deed adjudged to be void, states only a single cause of action.

Deed — validity — mental capacity of grantor — evidence — sufficiency.

6. The testimony examined, and held to be sufficient to uphold the finding of the trial court that the grantor was without mental capacity to execute the deed in question.

(March 12, 1910.)

Note. — Right of devisee or legatee to attack conveyance or transfer by testator.

The rule declared in the above case that a devisee has sufficient interest in the property devised to him to enable him to attack a transfer by his testator of the property devised, finds support in Rickman v. Meier, 213 Ill. 507, 72 N. E. 1121, in which a deed obtained by undue influence was set aside after the grantor's death at the suit of the residuary devisees under his will. The court declared the law to be: "That where a deed or other conveyance has been procured by undue influence, if it be not ratified by the party making it after the undue influence has ceased to operate, it may be set aside after his death at the suit of those who succeed to his rights."

And in Valpey v. Rea, 130 Mass. 384, it was held that a judgment creditor of a devisee whose testator had some time after the execution of his will conveyed the premises to the tenant could, upon the trial of a writ of entry for the land devised, show that the grantor was insane at the time he executed the deed. The court laid down the following rule of law: "The deed of an insane person is ineffectual to convey a title to land, good against the grantor, or APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Allen County quieting title to certain real property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. Littlefield, Campbell & Goshorn, William H. Clark, W. J. Costigan, and F. M. Harris for appellant.

Messrs. Ewing, Gard, & Gard with Messrs. W. S. Jenks, Nelson Case, and L. W. Keplinger for appellee.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the Bethany Hospital Company, to which certain property was devised by the will of Samuel B. Rohrbaugh, to declare a deed to be void and to enjoin the conveyance or encumbrance of the property by the defendant, Nelle K. Hubbard Philippi, who claimed the property under a deed alleged to be absolutely void and to have been fraudulently obtained. It appears that in March, 1903, Samuel B. Rohrbaugh executed a will which, among other devisees, gave the hospital company property in the city of Ottawa, known as the Boston Store Building, worth about $25,000, and it is conceded that the testator was of sound and disposing mind when the will was made. On February 22, 1907, about two months before Rohrbaugh died, he signed a deed which purported to convey the property in question to Nelle K. Hubbard Philippi. This conveyance is attacked by the hospital company on the ground that Rohrbaugh was of unsound mind at the time it was made, and further that defendant and others interested took advantage of the grantor's enfeebled mental condition and by undue influence obtained the execution of the deed. It appears that Rohrbaugh had been successfully engaged in the lumber business in Ottawa for about forty years, and until his death, in 1907. During that time he had acquired property worth about $150,000. In the last years of his life the active charge and detailed work of the business, including the payment of bills, the collection of accounts, and the signing of checks and contracts, was attended to by Charles H. Constant, who had a partnership interest in the lumber business. Since 1905, however, Samuel R. Hubbard, a nephew of Rohrbaugh and a brother of defendant, who also had an interest, assisted to some extent in the management of the business. In 1882 Rohrbaugh's wife died, when their son was four years old, and the boy made his home with Mrs. Hubbard, a sister of Mrs. Rohrbaugh, until his death about sixteen years later. Rohrbaugh against his heirs and devisees, unless it is confirmed by the grantor himself when of sound mind, or by his legally constituted guardian, or by his heirs or devisees."

And the language quoted from the case last cited was repeated in Brigham v. Fayerweather, 144 Mass. 48, 10 N. E. 735, and it was held that a devisee could maintain a bill in equity to set aside, upon the ground of mental incapacity, a mortgage executed by his testatrix to a creditor who practised no fraud.

And in Le Gendre v. Goodridge, 46 N. J. Eq. 419, 19 Atl. 543, it was held that though the executors under a will by which property was conveyed to them in trust for certain beneficiaries were proper parties to bring an action to set aside a deed of the testatrix conveying the property so devised, such beneficiaries had a right to bring the action without first asking the executors to bring it or notifying them that judicial relief was desired against the deed. The court said: "The complainants are the only persons who, as between the executors and themselves, have the least beneficial interest in the result of this suit. If the deed is set aside and the lands are recovered, they will go, it is true, to the executors, but not for their benefit, but for the benefit of the complainants. If a wrong exists, the complainants are the persons who are injured, and not the executors, so that it would seem to be undeniable that, unless it be true that a person may suffer a wrong without having a right to demand judicial redress in his own name against the wrongdoer, this action is properly brought."

And in Van Deusen v. Sweet, 51 N. Y. 378, an action of ejectment by a devisee against one claiming under a deed from the testator, and in which it was contended that if the plaintiff had any remedy based upon the alleged incompetency of the grantor to execute the deed, in the absence of fraud and before office found, it was by an equitable action to set aside the deed, the court declared that the deed of a "totally and positively incompetent" person was not merely voidable, but absolutely void, and never had any legal existence or vitality; that therefore there was nothing to be set aside by the interposition of a court of equity; and that the fact of its absolute nullity was available to overcome and avoid the defense set up under it to defeat plaintiff's claim. Chief Commissioner Lott, after arriving at this conclusion, said that he deemed it proper to add that he did not wish to be understood or to intimate that he had any doubt that it would have been competent for the plaintiff to have shown that the deed was voidable if that had been necessary to defeat the defendant's claim.

And in Goodyear v. Adams, 1 Silv. Sup. Ct. 185, 5 N. Y. Supp. 275, which was an action to foreclose a mortgage, it was held that the defendants, who claimed title to the mortgaged premises through a will from the mortgagor's grantor, could show the mental incapacity of the grantor when he executed his deed to the mortgagor.

boarded with the Hubbard family most of the time after the death of his wife, and it appears that he was greatly attached to Nelle K. Hubbard, generously contributing towards her education, and was greatly pleased with her progress. In the will mentioned Rohrbaugh gave defendant and the several members of the Hubbard family a number of pieces of real property, which together were worth approximately $55,000, and also considerable personal property. It appeared, too, that he was a member of the Methodist church, to which he had given liberally of his means, and he had made provisions for it and other Methodist institutions in his will. There is evidence tending to show that early in 1906, Rohrbaugh then being about seventy-six years of age and affected with rheumatism and other ailments, became weak of body and feeble of mind, and that his mental degeneration gradually increased until his death. On February 20, 1907, a proceeding to inquire into his mental condition and for the appointment of a guardian to take care of him and his estate was begun on the application of some of his neighbors who were members of his church. According to much of the testimony he did not comprehend the nature of the proceeding, and seemed to understand that he was under arrest, and was therefore very much angered at those who instituted it and greatly agitated because of it. A hearing of the application was had on February 26, 1907, but the jury failed to agree. While the proceeding was pending, and while Rohrbaugh was surrounded by the Hubbards and witnesses chosen by them and their attorney, he signed deeds prepared for him which on their faces conveyed to defendant and other members of the Hubbard family nearly his entire estate for a nominal consideration and his love and affection for the grantees. Shortly after the execution of the deeds and the hearing mentioned Mrs. Hubbard took him to Excelsior Springs, and there he rapidly grew weaker, and died on April 15, 1907. Before the will had been offered for probate, and on April 24, 1907, this action was begun. The will was probated on April 29, 1907, and on May 3, 1907, an amended and supplemental petition was filed, setting forth a copy of the will and the probate of the same, and under it the case was tried. The defendant answered, setting up her deed from Rohrbaugh, and asking that her title be quieted as against the plaintiff, and that it be barred from claiming any interest or estate in the property. The defendant demanded a jury trial as a matter of right, which was

In Bensell v. Chancellor, 5 Whart. 371, 34 Am. Dec. 561, an action of ejectment by devisees against one claiming under a deed from their testator, plaintiffs were held to be barred by the statute of limitations, but no question was raised, apparently, as to their right to maintain the action.

In Powell v. Powell, 30 Ala. 697, which was a contest of a will offered by the legatees therein and contested by the testator's distributees and next of kin, upon the ground, among others, that the testator had by deed conveyed the entire property devised and bequeathed by the instrument propounded, it was held that by statute an alteration of the estate devised or bequeathed did not per se revoke the will, but whatever interest remained in the testator passed by the will to his devisee or legatee, unless an intention to revoke expressly appeared. The court said: "Applying this rule to the case before us, we find that a substantial interest remained in the testator; either a large balance of unpaid purchase money, or, more likely, a right to vacate the deed . . . on account of fraud in its procurement." Accordingly, a demurrer was sustained to a plea setting forth the ground mentioned.

In Wolf v. Harris (Or.) 106 Pac. 1016, a deed of a deceased was set aside upon the ground that it was procured by fraud and undue influence, at the suit either of his heirs or devisees, probably the latter, since the court refers to a will that the deceased made after the execution of the deed. No 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) question appears to have been raised as to the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action.

An extensive search has disclosed no specific holding which throws any doubt upon the rule as established by the cases here reviewed, though in Hunt v. Weir, 4 Dana, 347, the court, in holding that a purchaser under a land contract seeking a rescission thereof on the ground that the title was derived through the mesne grantor, who was insane, must show that the conveyance had been set aside at the instance of those who had a right to avoid it, used the following language: "If the grantor were insane, still his deed passed the legal title, subject to be defeated not by the mere allegation and proof of the fact of insanity, by anyone who might feel an interest in overturning the deed; but, after the death of the grantor, only at the election of his heirs, made under circumstances which do not preclude them from setting it aside;" and in Hunt v. Rabitoay, 125 Mich. 137, 84 Am. St. Rep. 563, 84 N. W. 59, which was an action for partition where the complainants claimed title under a deed from the state as escheated land, the court denied their right to question a former deed of partition, one of the parties to which was an incompetent person, upon the ground that they were "neither privies in blood nor legal representatives" of such incompetent person, "and only these two classes can avoid the deed of an insane grantor."

denied. Some special questions, however, were submitted to a jury to aid the court, but that jury failed to agree, and another was called, to which issues of fact were referred, but the answers returned, which in the main were favorable to defendant, were not adopted by the court. Upon independent consideration of the evidence the court made findings of its own.

Although demanded by the appellant, she was not entitled to a jury trial. The action was equitable in its nature, brought to declare a deed void, and to remove a cloud upon the title which it is claimed passed to appellee under the provisions of the will. In connection with this relief an injunction against transferring or encumbering the property by the grantee in the deed was asked. The appellant in her answer recognized the equitable character of the proceeding, and asked to have her title quieted as against the claim of appellee. In such a case a jury may be called to answer special questions submitted to it, but the answers of the jury are not binding on the court. It may ignore them, and upon independent considerations make findings of its own, as the trial court did in this instance. Medill v. Snyder, 61 Kan. 15, 78 Am. St. Rep. 307, 58 Pac. 982. There is a contention, however, that appellee did not have such an interest in the property as warranted it in maintaining an action against appellant. It is first argued that the will was not probated when the original petition was filed, but this is accounted for in the averments of the pleading. The question is not a practical one, as the amended and supplemental petition was filed after the will had been probated, and besides the due execution of the will was not in controversy. The probating of the will furnishes evidence of an effective gift and the transfer of title, and the will when probated takes effect by relation from the time of the testator's death. It is earnestly argued that the deed, being valid on its face, and at most only voidable, operated to revoke the will, that if a fraud was committed on Rohrbaugh, he was the only party who could complain, and that one subsequently acquiring an interest in the property cannot set up the fraud of appellant in obtaining the conveyance. Rohrbaugh, it is said, was at liberty to forgive the wrong, and in any event his right to contest the validity of the deed was incapable of transfer to anyone. It is further contended that there was no disaffirmance by Rohrbaugh, or anyone in his behalf, although there was ample time for such action between the execution of the deed and his death, and that disaffirmance must precede the bringing of an action.

gift or devise is only a possibility, and, further, that a will only speaks from the time of the testator's death. It is also true that one who attacks a deed or other instrument of revocation must have a vested interest in the property. On the theory of appellee it had an interest when the action was brought. It contended, and the trial court found, that the deed was an absolute nullity. If Rohrbaugh had no capacity to execute a deed, no property was conveyed. If the instrument signed was an utter nullity, Rohrbaugh was the owner of the property, at the time of his death. If the title of the property was in Rohrbaugh when he died, it became subject to the provisions of the will and passed to the appellee. The theory of the appellee was not that the deed was merely voidable, but that it was utterly void, and hence the rules suggested by appellant are not applicable. If the deed did not transfer the title from Rohrbaugh, then appellee acquired the complete title to the property upon the death of Rohrbaugh, and also the right to bring an action to have the deed declared void. This question was raised and directly decided in Waller v. Julius, 68 Kan. 314, 74 Pac. 157. That was an action to cancel a deed made without consideration by one of unsound mind. Waller claimed title under an agreement with the grantor and her husband, to the effect that if she cared for them during their lives, the property would become hers. After the death of her husband the grantor conveyed the property to Julius. Waller brought the action, and it was argued that she had no interest and no standing to challenge the deed for fraud or want of consideration. The court met this claim by saying: "The action is not an attack upon a deed voidable for fraud and want of consideration, but an effort to clear the record of an apparent deed that is in fact no deed at all, because made by an insane grantor to a grantee who knew of her incapacity, and who gave nothing for it. True, it is said that as a general rule a deed made by a person of unsound mind, who has not been judicially declared insane, is not wholly void. . . . But this rule grows out of practical considerations and is for the benefit of innocent grantees for value. One who takes a deed, paying nothing for it, and knowing the grantor to be insane, is not within its reason, and is not protected by it. The caution with which this court has held that the deed of an insane person can ever be treated otherwise than as absolutely void confirms this." The case of Gribben v. Maxwell, 34 Kan. 8, 55 Am. Rep. 233, 7 Pac. 584, cited by appellant, belongs in an exceptional class of cases, and lays down the rule that one who in good faith purchases property from an insane person before there is an inquisition, without knowledge of the insanity, for a fair and reasonable consideration, no advantage being taken by the purchaser, does not lose everything, and the guardian of the insane person is not permitted to recover the land without returning the consideration. This rule is applied for the protection of an innocent party, and to prevent a representative of the insane person from obtaining and keeping the property, as well as the consideration honestly paid. Even in that case the court took pains to state the general rule to be that "the contract of a lunatic is void per se. The concurring assent of two minds is wanting. 'They who have no mind cannot "concur in mind" with one another, and, as this is the essence of a contract, they cannot enter into a contract,'"—citing Powell v. Powell, 18 Kan. 371, 26 Am. Rep. 774. Leavitt v. Files, 38 Kan. 26, 15 Pac. 891, belongs in the same class, and applies the rule that if a contract is entered into in good faith, and no advantage is taken of the person of unsound mind, it would be inequitable to allow him to recover the property and retain the price paid by the purchaser. Strictly speaking, a party dealing with a person non compos mentis does not recover on the contract itself, but, having dealt fairly with the person of unsound mind, and in ignorance of his incapacity, he is deemed to be entitled to that with which he has honestly parted, and is not required to surrender both the property and its price. The present case, however, does not come within any of these exceptions to the general rule. According to the averments and much of the evidence, no substantial consideration was paid. The conveyance was not obtained in good faith by the grantee. She had knowledge of the incapacity of the grantor. She did take advantage of his mental weakness, and by undue influence procured the execution of the deed. If these facts are established, the deed was absolutely void. Even if there had been good faith, there was no consideration to return, because, as we have seen, only a nominal consideration was paid. If the deed had no existence or force, it had no effect on the will which is admitted to be valid, and so it has been said that "if the deed is void or inoperative as a deed, it should not be allowed an incidental operation by way of revocation." [1 Redfield, Wills, 4th ed. p. 344]; Graham v. Burch, 47 Minn. 171, 28 Am. St. Rep. 339, 49 N. W. 697.

A formal disaffirmance was not a prerequisite step to the bringing of the action to get rid of the void conveyance. Disaffirmance by one without mental capacity would have been unavailing, and so far as appellee is concerned, it appears to have taken prompt action after the death of the testator and the passing of the property to it.

Error is assigned on the refusal of the court to require appellee to elect upon which cause of action it would rely. Appellant's theory appears to be that the petition sets out two causes of action; the first that the grantor of the deed was without mental capacity, and the second that the execution of the deed was procured by undue influence, and, further, that these are inconsistent claims. There was in fact but one cause of action,—one main object sought, and that was the getting rid of the void deed. Only one deed was involved, and it was alleged to be void because of the mental weakness of the grantor and the undue influence exercised upon him in his weak condition. These grounds may co-exist, and are not inconsistent in the sense that will prevent proof showing both. Each is a reason for adjudging the deed to be a nullity, and together they give but one right of relief and constitute but one cause of action. Washington Nat. Bank v. Woodrum, 60 Kan. 34, 55 Pac. 330; Howard v. Carter, 71 Kan. 85, 80 Pac. 61; Lattin v. McCarty, 41 N. Y. 107; Maxwell, Code Pl. 96.

Two objections to rulings on testimony are briefly presented, but neither of them are deemed to be material. It is said that Judge Smart, the executor of the will, was permitted to relate conversations with Rohrbaugh which occurred when the relation of attorney and client existed between them. We find no basis in the evidence for holding that such relation then existed. The other objection is the exclusion of the testimony of a physician called to treat Rohrbaugh at Excelsior Springs relating to his condition at that time. The doctor was asked, and not allowed to give his opinion, as to Rohrbaugh's sanity based on information outside of what he had obtained in a professional way. It would have been very difficult to have found a line between the professional and nonprofessional information of this witness, and it is very doubtful if any of the proposed testimony would have been competent. Each party produced a great volume of testimony relating to the mental condition of Rohrbaugh; and, even if any of the testimony of the doctor was other than confidential, or could have been brought within the region of competency, its exclusion can hardly be regarded as material error.

The remaining question as to the mental condition of Rohrbaugh when the deed was executed has been determined upon the testimony of those who were near to and associated with him in the last year of his life, as well as upon the evidence given by experts, who testified as to the mental disease with which he was afflicted. While there was a sharp conflict in the testimony on this question, there was a great deal of evidence of a convincing character tending to show incapacity. The findings of the trial court indicate the nature of his malady, and the stage to which it had progressed when the deed was signed. Among other things the court found:

"(11) That the mental malady with which said Samuel B. Rohrbaugh was afflicted seemed progressive in character, and grew worse, showing a gradual but sure impairment of the mental faculties, more especially those of memory, will power, concentration of thought, and judgment; such features and symptoms being manifested as early as February, 1900, and gradually growing worse until the same culminated in his death. He spent much of his time during the last months of his life sitting in his lumber-yard office; he would sit in a posture inclined forward, have a vacant expression on his face, and seemingly totally oblivious to surroundings; he would awake from such stupors, and would make attempts to transact business, but would immediately forget prices and quantities and qualities; this condition of mind, by September, 1906, manifested itself in his becoming unable to dress himself unaided; he became subject to delusions, at times imagining that burglars had been in his room at nights, and having conflicts with them; at times imagining seeing men and teams and other objects where none existed; on different occasions he became lost, and had to be assisted and guarded in going to and from his meals only a short distance, and along a route long and familiarly known to him for years before; on different occasions he wandered into the house or onto the premises of neighbors adjoining his boarding place; on one occasion during the month of November, 1906, he imagined he had been robbed, or there were burglars in his room, and opened his windows at night, making an outcry; soon after these demonstrations on the part of Samuel B. Rohrbaugh, Mrs. Ida Hubbard and her family took him, the said Samuel B. Rohrbaugh, to their home, where he continued to room until about February 1, 1907, when Mrs. Hubbard and her daughter, Nelle K. Hubbard, defendant, with Samuel B. Rohrbaugh, moved into the new residence above mentioned. So far as the evidence discloses, the husband of Mrs. Hubbard was home very little during the last year of Mr. Rohrbaugh's life. During the month of December, 1906, the acts and conduct, as before mentioned, of the said Samuel B. Rohrbaugh became so pronounced that the Hubbard family procured a man to come to their home at night to guard Samuel B. Rohrbaugh and care for him at night, and this person remained to wait upon the said Samuel B. Rohrbaugh by night for about two months, or until about the 20th of February, 1907; and during said period, to wit, during the two months preceding the 20th of February, 1907, said Samuel B. Rohrbaugh in his enfeebled and diseased condition of mind imagined he saw . . . imps and devils in his room. He became careless in the use of his tobacco, although formerly he had been clean, and was unable to wait upon himself in the toilet room without direction, mistaking the bath tub for a urinal. However, the evidence fails to disclose that he was violent, but was easily persuaded and tractable with those with whom he was acquainted. That for two or three months prior to the date of the execution of the deed in controversy in this action, the mental condition of the said Samuel B. Rohrbaugh became such that on different occasions he was unable to recognize property belonging to himself upon which he had erected costly improvements, denying that it belonged to him, on one occasion pointing out his own lumber yard as that of a rival in business; and, though having been familiar with the fact of the death of an associate and friend of years gone by, he made inquiries concerning the health of the deceased. Having received payment of a claim in litigation, he made inquiry of the attorney on the next day after such payment as to the progress of the case; seemed to lose power of location of places familiar to him, mistaking the day of the week and the hour of the day. Though Samuel B. Rohrbaugh had large experience in building, and was thoroughly conversant with the prices of lumber and the cost of building, yet at the time the building referred to in finding number 10 was just about completed, he had no knowledge as to the cost of the building, and supposed it to be only about $5,000, although, as before stated, it cost about $17,000, and, also, while he had personal knowledge that stone was contracted for to the amount of $1,000 for certain portions of the work in part of the house, and after considerable part of the stones had been actually used in the building, and the greater part of the remainder was on the ground, he was entirely ignorant or forgetful of the fact, and insisted on getting wood for the same purpose."

In other findings the court stated:

"(22) That upon the day on which the deed in controversy as well as the other deeds were executed, to wit, February 22, 1907, Samuel B. Rohrbaugh was suffering from such physical and mental weakness as to be unable to dress himself properly without assistance, and it would have been unsafe and unwise to permit him to go to the closet or out upon the streets without an attendant; that his memory and mental powers were so impaired and weakened as to incapacitate him from remembering his prior wills or the provisions thereof; that he was mentally incapable of concentrating his attention upon such matters, or his relations to the interests provided for in said will, or his relations thereto, or acting with intelligence with regard to the matters therein contained; that he, the said Samuel B. Rohrbaugh, was not on said day of sound mind and memory."

"(17) That on the day succeeding that of the execution of the deed to defendant the said Samuel B. Rohrbaugh, leaving the house unattended, became lost on the streets of Ottawa, Kansas, and was brought back by parties who, together with the Hubbard family, were in search of him, and on the third and fourth day after the execution of the deeds the said Rohrbaugh pointed out an imaginary one-legged chicken, which he thought he saw running in the parlor in which he was seated, and also referred to an imaginary packing house in the city of Ottawa, Kansas, where he then was, and stated that he used to work there thirty-five years ago, although in fact there was no packing house there, and the only time and place he ever worked in any packing house was in Springfield, Illinois, forty years ago."

While the credibility of the witnesses and the probative force of their testimony were questions for the trial court, and while its findings based on competent testimony are binding on this court, a reading of the testimony as written in the record satisfies us that it not only supports, but that it abundantly sustains, the finding of incapacity. That being established, the deed in question is a nullity, regardless of whether undue influence was exercised upon the grantor by anyone, and hence the judgment of the District Court must be affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except Benson, J., who did not sit.
30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

CHARLES A. TANNER, Appt.,

v.

ADELAIDE STEVENSON.

(138 Ky. 578, 128 S. W. 878.)

Libel — school superintendent — applicant's license.

1. A county superintendent of schools is not absolutely privileged in requesting the state board of examiners to refuse a teacher's license because of lack of good moral character of the applicant.

Same — malicious attack on character.

2. A county school superintendent who, from malicious motives, attacks the character of an applicant for a state license to teach school, by making false charges of immoral character against him, is guilty of libel.

Trial — libel — privilege — jury.

3. When a petition for damages for libel is sufficient, and there is evidence of malice in fact in making the publication, the question whether or not the defense of qualified privilege has been made out is for the jury.

Libel — privilege — actual malice — burden of proof.

4. Plaintiff must show actual malice to recover in a libel case where the defendant is entitled to a qualified privilege.

Evidence — libel — burden of proof — privilege.

5. The burden of showing the falsity of the publication is not placed on plaintiff by a plea of privilege in an action for libel in attacking plaintiff's moral character.

Note. — Libel and slander: privilege of school superintendent or other officer in reporting to school authorities upon character of teacher.

The rule as laid down in TANNER v. STEVENSON, that a report of a school superintendent or other official to the school authorities in regard to the character of a teacher is not absolutely privileged, is apparently well established, but in none of the cases is there much of any discussion of the question. Rausch v. Anderson, 75 Ill. App. 520; Henry v. Moberly, 6 Ind. App. 490, 33 N. E. 981, second appeal, 23 Ind. App. 305, 51 N. E. 497.

The question was raised but not decided in Finley v. Steele, 159 Mo. 299, 52 L.R.A. 852, 60 S. W. 108.

A suggestion of a contrary rule is found in Hemmens v. Nelson, 138 N. Y. 517, 20 L.R.A. 440, 34 N. E. 342, where the court, in speaking of a report by the principal of a deaf mute institute, to the executive committee thereof, in respect to a teacher's character, says: "The courts have refused to extend the class of cases where absolute privilege applies, and I shall assume it APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clark County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pendleton, Bush & Bush, J. Smith Hays, and T. B. McGregor for appellant.

Messrs. J. M. Stevenson and F. H. Haggard for appellee.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for libel growing out of a letter concerning the appellee, Adelaide Stevenson, written by the appellant, Tanner, while superintendent of common schools in Clark county, to J. H. Fuqua, state superintendent of public instruction. Miss Stevenson, who had been teaching in the common schools of Clark county for several years, was examined in June, 1907, as required by law, for the purpose of obtaining a certificate that would enable her to continue teaching in the public schools. At the time of her examination, the appellant, Tanner, was county superintendent of common schools, and, in connection with two competent persons, constituted a county board who examined applicants for certificates. This board had authority to refuse a certificate to any applicant who did not pass a satisfactory examination, or who did not have a good moral character. There was also a state board of examiners, of which the state superintendent of public instruction was chairman, and this board had the authority to examine applicants for teachers' certificates, and to grant or refuse them for the same reasons that the county board did.

It is charged in substance in the petition that Miss Stevenson, having presented herself before the state board of examiners as an applicant for a state teacher's certificate, passed an examination that entitled her to a certificate, but that, before the certificate was issued, Tanner maliciously, and with the intention of injuring her, and to prevent her from getting a certificate from the state board, composed and sent to Fuqua, superintendent of public instruction, the following false and scandalous letter: "You know that J. H. Thomas, with Miss Stevenson, recently stood the examination in Frankfort. In July Miss Stevenson failed in her examination here. As to Miss Stevenson, I have heard from E. L. Butler, trustee of district No. 16, in this county, where she once taught, and G. W. Lee and L. C. Cockrill and J. I. Glover, trustees in district No. 46, in this county, and J. E. Lanter and D. M. Tanner and others whom I have not talked to recently, that she was not of a good moral character. I know nothing except what I have been told by these gentlemen as to whether this is true or not; but some of these gentlemen have volunteered this infor-does not apply to this case, though it would perhaps be difficult to make a satisfactory distinction, founded upon principle, between the case of defamatory words in a petition to a legislative body or committee, or the reports of military officers, and the character of the charge in this case, and the circumstances under which it was made."

But the reports of superintendents and other officers to the school authorities in respect to the character of teachers are generally held to be qualifiedly privileged, especially when the making of the report is in the line of the officer's duty, so that such reports, although injurious and false, are not actionable in the absence of express malice. These cases may be considered as indirect authority for the proposition that such reports are not absolutely privileged.

Thus, in Finley v. Steele, supra, it was held that members of the school board would not, in the absence of anything to show actual malice, be guilty of libel in sending a request for the revocation of a teacher's license to the school commissioner, who had statutory authority to revoke the license upon certain specified grounds, although they did not, in preferring the charges, follow the exact words of the statute, where the charges were made in the discharge of their duty, after complaint by parents, and in response to a communication from the commissioner.

So, statements by the principal of a deaf mute institute, who was really its executive head and manager, charged with the duty carefully to observe the moral conduct of teachers as well as scholars, made to the executive committee and president of the board of trustees, which had a corresponding duty in respect to the welfare of the institution, to the effect that the superintendent of one of the departments and a teacher therein had sent to his wife an obscene publication, were held in Hemmens v. Nelson, supra, to be confidential and privileged if believed by him to be true, and not actionable unless express malice or malice in fact was shown on his part.

And the report of the principal of a school to the city superintendent, that one of his teachers was "careless in regard to blackboard work," is privileged, and, in the absence of all evidence of express malice, is not actionable. Walker v. Best, 107 App. Div. 304, 95 N. Y. Supp. 151.

So, statements made in the report of a school superintendent to the board of school visitors, concerning a teacher in the school, are privileged, so that he is protected, if he honestly believed the statements to be true, and he need not have had "good reason" or "reasonable grounds" for believing them to be true. Barry v. McCollom, 81 Conn. 293, 129 Am. St. Rep. 215, 70 Atl. 1035.

In Henry v. Moberly, 6 Ind. App. 490, 33 N. E. 981, a communication in respect to mation, and have said they would testify to the same if called upon at any time. In view of these facts, both as to Mr. Thomas and Miss Stevenson, I do not think a certificate should be issued to either of them, but of course I submit the matter to your judgment." In his answer, Tanner pleaded in substance that, at the time he wrote the letter, Miss Stevenson was a resident of Clark county, and he believed that she intended, if she received the state certificate, to teach in the common schools of Clark county; that he was the duly elected and acting superintendent of common schools in that county, and had received the information as to her character contained in the letter, and believed it to be true; that the letter, which was mailed directly to the state superintendent of public instruction, was written in good faith, in the discharge of his duties as county superintendent, and without any wicked or malicious intent to injure Miss Stevenson in her good name, or otherwise or to bring her into public scandal or disgrace, and with no other purpose than to acquaint the state superintendent with the information therein set out, and submit the matter for his consideration. He further pleaded that, in stating in the letter that he had heard from the parties named that the plaintiff was not of good moral character, he intended, and said letter meant simply, that this was her reputation, and what he had heard as to her reputation referred and related to her conduct with the character of an applicant for teacher, made by a school trustee to the other members of the board of trustees, which board was charged with the duty of hiring teachers, was held to be qualifiedly privileged, and a complaint in an action for libel, based on such a communication, which fails to allege actual or express malice on the part of the trustee in publishing it, is demurrable. When the case came before the court again on an amended petition (23 Ind. App. 305, 51 N. E. 497), it was held that, the communication being qualifiedly privileged, the burden was upon the plaintiff to show malice. (See on the latter point, note to Denver Public Warehouse Co. v. Halloway, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 696.)

And acts of a board of school trustees in gathering evidence of dereliction on the part of a school principal, and presenting it to the tribunal having authority to discipline such principal, are in the line of public duties and consequently privileged. Galligan v. Kelly, 64 N. Y. S. R. 197, 31 N. Y. Supp. 561. The argument of the court is apparently directed against the contention that no privilege whatever attached to the communications of the trustees, so that, although the language of the court would appear to be broad enough to imply that such communications were absolutely privileged, yet it is not probable that the court intend-men; and that he intended to and did state that her reputation in Clark county for moral character was not good. He further charged that at the time he wrote the letter Miss Stevenson did not have in that county a good reputation for morality in her conduct with men. Upon a trial before a jury, a verdict was returned in favor of appellee, assessing the damages at $5,000. The judgment upon this verdict we are asked to reverse for errors committed in failing to properly instruct the jury.

Before coming to the legal questions involved, and to better understand the respective contentions of counsel concerning them, it will be appropriate to state briefly what the evidence conduced to show. The appellee, at the time she was examined in 1907 by the county board of Clark county, had a third-class certificate, and under the authority of this certificate and previous like certificates had been teaching in the common schools of Clark county and at different places for a number of years. A day or so after submitting to the examination, but before receiving any certificate, she learned that she had received a second-class certificate. Being of the opinion that she was entitled to a first-class certificate, she asked superintendent Tanner to tell her in what subjects of her examination she had failed to pass, and requested permission to look over her examination papers. In reply to this request, Tanner told her in substance ed so to decide, for later in the opinion it is said that "the charges were certainly made with probable cause to believe them to be true," which fact would, of course, be immaterial if the communications were absolutely privileged.

In Rausch v. Anderson, 75 Ill. App. 526, the court said, obiter, that a school superintendent had the right, in good faith, and for justifiable motives, to communicate to the school board his reasons for revoking a teacher's certificate, and that such a communication would be at least conditionally privileged.

It is to be noted in TANNER v. STEVENSON that the court, after holding that a communication of a school superintendent to the school authorities was not absolutely privileged, shows that, as a matter of fact, the report was not made in the line of any duty imposed upon the superintendent, so that he was in the same position as a private citizen. Upon this point the case is distinguishable from the cases cited above, and is similar to the cases gathered in a note upon Privileged character of complaints to public officer against subordinate, attached to Jozsa v. Moroney, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1041.

As to official report by executive or administrative officer as privileged communication, see note to De Arnaud v. Ainsworth, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 163. W. M. G.

that she could either take the certificate that had been issued to her, but not yet delivered, or stand a re-examination. The result of interviews between herself and Tanner was that she did not accept or receive the second-class certificate, and Tanner indorsed on his records that she had been re-examined and a certificate refused. Shortly after the matter was thus ended, she made application to the state board of examiners, of which J. H. Fuqua, as state superintendent of schools was chairman, and there passed an examination entitling her to what is known as a "state certificate;" but before this certificate was delivered, the superintendent of public instruction had received from Tanner the letter before mentioned, and held up the certificate. There was also evidence to the effect that, although Miss Stevenson had not really stood an examination that entitled her to a second-class certificate, the examiners, including Tanner, had agreed to issue her one, but that before the certificate was delivered, Tanner learned from reputable gentlemen living in school districts in which the appellee had taught, that she was not of good moral character, and was induced by this information to decline to deliver the certificate. In respect to the reputation of appellee for morality, there was evidence tending to prove that it was good, and also evidence conducing to show that it was bad. To make a long story short, so far as the voluminous facts contained in the record are concerned, it is the contention of appellee, supported by some evidence, that Tanner took offense because she requested the privilege of looking at her examination papers, and for this reason he refused to deliver to her the certificate that the board of examiners had agreed to issue. And that, becoming more aggravated when he learned that she had passed a satisfactory examination before the state board, he attempted to prevent her from getting a state certificate by writing the letter to Fuqua, and was prompted to write this letter by malice and ill will towards her. On the other hand, Tanner insists that in writing the Fuqua letter he was actuated solely by a sense of duty to the public schools, of which he was an official, and did not entertain towards Miss Stevenson any ill feeling, hatred, or malice, and in this position he is sustained by some evidence.

The first and most important legal question to be considered is: Did the Fuqua letter come within the scope of what is known in law as an "absolutely privileged communication?" If it did, then the court should have directed a verdict for Tanner notwithstanding the evidence of his malice, hatred, or ill will towards Miss Stevenson, and without any regard to the motives that induced him to write the letter. If it was protected by this high privilege, it is of no account whether his motives were good or bad, or whether the matter contained in the letter was true or false. Nor could any inquiry be made into the state of feeling existing between the parties,—it was all the same whether they were the best of friends or the bitterest of enemies.

In support of the proposition that the letter was absolutely privileged, the argument is made that Tanner, at the time he wrote it, was superintendent of common schools in Clark county, and as such superintendent was charged in an especial manner with the duty of protecting the schools from the bad influence of teachers who did not possess a good moral character, and so it was his privilege and right to place Fuqua, as superintendent of public instruction, in possession of the information he had concerning the moral character of Miss Stevenson. But in our opinion the law of absolute privilege cannot be invoked to protect Tanner from the consequences of this letter. The cases to which this privilege applies are few in number and ought not to be enlarged. It would be a dangerous and vicious thing to license people to write and speak without any restraint. There are many evil-minded and recklessly disposed who would shelter if they could under the protection afforded by absolute privilege, and give free bridle to tongue and pen to injure or destroy an enemy. It would place in the power of revengeful and unscrupulous persons the right to malign at will those who had incurred their displeasure, and allow the traducer to scatter without stint scandalous and defamatory matter about all who might come within the circle of his enmity. The law holds good character in high esteem, and has made it a serious offense to wantonly assault it; but there are a few instances in which the interest of the public is esteemed more important than that of the individual, and occasions in which private rights must yield to public good. In these cases there is no penalty attached to malice or falsehood. The utmost liberty is deemed allowable, and communications that under other circumstances would be actionable are treated as permissible. But the cases to which this immunity from liability applies are confined to judicial and legislative proceedings, matters involving military affairs, and communications made in the discharge of a duty under express authority of law, by or to heads of executive departments of the state. A full discussion of the principles upon which this doctrine rests, and the persons to whom it applies, may be found in Cooley on Torts, p. 210; Townshend on Slander & Libel, § 208; Newell on Slander & Libel, p.

388; 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 375; and 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1023; as well as in Morgan v. Booth, 13 Bush, 480; Gaines v. Aetna Ins. Co. 104 Ky. 695, 47 S. W. 884; Beiser v. Scripps-McRae Pub. Co. 113 Ky. 383, 68 S. W. 457; Yancey v. Com. 135 Ky. 207, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 455, 122 S. W. 123; Spalding v. Vilas, 101 U. S. 483, 40 L. ed. 780, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631.

Not being protected by the rule of absolute privilege, we will now proceed to consider the attitude Tanner occupied in writing this letter, and the limitations that surrounded him. He did not write in obedience to any statute, for there was no statute imposing upon superintendents of county schools the duty of bringing to the notice of the state superintendent facts affecting the moral character of applicants for teachers' certificates. In respect to school affairs outside of Clark county, Tanner, as superintendent, did not occupy, in writing this letter, any better position than any other good citizen of the state, interested in the welfare of the common-school system, would occupy. Tanner's official duties were limited to Clark county. Outside of that county he had no more connection with the common schools than did any other citizen of Clark county. He had the right, and it was his duty, as superintendent of common schools of that county, to carefully look after the educational as well as the moral and personal qualifications of persons who taught school in that county, or who applied to the board of which he was a member for certificates to teach school. But the letter written to Fuqua had no more connection or reference to the schools in Clark county than it did to the schools of any other county in the state. Tanner, as superintendent of common schools, had as much right and liberty to write a letter to the state superintendent about an applicant for a teacher's certificate who resided in any other county as he did about one who resided in that county. The application of Miss Stevenson to the state board did not concern the schools of Clark county any more than it did the schools of any other county in the state. When he refused her the certificate, that ended his connection in an official capacity with Miss Stevenson, unless she again applied to him for a certificate, or sought to teach school in Clark county. Ifaving this view of this feature of the case, we will treat the letter without reference to Tanner's official position, and it is therefore not pertinent to the matter before us to consider with more particularity what the privilege of Tanner as superintendent would be in conducting an inquiry into, or making a statement concerning, the character of a teacher in Clark county, or an applicant for 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) a certificate before the board of that county, or to consider the protection afforded by the provisions of the statute relative to the powers and duties of Tanner as superintendent in inquiring into the moral character of applicants for certificates, and his right to refuse a certificate to any applicant not of exceptionally high moral character.

Considering the case, then, from the standpoint that Tanner was acting merely in his capacity as a good citizen, interested in the welfare of the public schools of the state, let us see what his rights and privileges were. Upon this point we are of the opinion that he or any other good citizen of the state, who has knowledge affecting the moral character of an applicant for a teacher's certificate, may in good faith, based upon reasonable information, communicate what he knows to the person or board to whom the application is made, or convey it to trustees who contemplate employing the person in the public schools, and in so doing he will be protected unless it can be shown that he was actuated by express malice. This privilege finds ample support in the conviction that it is of the highest importance to the youth of the state, who attend the public schools, that their teachers shall be persons of good moral character. A person not of good moral character, holding the close and confidential relations to children that teachers do, has opportunities without number to poison the mind of the child at its most impressionable age, and make a lasting influence for evil upon those put under their care. Outside of the home there is no person who has so much to do with inculcating in young minds sentiments of virtue and honor as the teacher. The state is deeply interested in the moral training and education of all her children, and is vitally concerned that they shall be brought up under clean and good influences, so that they will grow into men and women with pure ideals and high aspirations. In the welfare and usefulness of the common-school system every citizen of the state should be personally interested. Whatever hurts the system in one place in the state injures it in a more or less degree in all other parts of the state. It is a piece of machinery in which every individual in the state is a part. In its larger and broader sense, the state is the unit, as the doors of every public school-house in the state stand wide open, and every child in the commonwealth is an invited guest. Any child within school years has the right to attend the public schools wherever he may be, and he is not limited to the place of his actual residence or domicile, or to his district or county. And so any good citizen, in good faith, and upon reasonable grounds to believe that what he writes or speaks is true, if free from malice or ill will, and actuated solely by his interest in the common schools, may safely bring to the notice of those who hold any place as officials in the system any information that will enable them to perform with more efficiency their duties; and he will be protected as coming within the scope of qualified privilege, although the communication may be false as well as prima facie libelous. But if the person making the publication is prompted by actual malice or ill will towards the person concerning whom it is written or spoken, then the fact that it was believed to be true, or the fact that it was made in good faith, or the fact that it was made under circumstances that, except for this malice, would make it privileged, will not be allowed to save the person making the publication from the consequences of his act. When a person from malicious motives makes an attack upon the character of another, he puts himself beyond the protection that qualified privilege affords. Newell, Slander & Libel, p. 475; Cooley, Torts, p. 214; Townshend, Slander & Libel, § 208; Ranson v. West, 125 Ky. 457, 101 S. W. 885; Caldwell v. Story, 107 Ky. 10, 45 L.R.A. 735, 52 S. W. 850; Nix v. Caldwell, 81 Ky. 203, 50 Am. Rep. 163; Sharp v. Bowlar, 103 Ky. 282, 45 S. W. 90; Stewart v. Hall, 83 Ky. 375; Edwards v. Kevil, 133 Ky. 392, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 551, 134 Am. St. Rep. 463, 118 S. W. 273; Finley v. Steele, 150 Mo. 299, 52 L.R.A. 852, 60 S. W. 108.

But the plea of qualified privilege, as argued by counsel, does not present a question of law for the court. Of course, upon the pleadings, as well as upon the evidence, the court may rule in these as well as other actions, that the plaintiff has failed to make out his case, or that the pleadings are not sufficient; but when the petition is sufficient, and there is any evidence of actual malice or malice in fact, the case should go to the jury. The only difference between cases where qualified privilege is relied on and cases where the defense is a general denial or justification is that where privilege is pleaded, the burden of showing actual malice is put upon the plaintiff. In other cases, if the actionable matter is per se libelous, the law will presume malice, and consequently it is not necessary to a recovery that the plaintiff should show actual malice in its publication. In other words, the circumstances under which the publication was made, if it is privileged, rebut the inference of malice that, under ordinary conditions, would arise from such a publication. As under this rule the burden of showing actual malice was placed upon the plaintiff, it was of course necessary that she should introduce some evidence tending to show that the publication was induced by malicious motives, and this we think she sufficiently did to justify the court in letting the case go to the jury.

Nor was it necessary that the plaintiff should, in the first instance, introduce evidence to show the falsity of the publication complained of. The law presumes that every person has a good character, and this presumption is not overcome by the plea that the publication was privileged. This plea only rebuts the presumption of malice. It does not refute the presumption of falsity. In Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. 2, § 419, it is said: "In ordinary cases, under the general issue the plaintiff will not be permitted to prove the falsity of the charges made by the defendant, either to show malice or to enhance the damages; for his innocence is presumed, unless the defendant seeks to protect himself under color of the circumstances and occasion of writing or speaking the words, in which case it seems that evidence that the charge was false, and that the defendant knew it to be so, is admissible to rebut the defense." To the same effect is McIntyre v. Bransford, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 454, 17 S. W. 359. In this case, Tanner made two defenses: First, that the publication was privileged; and, second, that it was true. To avoid the first defense the plaintiff had only to prove that the publication was actuated by express malice. If it was, the privilege pleaded did not justify it, nor did the fact that Tanner was acting in good faith or upon reasonable information protect him. In other words, if Tanner was influenced by malice or ill will towards Miss Stevenson in writing the letter, he was guilty of actionable libel unless the publication was true. So that, on the part of the plaintiff, it was only necessary, in order to take the case to the jury and sustain a verdict, to prove actual malice or malice in fact; and on the part of Tanner, to defeat a recovery, it was essential that he should establish either that the publication was true, or that it was made without malice, and upon information that he believed to be true. This view of the law applicable to the case was given to the jury in the following instructions:

"No. 1. If the jury believe from the evidence that, in writing the letter of September 2, 1907, to J. H. Fuqua, and in imparting to said Fuqua by said letter the information therein contained with reference to the moral character of the plaintiff, the defendant was prompted by actual malice, that is, actual ill will or hatred on the part of the defendant toward plaintiff, or a reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights by the defendant, the jury should, unless they believe as stated in the third instruction, find for the plaintiff, and fix the damages according to the fifth instruction.

"No. 2. If the jury believe from the evidence that, at the time the defendant wrote the letter mentioned in the first instruction, the defendant had received from sources which he believed to be reliable the information contained in said letter with reference to the moral character of the plaintiff, and if they believe from the evidence that, at the time the defendant wrote said letter and imparted by it the information therein contained with reference to the plaintiff's moral character, he believed that the statement contained in said letter with reference to her moral character was true; and if they further believe from the evidence that, in writing said letter, and imparting to Fuqua the information therein contained with reference to the plaintiff's moral character, the defendant was prompted by a desire to protect the public schools of the county or state, the jury should find for the defendant, unless they believe as stated in the first instruction.

"No. 3. If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant meant to state in the letter mentioned in the first instruction that the plaintiff's reputation in Clark county for moral character was not good, and if they further believe from the evidence that, at the time said letter was written, it was true that the plaintiff's reputation in Clark county was that of being immoral in her conduct with men, the jury should find for the defendant.

"No. 4. 'Reputation,' as used in the third instruction, means the estimate which the community has of the person's character, while 'moral character' related to what a man or a woman actually is morally.

"No. 5. If the jury find for the plaintiff, they should fix the damage at such a sum as they may believe from the evidence will fairly and reasonably compensate the plaintiff for the injury, if any, that the jury may believe from the evidence resulted to the plaintiff's business or profession of teacher, and to her reputation and character, by reason of the writing in the letter mentioned in the first instruction of the statements therein contained with reference to the moral character of the plaintiff, and for any humiliation and mental distress suffered by plaintiff by reason of same; and, if the jury find for the plaintiff, they may, in their discretion, allow her, in addition to the compensatory damages above defined, such further sum by way of punitive damages as the jury may deem proper under all the circumstances introduced in evidence; but, if any damages are allowed the plaintiff, the total should not 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) exceed $20,000, the amount claimed by the plaintiff in the petition."

Perceiving no error in the judgment, it is affirmed.

v.

PEOPLE'S BANK.

RE PEOPLE'S BANK.

(125 La. 770, 51 So. 843.)

Bank — check — payment on other than agreed signature.

The signature upon which the depositor is to be bound and the bank is to disburse his money may be whatever they agree on, and where the signature, entered upon the signature book, reads, "John Doe, per R. R.," all in the handwriting of Richard Roe, that is the signature and the writing which the bank should exact. And so, where a particular form of private check is prepared, having the name "John Doe" printed, and the word "per" printed below, followed by a blank space or line, and it is agreed that the signature "Richard Roe" following the word "per" shall be good for the drawing of the money deposited to the credit of John Doe, the bank should require a check in that form and so signed, and a check, the whole body of which and the name of John Doe is written by a hand other than that of Richard Roe will not protect it with regard to the payment of the money of the depositor, where it turns out that the signature of Richard Roe was written by him on a blank piece of paper for another purpose, and that the balance of the instrument was written by someone else without authority, and with intent to defraud.

Headnote by MONROE, J.

Note. — Payment by bank of check signed by authorized person in different form than that agreed upon.

The peculiarity of POLIZZOTTO v. PEOPLE'S BANK lies in the fact that the bank was concededly authorized to pay checks against the firm's account upon the signature of the member who signed his name to the paper subsequently presented as a check, and the question was, therefore, not as to the authority of the signer, but as to the effect of the departure from the stipulated form. The case is, therefore, quite different from the numerous class of cases like Ellis v. Western Nat. Bank, 136 Ky. 310, 124 S. W. 334, involving the right of a bank to pay a check against a corporation's account upon the signature of the president alone, where it had agreed that checks should only be Monroe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

V. Polizzotto, a commercial firm composed of Vincent, Sam, and Frank Polizzotto, obtained judgment against the defendant bank for $571.11, on the ground that the bank had charged their deposit account with that amount without authority; the facts disclosed upon the trial of the case being as follows: About November 24, 1908, a man representing himself to be the agent and solicitor of the Florence Distilling Company (said to have been an Eastern, but as it turned out a fictitious, concern), called at the store of V. Polizzotto, in Plaquemine, and obtained from Sam Polizzotto the firm's order for an invoice of liquors, which he appeared to be selling at a low price. He then asked Sam Polizzotto to give him some references, and he was given the names of several merchants, of the Iberville Bank & Trust Company, and of the People's Bank. He then asked which of the banks V. Polizzotto did business with, and having been given that information and having written the names of the references on a piece or sheet of writing paper, with the name "People's Bank" below the others, and having also been informed that Sam Polizzotto signed the checks of the firm, some of which (canceled) were exhibited to him, he requested Sam Polizzotto to put his signature on the paper, at a place indicated by him, and which was about the width of, say, four lines below the name "People's Bank" already written by himself, which request Polizzotto complied with, writing his name, "S. Polizzotto." On December 6th following, there came to the People's Bank for payment through the mail, in the usual course of business, from the German Insurance Bank, a reputable bank in Louisville, Kentucky, a check, bearing the signature "V. Polizzotto, by S. Polizzotto," the "S. Polizzotto" being underneath the "V. Polizzotto," and being the same that had been placed there by Sam Polizzotto, on November 24th. The check was payable to the order of the "Florence Distilling Co.," and appeared to bear the indorsements of that concern, of the Stitzel Distilling Company, and of the German Insurance Bank. It was wholly in writing and was dated "Plaquemine, La., November 24, 1908." It arrived on Sunday, and was received by an officer of the bank whose attention was attracted by its unusual appearance, and on the following day (Monday, December 7th) he and the cashier and the president consulted about it, and the cashier tried to reach Sam Polizzotto by telephone, but calling up the store and being told that Sam Polizzotto was absent or busy (he was unable to remember which) he, or they, compared the signature on the check in question with the signature of the firm of V. Polizzotto on the signature book and on other checks, and concluded that it was good and that no further inquiry was necessary. He (the cashier) accordingly (on December 7th) mailed to the German Insurance Bank a draft on New York for $571.11, which draft was presented and paid on December 12th. In the paid when signed by the president and countersigned by another officer.

Although no direct authority has been found it would seem that there can be little question as to the soundness of the decision in POLIZZOTTO v. PEOPLE'S BANK, holding that a bank is not protected where payment is made on a check drawn in a form other than that agreed upon, although it is signed by the person authorized to check upon the deposit.

A depositor clearly has a right to designate the particular form of signature upon which the bank shall be authorized to make payments. Numerous reasons, some it may be solely within the knowledge of the depositor, can be advanced why a depositor should wish to adopt a particular form of signature. The case of POLIZZOTTO v. PEOPLE'S BANK furnished an excellent example of the protection which such a signature affords against fraud. Had the bank officials in this instance used the degree of care which 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

their good judgment first suggested, and communicated with the drawer of the check, no payment would have been made, and consequently no loss would have resulted either to the bank or the depositor. A person having a large amount on deposit, and wishing to interpose an additional safeguard against duress in forcing him to sign a check, might prudently agree with the bank that no check bearing his signature should be paid unless, for example, a blot or other mark appeared at a given place on or after the signature. Under such an agreement the blot or mark would become a material part of the signature, and the bank would clearly have no authority to pay checks upon which the agreed mark did not appear. Of course, if the person who signs the paper intends it to be paid as a check, and receives the benefit of it, although the form agreed upon is not followed, a different question is presented. J. T. W.

meanwhile—that is to say, on the day that the draft was mailed—Sam Polizzotto called at the bank and made a deposit, and he says he had a conversation with the cashier (which, however, the cashier does not remember), but that nothing was said to him about the check which is now in dispute. On December 12th (the day upon which the draft on New York was paid), the account of V. Polizzotto with the defendant bank was balanced, and the canceled checks returned, and, on the evening, or night, of December 15th, the bookkeeper of the firm (who worked for it only at intervals) noticed the check in question, thought there must be something out of the way about it, and asked Sam Polizzotto for information, and he was told that he (Polizzotto) had never issued any such check. The cashier of the bank was then called up out of bed and interviewed, and next morning he endeavored to stop payment of the draft, which had, however, been paid. It appears from the evidence that the firm of V. Polizzotto had been doing business with defendant for a number of years; that the firm account had always been kept in the firm name, but that no member of the firm had ever signed its checks except Sam Polizzotto; that up to, say, the fall of 1907, the firm checks had been drawn on the ordinary printed forms which are in common use, and signed “V. Polizzotto, per S. P.” (the whole of it being written by Sam Polizzotto). At the period mentioned (say the fall of 1907), the firm had a form of check printed, with their business card on the upper left-hand corner, and the name “V. Polizzotto” printed in the place for the signature, and with the word “per” followed by a blank line printed underneath it, and Sam Polizzotto called upon defendant’s cashier and showing him the form told him that, on those checks, he would write, after the word “per,” on the line left blank for that purpose, his signature, “S. Polizzotto,” in full, but that the old form of check, when used, would be signed as before; so that there were to be two signatures, to wit, the wholly written “V. Polizzotto, per S. P.” on the old checks, and partly printed and partly written “V. Polizzotto, per S. Polizzotto,” on the new checks, and the bank had no other signatures on which it was authorized to make any payments for the firm. It seems, however, that on July 13, 1900, S. Polizzotto had opened a small private account with the bank, which was closed on July 7, 1903, and for the purposes of which he gave the bank his signature, “S. Polizzotto,” and it is now contended that the signature “S. Polizzotto” is good so far as the bank and the firm of V. Polizzotto are concerned, for the purposes of the check in 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) dispute. In fact, the cashier of the defendant seems to hold that the money of the firm of V. Polizzotto could properly be drawn out on checks signed “S. Polizzotto,” though the name of V. Polizzotto nowhere appeared on them.

Thus his cross-examination at one time proceeds as follows:

Q. Mr. Barker, is it not a fact that Mr. S. Polizzotto has no personal account with your bank, and has not had for some time?

A. It is a fact.

Q. That being a fact, Mr. Barker, should you receive a check on your bank signed “S. Polizzotto,” would you pay the check?

A. In the absence of Mr. Polizzotto, I would pay the check and charge the amount.

Q. To whose account would you charge it?

A. Charge it to V. Polizzotto, unless I could see Sam Polizzotto.

The cashier and another officer of the bank, whose functions appear to be general, testify, in effect, that the payment of the check in dispute was proper under the circumstances, and Mr. Clay, a banker, called by defendant as an expert, seemed to sustain that view until the circumstances which plaintiff thinks should have excited defendant’s distrust were stated, when he said that he would not have paid the check without hearing from the drawer. Mr. Desobry, a banker, called as an expert by plaintiff, after hearing a statement of the facts, testified that he would not have paid the check, and it was admitted that Mr. Grace, another banker, would have testified to like effect.

In our view, the signature upon which a depositor is to be bound and the bank is to be authorized to disburse his money may be whatever they agree on (in some cases, where the depositor is unable to write, it being a mere hieroglyphic). But as neither the firm of V. Polizzotto, nor any of its members acting for the firm, ever agreed with the defendant bank that the money of the firm should be disbursed on the signature attached to the check here in dispute, we are unable to see upon what theory they are to be held bound by such disbursement. The only authorized signature which the bank had on its signature book was “V. Polizzotto, per S. P.,” the whole of it in the handwriting of Sam Polizzotto. The other authorized signature, not on the signature book, was “V. Polizzotto” (printed) “per” (printed) “S. Polizzotto” (written by Sam Polizzotto). The signature on which the bank paid the money was “V. Polizzotto” (written by another hand than that of Sam Polizzotto) “by” (also written by another hand) "S. Polizzotto" (written by S. Polizzotto), and that signature was attached to a check such as V. Polizzotto had never issued, and which was so unusual in appearance as at once to attract the attention of the officers of the bank and of the book-keeper of V. Polizzotto, and which the bank had ample time to inquire about before paying. In view of these conclusions, we consider it unnecessary to inquire into the liability of persons who have affixed their signatures to incomplete instruments, or into the question whether the paper upon which Sam Polizzotto wrote his signature could be regarded as an incomplete check, those questions, in our opinion, not being in this case.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the application herein made be now dismissed at the cost of the applicant, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal, here made the subject of review, remain undisturbed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF CITY OF PATERSON, Plffs. in Err.,

v.

ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— N. J. —, 75 Atl. 922.)

Municipal corporation — negligence of agent — imputability.

1. Negligence in the performance of public duties by municipal agents or instrumentalities intrusted therewith is not imputable to the municipality.

Same — effect on rights.

2. A fire engine belonging to the city of P. was injured in a collision with a railroad train at a highway crossing. The collision occurred through the joint negligence of the persons operating the train and the driver of the engine. Held, that the negligence of the driver of the engine constituted no bar to the right of the municipality to recover compensation from the railroad company.

(February 28, 1910.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought to recover the value of a fire engine for the destruction of which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward F. Merrey, plaintiffs in error:

Negligence of the driver of the fire engine cannot be imputed to the plaintiff.

Messrs. Collins & Corbin for defendant in error.

Gummere, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the city of Paterson to recover damages for injuries received by one of its fire engines in a collision between it and a train of the defendant company at a railroad crossing in the city. The plaintiff's proofs showed that the crossing gates were not down, and that no bell was rung, or whistle blown, on the train as it approached the crossing. It also appeared in the plaintiff's case that the driver of the fire engine came onto the crossing without using care to see whether or not a train was approaching. At the close of the plaintiff's case a nonsuit was ordered, upon

Note. — An extended search has disclosed no other case discussing the effect of the negligence of an officer or agent of a municipal corporation contributing to the injury of its property, as a bar to a recovery by the municipality against the wrongdoer. The assumption in PATERSON v. ERIE R. Co. that a municipality is not responsible for injuries inflicted by the negligence of a member of its fire department, for the reason that the activities of such department pertain to the public functions of the municipality, is sustained by the weight of authority. (See note to Cunningham v. Seattle, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 629.) The reasoning of the court would, of course, not apply if the agent of the municipality were performing one of its private or corporate functions.

The conclusion that the negligence of the driver of the engine contributing to the injury would not prevent a recovery by the municipality against the railroad company was regarded by the court as a logical inference or deduction from the established principle that a municipality is not responsible for injuries inflicted by officers or agents in the performance of its public functions, or rather from the proposition, which the court apparently regarded as the foundation of that principle, that the negligence of such an officer or agent is not imputable to the municipality. It may be doubted, however, whether that proposition is the real foundation of the principle.

It is true that many of the decisions exonerating a municipality from responsibility for negligent injury inflicted by its agent upon a third person are apparently the ground that its right of recovery was barred by the contributory negligence of the driver of the engine. The plaintiff in error now challenges the soundness of that ruling.

A person whose negligent act produces injury to another cannot escape liability therefor merely by showing that the injury was contributed to by the careless act of a third person. In order to relieve him from such liability, it must also appear that the act of the third person was one for which the injured party was responsible, under the doctrine of respondent superior. In the absence of proof of that fact, the injured person is entitled to compel both or either of the wrongdoers to compensate him for his injuries. The correctness of the ruling of the trial court depends, therefore, upon whether the negligence of the driver of the fire engine is imputable to the city.

Municipal corporations are engaged in the performance of public services, in which they have no particular interest, and from which they derive no special benefit in their corporate capacity. The persons employed by them in the rendering of such service act as public servants, charged with a public duty. They are mere agencies, or instrumentalities, by which such duties are performed, and the doctrine of respondent superior does not apply to such employment. Condict v. Jersey City, 46 N. J. L. 157; Wild v. Paterson, 47 N. J. L. 406, 1 Atl. 490. Accordingly it was held by this court in the first of the cited cases that a municipality was not liable for an injury occasioned by the act of a driver of an ash cart, employed by its board of public works to remove ashes and refuse from boxes and barrels placed on the sidewalk, in carelessly making a dump from his cart; and in the second case it was considered by the supreme court that a municipality was not responsible to a member of its fire department, who was run over and injured while assisting to haul an engine to a fire, the accident having occurred because the persons in charge of the engine had carelessly permitted its brake to get out of order. Many cases to the same effect, and resting upon the same ground, will be found collated in 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1205, and in 29 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1267, 1304.

The concrete principle established by these decisions is that negligence in the performance of public duties by municipal agents or instrumentalities, intrusted therewith, is not chargeable against the municipality. Applying this principle to the present case, it is apparent that the ordering of referred to the proposition that the doctrine of respondent superior or of imputed negligence does not apply where the agent is performing one of the public functions of the municipality. This formula serves well enough the practical purposes of such a case, but it does not reflect the real reason for the municipality's immunity, and is misleading when used, as in PATERSON v. ERIE R. Co., as the basis for an inference that the contributory negligence of the agent will not prevent a recovery by the municipality against a third person.

Regarding the rule of municipal immunity as merely the result of a denial of the applicability of the doctrine respondent superior, or of imputed negligence to acts of an agent in the exercise of the public functions of the municipality, personal acts of misfeasance of the municipality without the intervention of an agent—if it could be conceived as so acting—would not fall within the protection of the rule; and yet it is clear that the broad ground of public policy underlying the rule would be as much opposed to holding the municipality responsible in such a case as when it acts through an agent. The immunity of the municipality from liability for the misfeasance of its agent, therefore, seems to be a mere deduction from its immunity from its own acts of misfeasance while in the exercise of a public function, rather than the result of a principle which takes such cases out of the operation of the doctrine of respondent superior or imputed negligence. If the negligence of the agent were to be imputed to the municipality, it would be in no worse position than if the negligence had been its own personal act, but even then the rule of immunity would apply if the act were one which pertained to its public functions.

Logically, no question as to respondent superior or imputed negligence properly arises unless it be assumed, for the purposes of the point at least, that the party sought to be held responsible for the misfeasance of its agent would have been responsible if the misfeasance had been its own personal act. Hence, if the municipality would not be responsible if the misfeasance could be conceived of as its own personal act, committed without the intervention of an agent, there is no necessity of negating imputed negligence in order to relieve it of responsibility when the misfeasance is committed through the instrumentality of an agent. In this view the premise assumed by the court, namely, that the negligence of the driver of the fire engine was not imputable to the municipality, and the conclusion based thereon that such negligence would not preclude a recovery by the municipality against the railroad, are left without any substantial foundation. It is a long step from the assumed nonliability of the municipality for an injury inflicted upon a third person by the negligence of the driver of the fire engine, to the liability of the railroad company to the municipality for injury to its property notwithstanding the negligence of the driver to whose care it was intrusted. The question deserves more consideration than the court in the reported case appears to have given to it.

G. H. P.

a nonsuit was erroneous; for, unless the negligence of the driver of the fire engine was imputable to the plaintiff, it no more constituted a bar to the plaintiff's right of action against the defendant than the contributing negligent act of any other person. Entirely disconnected with the plaintiff, would have done.

The judgment under review will be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA, Resp't.,
v.

FRANK E. FUNK et al., Appts.

(— N. D. —, 127 N. W. 722.)

Bail bond — defense — detention on other charge.

1. It is a good defense to an action against the sureties on a bail bond that the state, intermediate the date of such bond and the time when, by the terms thereof, the principal was obligated to appear in court, caused the arrest of such principal on a criminal charge in another county, and kept him confined in the county jail thereof until after the date designated in the bond for his appearance.

Same — effect.

2. By such arrest and detention of the principal, performance of the conditions of the bail bond was rendered impossible by the state, the obligee in the bond, and therefore the default of the principal in failing to appear is excusable.

Fisk, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the district court of McLean county. The facts are all stipulated, and are substantially as follows:

At the June, 1906, term of district court in and for McLean county, commencing June 11, 1906, one Alexander Larron was informed against, charged with the crime of grand larceny. On June 14th he was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty. On his motion a change of venue was taken, and by order of court the action was transferred to Stark county, and Larron was admitted to bail in the sum of $2,000 in each case, there being two cases. On November 19, 1906, Larron, as principal, and defendants, as sureties, executed and delivered their undertakings, whereby they jointly and severally undertook and agreed that said Larron should appear and answer such informations at the adjourned September 11, 1906, term of the district court of Stark county, to be held at Dickinson on December 3, 1906, being the next term thereof, and at all times hold himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, and, if convicted, to appear for judgment and render himself in execution thereof, or, if he fail to perform either of said conditions, that he pay to plaintiff the sum of $2,000 on each of said bonds, which bonds were approved by the clerk and by the acting judge, who ordered the release of Larron thereunder. During all times subsequent to June 14, 1906, Larron was held in custody in the county jail of McLean county by the sheriff thereof under instructions of the court, and on November 23d, and as soon as he was advised by his counsel so to do, under and by virtue of said undertakings, their filing, approval, and the order of the court, the said sheriff advised Larron that he was then and there released and discharged from custody on the charges on which he had been theretofore held, but immediately advised him that he, such sheriff, had been instructed and requested by the sheriff of Rolette county North Dakota, to arrest and hold him in the event that Larron should be released on bail, and immediately informed him that he was then rearrested and to be held awaiting the arrival of the sheriff of Rolette county, and he was not permitted to leave such jail. At the time the sheriff said to Larron that he was released, he further stated: "You are rearrested, and held for the sheriff of Rolette county." Thereafter the sheriff of Rolette county took Larron into his custody, conveying him to Rolette county without his consent or procurement, and against his will, and over his protest, and against the will and over the protest of these defendants. On December 4, 1906, being the second day of the adjourned September 11, 1906, term of the district court in and for Stark county, said cases were moved for trial. Larron failed to appear according to the conditions of such undertakings, and thereupon the court duly declared such undertakings forfeited. At no time prior to the final adjournment of said court did said Larron or defendants or either of them, or anyone in his or their behalf, appear and excuse or offer to excuse or explain Larron's failure to appear according to the terms of such undertakings, and at no time thereafter did Larron surrender himself, nor was he surrendered to any court or officer. Said sum of $4,000, the penalty of said undertakings, has not, nor any part thereof, been paid.

On November 30, 1906, and for a long time after December 4, 1906, and after the final adjournment of the said term of court in Stark county, Larron was forcibly and against his will held in custody and imprisonment in the county jail of Rolette county upon an alleged criminal charge, under process of law, and by the officers of said county; that solely on account of such imprisonment, and not otherwise, the said Larron could not and did not appear for trial in the district court of Stark county, in discharge of the obligations of said bonds or undertakings, and that the charge upon which the said Larron was arrested and held in custody in the said county of Rolette, as aforesaid, was not alleged to have been committed subsequent to the filing of the bonds aforesaid. While Larron was being held in custody in the county jail of McLean county, as aforesaid, and after such bonds had been thus approved and filed, and after the order directing that Larron be discharged from custody had been filed, and while the sheriff of McLean county was holding Larron for the sheriff of Rolette county, defendants, as such sureties, demanded of such sheriff that he surrender to them the custody of Larron, which demand was refused. Larron died on or about June 15, 1907, subsequent to the final adjournment of the adjourned September, 1906, term of the district court of Stark county. At the time of his death he was not held in custody, but was a fugitive from justice. After the adjournment of such term of court, and until the death of said Larron, there was no term of court held in Stark county at which said criminal actions could have been tried, and such actions remained pending in said court until the time of his death.

On these facts the district court directed the entry of judgment in favor of the state, and against these sureties, for the amount of such undertakings, together with costs and disbursements. The appeal is from such judgment. Appellants urge three reasons in support of their contention that the judgment should be reversed. These are the following: "First. Larron, for whose appearance in court the bail bond was given, having been, by authority of the state, imprisoned in the county jail of Rolette county at the time fixed for his appearance for trial in the district court of Stark county, and when the order of forfeiture was made, his nonappearance was, as matter of law, thereby excused, and the appellants were not liable in this action. Second. Larron never having been discharged from custody or given his liberty, in consideration of the giving and filing of the bail bond, the bond never became operative, and was wholly without consideration, and was therefore null and void, and appellants were not liable thereon. Third. The state, by its officers, having prevented the appellants, sureties on the bail bond, from taking Larron into their personal custody for their own protection, appellants were thereby, as matter of law, released from all further liability on said bond." We shall notice the first ground only.

The authorities are somewhat in conflict regarding the rights and liabilities of sureties under facts similar to the foregoing. Some courts have upheld the right of the state to enforce forfeitures under similar facts. The case of State v. Merrihew, 47 Iowa, 112, 29 Am. Rep. 464, is much relied on by respondent's counsel, owing to the claimed similarity of our Code provisions with the statute of Iowa. Certain sections of the Iowa statute are very similar to the Code of this state; but the provision of the Iowa law (Code 1873, § 4600), which was deemed controlling in that case, reads as follows: "If, before judgment is entered against the bail, the defendant be surrendered or arrested, the court may, in its discretion, remit the whole or any part of the sum specified in the undertaking." Following the rule announced in State v. Scott, 20 Iowa, 63, the court in the later case seems to have held that, after forfeiture, the only provision of the statute of that state that aids a bail is the section above quoted. We have no such statutory provision. Section 10,270, Rev. Codes 1905, cited by respondent's counsel, is widely different. That section provides: "Any surety on such undertaking may be discharged from further liability thereon, at any time before final judgment against him, by surrendering to the court or proper officer the principal in such undertaking, if such principal is a defendant in a criminal action, or if such principal is held as a witness in such action and it has not been tried; or by paying to the clerk of the court the amount specified in such undertaking, with costs, as the court may direct." This section is 8460 in the Revised Codes of 1895. An error crept into the 1905 compilation by leaving out in the last line after the word "with" the word "such." It will readily be seen from the Iowa statute that no right was conferred upon the bail to a remission of the whole or any part of the sum specified, but it was made wholly discretionary with the court whether it would remit the whole or any portion thereof. Our statute, on the contrary, seems to confer on any surety the right to be discharged from liability by surrendering the principal at any time before final judgment against such surety on the undertaking. If this is a correct construction of § 10,270, then it would seem plain that, if the principal dies before judgment is entered against the surety, the latter's liability would thereby terminate, for it is obvious that by such death the surety is deprived of what otherwise would or might be a valuable right to him. The facts in the case at bar differ from those in the Iowa case in this respect.

We have reached the conclusion that the judgment of the lower court must be reversed. We do not rest our decision, however, solely upon what we have above stated relative to the construction of § 10,270. We are convinced that the weight of authority, both on principle and reasoning, supports appellants' contention that when one is bound as bail for another, for his appearance in a particular court at a particular time, and the state, before the time stipulated for the appearance, arrests the principal and detains him at another place, thus preventing him from appearing at the time and place stipulated, the bail will be exonerated during such detention. There are many authorities which might be cited in support of this rule. We cite the following: People v. Bartlett, 3 Hill, 570; Com. v. House, 13 Bush, 679; Woods v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 595, 103 S. W. 895; State v. Row, 89 Iowa, 581, 57 N. W. 306; People v. Robb, 98 Mich. 307, 57 N. W. 257; Buffington v. Smith, 58 Ga. 341; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 719. In State v. Row, the Iowa court, among other things, said: "It is not to be said, as a legal conclusion, that, had he not been imprisoned at the instance of the state, he would neither have appeared, nor his sureties produced him, when his appearance was called for. The state, by placing him in the penitentiary, had rendered it absolutely impossible for him to appear, or for the sureties on his bond to produce him. Under such circumstances there could be no default." In Woods v. State, supra, the Texas court tersely said: "It may be that appellant was properly indicted in the county of Hamilton, and in one sense this may have been a fault on his part; still, in our view, it would constitute, no matter whether he was rightly or wrongly indicted in the other county, a sufficient cause for his exoneration, inasmuch as the very government which held him amenable to the charge in Bosque county had taken jurisdiction of him in Hamilton county." It is true the court in that case was considering a statute which provides that sickness of the principal or some uncontrollable circumstance preventing his appearance at court is a defense against forfeiture of the bail bond, but we think that, in the absence of such a statute, the rule is and should be that uncontrollable circumstances preventing appearance pursuant to the stipulations in the bond should be sufficient to excuse a forfeiture. The Michigan court in People v. Robb, supra, cited with approval People v. Bartlett, supra; and other cases, and said: "No doubt the arrest and continued detention of the principal by the state on another charge, when such detention makes it impossible for the surety to produce the principal, must operate to discharge the surety from liability." As we understand the brief of respondent's counsel, he does not seriously question the correctness of the rule announced in the majority of the cases, but he contends that, under our Code provisions upon the subject, these authorities are not in point. We cannot concur in this view.

The judgment appealed from is accordingly reversed, and the District Court is directed to dismiss the action.

All concur, except Morgan, Ch. J., not participating.

FRED B. HANNAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF LAWTON et al.

(— Okla. —, 107 Pac. 646.)

Public improvement — advertisement for bids — necessity for definite plans.

1. Section 8027, art. 5, chap. 102, Okla. Comp. Laws 1909, referring to boards of education of cities of the first class, and providing that they shall make no contracts involving an expenditure of more than $500 for the purpose of erecting any public buildings or making any improvements, except upon sealed proposals and to the lowest responsible bidder, contemplates that, before advertising for bids, a plan or plans open to all shall be prepared with specifications not of a general character, but so definite and detailed as to disclose the specific thing to be undertaken.

Same — award to lowest bidder — purpose of requirement.

2. The true intent and purpose of the statute (§ 8027, supra) requiring certain contracts to be let only on sealed proposals to the lowest responsible bidder is to secure economy, and protect the public from collusive contracts, favoritism, or fraud, and to promote actual, honest, effective competition in the construction of public work by requiring of boards the presentation of a common standard previously ascertained, to the end that each proposal or bid received and considered may be in competition with all others, and to preclude the consideration and acceptance of proposals or bids on plans and specifications not open to all.

Headnotes by DUNN, J.

Same — scope of discretion as to letting of contract.

3. The requirement of the statute (§ 8027, supra) that the contract shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder involves a consideration by the board of more than merely which bid was the lowest in price; it requires the ascertainment of the ability of bidders to respond in the discharge of all the obligations assumed in accordance with what is expected or may be demanded under the terms of contracts.

Parties — illegal disposition of public funds — taxpayer's rights.

4. A resident taxpayer, although he shows no special private interest, may invoke the interposition of a court of equity to prevent an illegal disposition of the money of a municipality, or the illegal creation of a debt which he in common with the other property owners may otherwise be compelled to pay.

(December 21, 1909.)

Note. — Sufficiency of specifications for guidance of bidder for public contract.

This note is confined to the sufficiency of specifications prepared for the guidance of bidders, and does not include cases dealing with sufficiency of specifications furnished for information of taxpayers or by bidder in connection with his bid. Cases are omitted which deal with right of officials to reserve the right to vary terms of specifications in case it should thereafter become desirable to modify plans or provide for extra work. In general, as to rights of lowest bidder on a public contract, see note to Anderson v. St. Louis Public Schools, 26 L.R.A. 707. And as to the remedy of lowest bidder for refusal of authorities to award contract to him, see note to Molloy v. New Rochelle, ante, 120. As to municipal contracts for work or articles which embody a patented invention, see note to Kilvington v. Superior, 18 L.R.A. 45. As to validity of contract for material patented or held in monopoly, where a public letting to the lowest bidder is required, see note to Allen v. Milwaukee, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 680; also see Saunders v. Iowa City, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 392.

Necessity and sufficiency of specifications in general.

There are many constitutional and statutory provisions requiring the awarding of public contracts to the lowest bidder. In order to comply with such requirement, there must, so far as the subject-matter will allow, be an opportunity for competition on equal terms; and in order that all may be able to compete on equal terms, there must be established in advance a basis for an exact comparison of bids, so that all may bid on the same thing. Accordingly, it has been held that such provisions are not complied with unless plans and specifications are prepared in advance sufficiently ERROR to the District Court for Comanche County to review a judgment dismissing a petition filed to restrain the performance of an alleged illegal contract for the installation of a heating and ventilating system in a certain proposed public building. Reversed.

The fact are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Mitschrich and F. R. Ellis for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. McElhoes & Ferris and Dumas & Vaught, for defendants in error:

The purpose of a provision requiring a contract to be let to the lowest responsible bidder is to secure competition among contractors for public works and supplies, and to give the public the benefit thereof, and something is necessarily left to the discretion of the city authorities, and they must determine in each case what competition the nature of the case will admit of, and what is the best method to secure it.

When there is a common standard providing enough information upon which an intelligent bid can be made, the law, both in letter and spirit, has been complied with.

More general specifications which leave a wide margin for difference in type and cost of the proposed work are insufficient. Fones Bros. Hardware Co. v. Erb, supra.

Specifications which leave to an official the relative amounts of different materials to be used are defective, as the cost and profit of the work would be thereby affected. California Improv. Co. v. Reynolds, supra.

When no plans for a sewer, the construction of which is to be let to the lowest bidder, have ever been made, and the specifications do not show or specify the grade of the proposed sewer, nor the depth of the excavations of the trench, nor the manner and style of the construction of the manholes therein, but these are left to the discretion of the officials, the contract is void as 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

no one can bid intelligently. Wells v. Burnham, supra.

The reservation by officials of "the right to divide the work" after bids have been received, "according to the ability of the contractors to do the same, or as they may think for the best interest of the property affected, and that of the public," leaves uncertain the amount of work to be done, and renders any subsequent contract void. Kneeland v. Furlong, supra.

Plans and specifications are sufficient if contractors and others skilled in such matters are able to determine what is required. Yaryan v. Toledo, 28 Ohio C. C. 259, affirmed without opinion in 76 Ohio St. 584, 81 N. E. 1199.

Specifications are sufficient which duly inform bidders as to the nature, quality, and quantity of the materials to be furnished and the work to be done, and the same information is furnished to all. Schwitzer v. Board of Education (N. J. L.) 75 Atl. 447.

In Yaryan v. Toledo, 28 Ohio C. C. 278, affirmed without opinion in 76 Ohio St. 584, 81 N. E. 1199, the court said: "When the construction consists of the mere assembling and putting in place of parts of standard machinery, or the ordinary construction of edifices or works made of brick and mortar, wood, cement, and the like, the making of complete plans may be expedient and legally necessary; but we are not prepared to say that it is either required by the law or expedient where, as in a case like this, much depends upon adjustment of means to ends in the perfection of the system, so as to make it work well, and where efficiency is the great desideratum, and where an enforceable guaranty thereof may be essential to save the city from fruitless expense of great magnitude."

A specification that a city is to be lighted in the manner then in use is sufficiently definite. Detroit v. Hosmer, supra.

Specifications calling for lights of a certain candle power, without naming the system, are sufficient, as the end to be reached is obtaining light of a certain degree of brilliancy. Ibid.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The board of education of the city of Lawton, Oklahoma, being engaged in the construction of a high school building in that city, published the following notice: "The board of education of Lawton, Oklahoma, will receive bids up to 8 o'clock P. M., April 28th, for the erection of a high school building to be erected on their property in accordance with plans and specifications as furnished for same by Hair & Smith of Oklahoma City. Each bid must be accompanied by a certificate of $500 to guarantee that contractor will accept the contract for the amount of his proposal, and further that he will furnish satisfactory bond for 50 per cent of the amount of his contract. Plans may be obtained at the clerk of the board's office or at architect's by depositing a $100 certified check, which will be returned upon the return of drawings in good condition. They further will receive bids for the plumbing accompanied by a certified check for $500, subject to conditions as per above. Plans may be obtained by depositing $10 for their safe return. They will further receive bids ac-

It is not necessary that plans in the sense of sketches or drawings be prepared, if the necessary information be given in written specifications. Yaryan v. Toledo, 28 Ohio C. C. 259, affirmed without opinion in 76 Ohio St. 584, 81 N. E. 1199.

The manifest intention of a statute requiring schedules of articles and materials desired to be made, and bids asked for furnishing the same, is to require that the schedules shall be so prepared that each item of every classification therein contained shall be sufficiently explicit as to make clear what is to be furnished under that item. Com. v. Sanderson, 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 416.

A statute providing that when a public improvement is ordered, the board of public works of a city "shall cause proposals for doing said work to be advertised in the official paper of the city, a plan and profile of the work to be done, accompanied with specifications for doing the same, being first deposited with the clerk of said board" for public inspection, is sufficiently complied with, in seeking bids for paving a street, when the advertisement and specification describes the work as "a wooden block pavement" on a certain street, and a cross section of the pavement is filed showing its thickness, its level as compared with the level of the sidewalks, its slopes from the center of the street to the center of the gutters, and from the center of the gutters to the curbing. Rogers v. St. Paul, 22 Minn. 494.

Under a statute requiring specifications to be made and filed before calling for bids, the validity of a tax to pay for a sewer will not be impaired though the specifications filed leave uncertain the exact number of manholes required, if the expense therefor will be so trifling as compared to that of the whole work as not to affect the bidding. Houghton v. Burnham, 22 Wis. 301.

Letting a contract for a garbage crematory, without making or filing any plan of the proposed plant, or adopting any system of garbage cremation, or specifying the dimensions of buildings or description of machinery to be used, but merely calling for a complete garbage cremation plant that will destroy a certain quantity of garbage per day, leaving the bidders to submit plans and specifications showing a description of the buildings, machinery, furnaces, and appurtenances, is in violation of a statute which requires an advertisement for such work after a plan or profile of the work, accompanied with specifications or other appropriate and sufficient description of the work, has first been placed on file for the information of bidders and others. Ricketson v. Milwaukee, 105 Wis. 591, 47 L.R.A. 685, 81 N. W. 864.

When the authority of an official is purely statutory, and the statute requires him to prepare both plans and specifications, a preparation of specifications alone is insufficient, though they may be sufficiently definite without the plans. Kneeland v. Milwaukee, supra (semble).

When a statute requires the notice to contain specifications, written specifications incomplete in themselves cannot be supplemented by verbal explanations, as this would tend to the admission of the mischief the statute was designed to remedy. Littler v. Jayne, supra.

The difficulty of deciding how detailed plans and specifications should be is as well illustrated in Ampt ex rel. Cincinnati v. Cincinnati, 17 Ohio C. C. 516, affirmed without opinion in 60 Ohio St. 621, 54 N. E. 1097, as anywhere, and as it contains an able discussion of the matter, it will be set out with some fullness. There, a new pumping plant was desired for the city of Cincinnati, and the sufficiency of the plans and specifications of the pumps and engines was challenged. A statute provided that the commissioners having charge of the matter "shall, before entering into any contract, cause plans and specifications, detailed drawings, and forms of bids to be prepared, and careful estimates of cost to be made." The court said: "To what extent accompanied by plans and specifications in form of proposal for a steam force blast system of heating and ventilation, controlled by automatic heat regulation in all rooms other than halls and toilets, board and superintendent room, wall radiation. Each pupil in each room is to receive 1,800 cubic feet of air per hour. All recitation, board, instructors, assemblies, studies, and domestic rooms are to be guaranteed a heat of 70 degrees in coldest weather. The halls, toilets, gymnasium, and manual training rooms being heated to 60 degrees in coldest weather. The plans may be obtained by depositing $10 for the safe return. The proposals shall be accompanied by a certified check for $2,000, subject to conditions as per above." April 28th, 1909, plans and specifications accompanied by bids on the heating and ventilating system were submitted by Lewis & Kitchen, defendants in error, defendants below, and also by McMahon Company, and by Fred B. Hannan, plaintiff in error herein, plaintiff below. The bid of the first company was for $11,340; the McMahon Company's bid, $10,730; and the bid of plaintiff was $10,500. On considering the said bids the board of education entered into a contract with the defendants Lewis & Kitchen, and agreed to pay them for the construction of the heating and ventilating system the sum of $11,340, whereupon Fred B. Hannan brought this action of injunction in the district court of Comanche county, seeking to enjoin the said defendants Lewis & Kitchen were detailed drawings and specifications to go? Must it be the minutest detail in which every part of the machinery was to be drawn and specified, or was it sufficient to give specific and minute specifications as to what the machinery was to accomplish, the exact kinds of material to be used, the manner in which all the work should be done, and the exact nature and kind of all the parts which were given, how all such machinery should be constructed, such as valves, riveting, bolts, etc.? The specifications of this class cover sixteen pages of printed matter, and as far as it goes it is as specific as it could well be. The detailed drawings and specifications, however, did not go to the extent of showing in detail every part and proportion of the work. What is called the 'working plans' of this machinery will cover more than a thousand pages. The question is: Did the law require that the specifications and drawings should go to this extent? Possibly to give the law a literal interpretation would require the detailed drawings and specifications to include each and every part of the machinery, and in doing this the trustees might have omitted to require that the machinery should perform certain work, as they did do; for by this contract each of the pumps must have a capacity to pump 30,000,000 gallons of water every twenty-four hours, and must stand the test of 180,000,000 gallons of water in six consecutive days; and, furthermore, must perform the work required of it for one year to the satisfaction of the trustees; and during that time all alterations and repairs are to be borne by the builders.

"Certainly what the trustees wanted to get for the city was engines and pumps that would pump a certain quantity of water in a given time. It was wholly immaterial to them where each nut, bolt, valve, and piece of material was to be located. All such details were nonessentials. It is to be borne in mind that these engines and pumps were to be made to do a certain work. In one sense, they were not inanimate, like a house or building, but they had a great work to perform, and it must be done in the most economical and approved way. What the trustees did was to leave out the nonessentials in their specifications and drawings, but all the essentials of the result desired, as to the capacity of the pumps to perform the work required, and the manner of the workmanship, and the materials to be used in their construction, are most specifically looked after and detailed.

"In constructing statutes it is a well-known and valuable rule of the law that a thing may be within the law, and yet not within the letter of the law, and a thing may be within the letter of the law, and still not within the law; and so it seems to us in this case that it is within the letter of the law that these specifications and detailed drawings mentioned in the statute should give every detail of every part of this great and complex machinery, but we do not believe it is within the meaning of the law that they should do so.

"The first object of the law was to afford to the people who were to pay the cost of this work the assurance that it should be done for the least amount of money, and these provisions were placed there to bring about this result. Of course, the law is founded upon the theory that the people are to get work which is the best possible to be had. Bearing these two fundamental ideas in mind, we apply them to the subject-matter.

"The machinery required for this work is only capable of being built by ten firms in the United States. Of these eight were bidders on this work. The difficulty that presented itself at once to the trustees in making exact drawings and specifications of every part was this: Machinery of this magnitude has as yet not reached that state of perfection, and probably never will, where all builders build to any certain and fixed plan as to details. In this respect each builder has his own detailed plans, and no two are alike, and their tools and patterns are made to produce their own work after their own plans; therefore, if the detailed plan of this complicated work was to be given in all of its parts, the from carrying out their contract, and the board of education from paying any funds of the district on the same. No other notice was given, and no other or different plans and specifications on the heating and ventilating system were adopted or furnished than the details mentioned in the published notice, and plaintiff insists that the board was without power to let the contract thereon, as they did not comply with the statute, and a letting thereon was in violation thereof. The defendants answered, admitted that there was no other publication or call for bids except the one given in the said notice, and that the contract was let to Lewis & Kitchen upon their plans and specifications with no opportunity given to other bidders to compete upon the plans and specifications submitted to them. At the trial of the cause, the parties entered into the following agreed statement of facts:

"It is hereby agreed by and between the parties hereto that the following shall be admitted in evidence as facts, and shall be received without the introduction of evidence to maintain the same. Other evidence material and competent and upon other issues in the case may be offered in evidence by either party. (1) The city of Lawton, state of Oklahoma, is a municipal corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Oklahoma, as a city of the first class, and constituting a separate school district in the county of Comanche, state of Oklahoma. (2) The defendant board of education of the city trustees were either compelled to adopt the plans of one of the concerns which had produced such work, or else get up a plan of the same kind of their own. It will be seen at once that the object of the law would be defeated if the board were to adopt the detailed plans of any one of the firms, for this would virtually destroy all bidding by firms other than the one whose plan was adopted, and place the trustees at the mercy of that firm. The price to the city would in all probability be much greater than it should be. This would destroy competition in bidding, the very thing the law was intended to bring about, and this must not be except from necessity.

"But a still greater difficulty met the trustees in getting up a detailed plan of their own. The evidence showed that at the present time there is only one such pump in operation in the United States, although numerous such pumps have been built, but only to prove costly failures. And no city is able to furnish a better example of this than the city of Cincinnati with its celebrated Shields pump, which has cost the city thousands upon thousands of dollars, and is now perfectly worthless, its only value being as old junk.

"In the first place, the work and time required to produce these plans is very great, the testimony of the chief engineer being to the effect that it would require a year and a half to do it. And in the next place, no firm could construct such machinery so well or so cheaply as it could machinery of its own pattern and design. And then lastly, which is the most important of all, it would, when constructed, be more or less experimental, and might not perform the work required of it."

A statute and ordinance requiring that "proposals for bids shall state the amount and different kinds of material to be furnished" is sufficiently complied with when the plans and specifications are so full that they furnish all the data from which to determine by computation the exact amount and kind of all the materials necessary for the structure. Jenny v. Des Moines, 103 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Iowa, 347, 72 N. W. 550; Arnold v. Ft. Dodge, 111 Iowa, 152, 82 N. W. 495.

When the specifications in an ordinance providing for macadamizing, curbing, and guttering certain streets are sufficiently explicit, it is not necessary for further specifications to be prepared, notwithstanding the provision of a general ordinance applicable to all public work, which requires a plan or profile of the work, accompanied by specifications, to be on file when bids are advertised for. Morley v. Weakley, 86 Mo. 451.

Under such circumstances it is not necessary that advertisements for bids for paving shall state the amount of work to be done, when they show between what streets and on what streets the work is to be done, stating the different classes of work. Ibid.

Under a statute requiring contracts to be awarded to lowest bidder after public notice, stating "the extent of the work, the kind of materials," etc., a notice is insufficient which states that bids will be received "for the following described work, as per plans and specifications now on file. . . . Brick paving. Two courses of brick, on sand foundation, with top filler, as described on pages 9 and 10 of specifications. First. West Grand avenue from Twenty-eighth street to 400 feet west of Park Lane." Windsor v. Des Moines, 101 Iowa, 343, 70 N. W. 214.

So, also, under such a statute, a notice calling for bids for sewer construction is insufficient though it states the estimated number of linear feet of sewer, the sizes of pipe, the number of flush tanks and man-holes, if it does not give definite information respecting the condition under which the work is to be done, and the manner in which it will be required to be done. Bennett v. Emmetsburg, 138 Iowa, 67, 115 N. W. 582.

Under the provisions of a city ordinance that the proposals for estimates prescribed by the department making the same shall state the quantity and quality of the supplies, or the nature or extent, as near as possible, of the work required, specifications

trict authorized issuance of bonds in the sum of $100,000, for the erection, construction, and equipment of a high school building. (6) That pursuant to the authority given at said election, the defendant board of education of the city of Lawton, Oklahoma, on the 10th day of April, 1909, caused an advertisement and notice for bids for the construction of said school building, and for the construction of a plumbing system for said building, and for the construction and plans and specifications for a heating and ventilating system for said building to be made; that said advertisement was duly and legally made, and for the required length of time; that Exhibit A attached to the petition of the plaintiff herein is a full, true, correct, and complete copy of

for a bridge prepared by a department are fatally indefinite and defective, which leave it uncertain whether nickel steel or high carbon steel will be required, or who shall determine which shall be used, and when it is conceded that nickel steel is the more expensive, and it is left uncertain whether in case high carbon steel were selected more would be required than if nickel steel were selected, and when bids are asked in a lump sum, which would be the same whichever material were chosen. Gage v. New York, 110 App. Div. 403, 97 N. Y. Supp. 157.

—where statutes require amount of security, terms, and time of payment to be stated.

A notice advertising for bids is insufficient when it does not state the amount in which security will be required of bidders, as provided in the ordinance authorizing the work. Smith v. New York, 10 N. Y. 504.

Where the notice and advertisement did not state "the terms and time of payment" as required by statute, a contract made in accordance with a bid submitted under such defective notice and advertisement is illegal. Dyer v. Erwin, 106 Ga. 845, 33 S. E. 63; Manly Bldg. Co. v. Newton, 114 Ga. 245, 40 S. E. 274; Scott v. Crow, 121 Ga. 68, 48 S. E. 691.

Under such a statute, a notice is insufficient which states that certain proportionate parts of the contract price shall be paid at certain stages of the construction, without fixing the dates when such payment shall be made, or when the building shall be commenced or finished. Scott v. Crow, supra.

Such a statutory provision, however, does not require that the authorities shall state in such publication an exact or an approximate price at which the contract will be let. Pilcher v. English, 133 Ga. 496, 66 S. E. 163.

—where bidder is asked to furnish specifications.

Such constitutional and statutory provisions requiring public contracts to be let to the lowest bidder are violated where the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

officials having the matter in charge advertise at the same time for plans and specifications and bids based thereon, and then after bids are received, adopt one of the offered plans with its specifications and accept the accompanying bid. Fones Bros. Hardware Co. v. Erb, 54 Ark. 645, 13 L.R.A. 353, 17 S. W. 7; Ertle v. Leary, 114 Cal. 238, 46 Pac. 1; Huntington County v. Pashong, 41 Ind. App. 69, 83 N. E. 383 (even though general specifications were prepared in advance by authorities); Packard v. Hayes, 94 Md. 233, 51 Atl. 32; People ex rel. Putnam v. Buffalo County, 4 Neb. 150.

Thus, the provision requiring letting a public contract to the lowest bidder is violated when the advertisement for bids for the collection, removal, and disposal of garbage, though explicit as to the collection and removal of garbage, fails to specify the method of disposal, but provides that "each bidder must submit with his bid the scheme of garbage disposal which he proposes to establish, . . . including such plan, specification, and other information as may be necessary to enable the said commissioner to determine the feasibility of it." Packard v. Hayes, supra.

Under a statute providing for letting public contracts to the lowest bidder, and requiring plans and specifications to be on file with an official, a contract is void where the plans and specifications on file were incomplete, and bidders were required to furnish detailed specifications with their bids. Huntington County v. Pashong, supra; Mazet v. Pittsburgh, 137 Pa. 548, 20 Atl. 693.

The provision in specifications for a bridge, that each bidder must submit with his bid "strain sheet and fully detailed plan" does not affect the validity of the award of a contract to a bidder, on the theory that the proposals called for bids based on said plans furnished by the bidder, and hence that each may bid on his own plans and specifications, when the plans and specifications furnished by the officials were full and complete, and the object of the provision was to advise the authorities of said notice. (7) That prior to April 28, 1909, the said board had not prepared plans and specifications for the construction of said heating and ventilating system, except as to the requirements set forth in said advertisement, and did not select or adopt any such plans or specifications until after the same had been filed with said board by bidders. (8) That there were three bidders, to wit, Fred B. Hannan, of Lawton, Oklahoma, the McMahon Company, of Kansas City, Missouri, and the defendants Lewis & Kitchen; and the plans and specifications submitted by each of the three bidders were each different, and not the same. (9) That immediately after the submission and consideration of the plans and specifications by the several bidders therefor, the said board adopted the plans and specifications submitted by the defendants Lewis & Kitchen, and entered into a contract in accordance therewith. (10) That each bidder complied with the rules as to security and the deposit of certified checks required by the board. (11) That the amount bid by Fred B. Hannan for the construction of the heating and ventilating system, upon the plans and specifications submitted by him, was $10,500. (12) That the amount bid by the McMahon Company, upon the plans and specifications submitted by them, was $10,730. (13) That the amount bid by Lewis & Kitchen, upon the plans and specifications submitted by them, was $11,340; that no other advertisement, other than the one set out in Exhibit A, herein referred the interpretation of its plans and specifications by the bidder and their method of execution. Jenney v. Des Moines, supra.

—where specifications are not contained in notice, but are accessible.

The notice and advertisement are not defective because they state the work to be done in general terms only, if they refer to complete plans and specifications accessible to bidders for further information. Pilcher v. English, supra; Bozarth v. McGillicuddy, 19 Ind. App. 26, 47 N. E. 397, 48 N. E. 1042; Jenney v. Des Moines, 103 Iowa, 347, 72 N. W. 550; Arnold v. Ft. Dodge, 111 Iowa, 152, 82 N. W. 495; Owens v. Marion, 127 Iowa, 460, 103 N. W. 381; Fullerton v. Des Moines (Iowa) 126 N. W. 159; Dixon v. Greene County, 76 Miss. 794, 25 So. 665; Swift v. St. Louis, 180 Mo. 80, 79 S. W. 172; Gilsonite Constr. Co. v. Arkansas McAlester Coal Co. 205 Mo. 49, 103 S. W. 93; State ex rel. Baldwin v. Williams County, 3 Ohio C. C. 403; Ampt ex rel. Cincinnati v. Cincinnati, 17 Ohio C. C. 516, affirmed in 60 Ohio St. 621, 54 N. E. 1097; Taylor v. Wapakoneta, 26 Ohio C. C. 285; Houghton v. Burnham, 22 Wis. 301.

But in Wilkins v. Detroit, 46 Mich. 120, 8 N. W. 701, 9 N. W. 427, the court, in discussing the language of a city charter declaring that "no paving contract . . . shall be made until advertised proposals and specifications therefor shall have been duly published," said: "This language is very clear, and we think it is in the same direction with much state and congressional legislation which requires notices for proposals to furnish bidders full knowledge of what they are to bid upon, without requiring a personal visit to any office, where there may be difficulty, among many bidders, in consulting the one set of documents conveniently, and where persons under bodily weakness could not always consult them at all. . . . But it does not follow that such a notice is to contain all the verbiage which is often, and probably was here, set out in a formal document called specifications. In a paving contract all the essentials to inform bidders might easily be contained in a very few lines."

The fact that specifications on which bids were based referred to the work on two streets is immaterial, where profile maps showing the work on each street were separately made and filed with the specifications, and proposals were invited for the work on each. Tingue v. Port Chester, 101 N. Y. 294, 4 N. E. 625.

An advertisement calling for bids is insufficient which does not contain specifications, but refers to an ordinance for the same, when the ordinance referred to contains no specifications. Louisiana v. Shaffner, 104 Mo. App. 101, 78 S. W. 287.

A notice inviting sealed proposals for street work, which does not refer to a diagram and specifications of the proposed work as required by statute, is so defective as to render a subsequent assessment invalid. Stockton v. Clark, 53 Cal. 82.

Unbalanced bids.

A provision requiring contracts to be let to the lowest bidder is not complied with where the advertisement asks bids on many different kinds of work, at rates to be specified for each, but in determining who is the lowest bidder all the offers are aggregated in one bid, and no basis for determining the amount of each kind of work is given, since the varying amount of each kind required will necessarily affect the question as to who is the lowest bidder. Detroit Free Press Co. v. State Auditors, 47 Mich. 135, 10 N. W. 171.

Under a statute providing that where materials are desired, full specifications must be given, and a contract to furnish the same given to the lowest bidder, specifications of various kinds of lumber desired are fatally defective, which give merely the different qualities desired, and give no statement as to the quantity; because, as much of one quality may be desired, and but little of another, there is no way to tell who is the lowest bidder. Bigler v. New York, 5 Abb. N. C. 51.

to, was ever made for the construction of a heating and ventilating system. Complete plans and specifications for the construction of the main building, not including plans and specifications for the heating and ventilating system, were on file with the clerk of defendant board for the use of bidders under said Exhibit A; that unless restrained by the court, the defendants Lewis & Kitchen will proceed to comply with said contract, and are now doing so, and the defendant board will pay therefor the contract price upon the compliance with said contract."

In addition to the foregoing agreed statement of facts some other evidence was offered, and the court, after hearing it, rendered judgment dismissing plaintiff's petition, from which judgment the cause was appealed to this court, and, owing to the public interest involved therein, has been advanced standing on the docket for early consideration.

Section 8027 of the Compiled Laws of Oklahoma 1909, relating to school districts in cities of the first class, provides: "No expenditures involving an amount greater than $200 shall be made except in accordance with the provisions of a written contract, and no contract involving an expenditure of more than $500, for the purpose of erecting any public buildings or making any improvements, shall be made except upon sealed proposals and to the lowest responsible bidder." Laws of this and a similar character, relating to the letting 209, the following estimates of the work to be done were contained in the proposals submitted to the bidders: "10,000 cubic yards of earth excavation, 20,000 cubic yards of rock excavation." These estimates were made without tests, and had no basis to rest on. The successful bidder bid $1.62½ per yard for earth, and 2 cents for rock excavation, and taking the quantities estimated his bid was the lowest, and he was awarded the contract. The actual quantities were found to be 20,576 cubic yards of earth and 9,241 cubic yards of rock excavation, which made him nearly the highest bidder. A fair value for rock excavation was $1.70 per yard and of earth 30 cents. It was held that the city ordinance requiring the quantity of each kind of material and its nature to be stated as nearly as possible was in no sense complied with, and furnished no basis for a valid contract, and that the facts created an inference of fraud and collusion. The court, however, said: "We do not hold that every unbalanced bid is per se fraudulent or evidence of substantial error. An unbalanced bid that does not materially enhance the aggregate cost of the work cannot be complained of. If there is no deception or mistake as to the quantities, and if the ordinances have fairly been complied with, and the quantity and quality of the work have been estimated as nearly as practical, there is no ground for alleging substantial error merely because of an unbalanced bid under which the contract was let. And if the cost of the work has not thereby been enhanced, there is no ground for alleging fraud."

In Walter v. McClellan, 113 App. Div. 295, 99 N. Y. Supp. 78, affirmed without opinion in 190 N. Y. 505, 83 N. E. 1133, where it was difficult or impossible to determine the exact amount of work to be done and materials furnished, and an estimate was prepared as accurate as it was feasible to make it, it was held not to be improper to ask for bids, not for a lump sum, but at unit prices, for doing the work and furnishing the materials, and which might be increased or diminished as the work progressed, based on such estimate of quantities, the lowest bidder to be determined by using the estimate as the basis of comparison.

Bids on alternative materials or work.

It is generally held that the provision that contracts shall be let to the lowest bidder is not violated when plans and specifications are drawn for different materials or articles answering the same general purpose, and bids are sought on the different kinds, and a choice is not to be made by the proper officers, between the alternative materials or articles, until all bids are in. Connersville v. Merrill, 14 Ind. App. 303, 42 N. E. 1112; Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Garr, 115 Ky. 334, 73 S. W. 1106; Trapp v. Newport, 115 Ky. 840, 74 S. W. 1109; Fineran v. Central Bitulithic Paving Co. 116 Ky. 505, 76 S. W. 415, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 741; Ex parte Paducah, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 412, 89 S. W. 302; Campbell v. Southern Bitulithic Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 799, 106 S. W. 1189; Baltimore v. Flack, 104 Md. 107, 64 Atl. 702; Baltimore v. Gahan, 104 Md. 145, 64 Atl. 716; Atty. Gen. ex rel. Cook v. Detroit, 26 Mich. 263; Detroit v. Hosmer, 79 Mich. 384, 44 N. W. 622; Muff v. Cameron, 134 Mo. App. 607, 114 S. W. 1125, 117 S. W. 116; Dixey v. Atlantic City & D. River Quarry & Constr. Co. 71 N. J. L. 120, 58 Atl. 370; Gilmore v. Utica, 131 N. Y. 26, 29 N. E. 841; Schieffelin v. New York, 65 Misc. 609, 122 N. Y. Supp. 502; Ampt ex rel. Cincinnati v. Cincinnati, supra; Polhamus v. Board of Education, 21 Ohio C. C. 257; Parker v. Philadelphia, 220 Pa. 208, 69 Atl. 670 (at least where articles desired are patented).

Thus, it has been held that the provision is not violated by a city ordinance providing that the improvement of a street shall be made of either free or limestone flagging or of artificial cement stone, as the common council may determine on reception of bids therefor. Connersville v. Merrill, supra.

Nor is the provision violated where bids are asked on two different kinds of asphalt pavement, and after bids are received the more expensive kind is adopted. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Garr, supra.

of contracts for the construction of public buildings and improvements or the purchase of public supplies, exist in nearly, if not quite, all of the states of the Union. It is well known that many public boards serving as purchasing and contracting agents, charged with the most responsible duties, are made up of men who in many instances receive little or no pay for the service which they render. Moreover, they are constantly shifting in their membership, and often comprised of men with no particular or special qualification for the duties which they are required to perform other than are generally possessed by the public at large. Notwithstanding these things, there is, by virtue of the operation of popular government, placed in their hands duties of the weightiest kind, carrying with them in many instances the expenditures of large sums of the public funds. By reason of the recognized lack of keen personal interest in the affairs of the public that a citizen generally feels in his own, prompting him to secure the most advantageous terms, there is very generally, in reference to the larger dealings, thrown around such agencies the salutary safeguards intended to be secured in the foregoing statute, to wit, that purchases or contracts shall be let upon sealed proposals to the lowest responsible bidder. Courts before which controversies have come over contracts let under laws of this character have had frequent occasion to inquire into the purposes of such enactments, and to

Nor is the provision violated when proposals for paving are to be in the alternative, either brick or bituminous macadam, and after bids are in one kind is chosen, though not the cheapest in price. Trapp v. Newport, supra.

Nor where bids are asked for vitrified brick, bitulithis, and bituminous macadam (Ex parte Paducah, supra); for vitrified brick and bitulithic paving (Campbell v. Southern Bitulithic Co. supra); for asphalt, vitrified brick, and bitulithic paving (Baltimore v. Flack, supra); for sheet asphalt, asphalt blocks, and bitulithic paving (Baltimore v. Gahan, supra); for wood and stone or different varieties of wood (Atty. Gen. ex rel. Cook v. Detroit, supra).

The court, in Connerville v. Merrill, supra, said: "There was no uncertainty in the material to be used, so far as the bidders were concerned. Thus, the bidders were put upon an equality, and the city and the property owners had the benefit of competition on each brand or special kind of the general material to be used. They were invited to submit bids for the improvement on three different kinds of material. The bids were made on this basis, and the lowest and best bid for either kind of improvement, that is to say, the lowest bid for artificial stone, was accepted."

Specifications otherwise sufficient are not objectionable in requiring estimates on certain alternatives therein named as to a part of the work. Schwitzer v. Board of Education (N. J. L.) 75 Atl. 447.

—under statutes expressly requiring specifications.

Under a statute providing that the city council, when desirous of making a street improvement, shall state the "kind" of improvement, and fix a date for receiving bids, etc., and giving the owners of two thirds of the adjoining property the right to veto the proposed improvement, it was held that a resolution of council which states that one of several named kinds of pavement will be used, to be selected after bids are received, is defective and void, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

as the abutting owners have a right to know the precise kind of pavement it is proposed to use, in order to know whether to object, and because the competitive bidding contemplated by statute would not necessarily be secured where bids are invited on various kind of improvements. Bluffton v. Miller, 33 Ind. App. 521, 70 N. E. 989.

So, also, it was held that a statute providing that public contracts shall be entered into with the lowest bidder, that the bids shall conform to the published notice, and that the notice "shall contain a description of the kind and amount of work to be done, and material to be furnished, as near as practicable," necessarily implies a determination by the officials, in advance of the publication of the notice, of the kind of material to be used in the proposed work; for without such determination it would be impossible to comply with the requirement as to the contents of the notice; and is not complied with when the advertisement is "for all the different kinds of modern pavements now in use." Coggeshall v. Des Moines, 78 Iowa, 235, 41 N. W. 617, 42 N. W. 630.

The court said: "It may be that combinations among bidders, or collusions between them and the council, would be as effectually prevented, and fair competition secured, by that as by any other plan that could be adopted. But it is a sufficient answer to all that was said in argument by counsel on that question, to say that the statute leaves to the council no discretion as to the course which shall be pursued."

So, under a statute authorizing a board of improvement to cause a street to be graded and paved or graveled or macadamized, and completed and improved according to such plan as they might adopt, and to let the work on ten days' notice to the parties who shall offer to do the same at the lowest prices in accordance with the plans and specifications of said board, it was held that the board must adopt plans and specifications for some one kind of pavement first, and cannot make plans and specifications for several kinds of pavements, make comment thereon. It is said: "The law requiring contracts to be let to the lowest bidder is based upon public economy, and originated perhaps in distrust of public officers whose duty it is to make contracts. It is of great importance to taxpayers, and ought not to be frittered away by exceptions. Contracts made in violation of it have been held void, and we think rightly." Wells v. Burnham, 20 Wis. 112, 116. "The object of the law is to protect the public against collusive contracts and prevent favoritism." State ex rel. Whedon v. York County, 13 Neb. 57, 12 N. W. 816. "The purpose of the rule is to secure fair competition upon equal terms to all bidders, and to remove all temptation for collusion, and opportunity for gain at the expense of the property owners by the municipal authorities." Diamond v. Mankato, 89 Minn. 48, 61 L.R.A. 448, 93 N. W. 911. "It cannot be doubted that the true intent of the act of 1874, and the ordinance passed in pursuance thereof, regulating the awarding of public contracts, is to secure the city the benefit and advantage of fair and just competition between bidders, and at the same time close, as far as possible, every avenue to favoritism and fraud in its varied forms." Mazet v. Pittsburgh, 137 Pa. 548, 561, 562, 20 Atl. 693, 697. "The constitutional provision was designed to secure economy in the line of public improvements to which it relates. Extravagance therein might arise either from the inattention or incompetency of the contracting officer, and his consequent failure to obtain favorable offers for contracts, or it might arise from the corruption or favoritism of such officer, and his consequent refusal to accept favorable offers when made. To prevent extravagance from the first source, the plan of public letting is adopted, the public are informed of contracts to be let, and its self-interest and rivalry are appealed to for proper offers upon them; to prevent extravagance from the latter source, all discretion is withheld from the contracting officer, he is bound to give the contract to the lowest bidder, and cannot let it out for individual gain or as a reward to another." Fones Bros. Hardware Co. v. Erb, 54 Ark. 645, 650, 13 L.R.A. 353, 17 S. W. 7, 8. Such being the purpose and objects to be accomplished by the law, let us examine the facts in the case at bar, and see if a con-and decide which to adopt, after bids are received. People ex rel. Ream Pav. Co. v. Board of Improvement, 43 N. Y. 227.

And this is true though some of the kinds of pavements specified were patented. Ibid. The court said that the statute "designed to open no such way for the exercise of favoritism. It designed that the work should be competed for as to price by contractors, and that this should be done in such a way that the lowest bidder could be determined by calculation without any exercise of judgment as to the relative advantages of different kinds of pavement."

In State ex rel. McMahon v. McKenzie, 9 Ohio C. C. N. S. 105, the court said: "In the matter of general materials for a public building, no discretion as to the choice can lawfully be reserved until after the bids are opened, when the statute expressly requires, as it does here, that specifications should be made in advance, and that the contract should be let to the lowest bidder." Accordingly, they held that under their statute a courthouse commission could not in their advertisement ask bids for limestone, sandstone, and granite of several varieties, and after bids were opened award a contract to the lowest bidder on any variety of granite.

In Stocking v. Warren Bros. Co. 134 Wis. 235, 114 N. W. 789, one section of a city charter provided generally that all public works estimated to cost exceeding $1,000 shall be let by contract to the lowest responsible and satisfactory bidder, and that the board of public works shall advertise for proposals, and that before advertising "a profile or plan of the work to be done, together with the specifications, shall be placed on file" for the inspection of bidders; another section specially applicable to street or paving contracts provided that "when any of the works before mentioned shall have been ordered to be done, and the plans for the same containing a description of the work, the material to be used, and such other matters as will give an intelligent idea of the work required, shall have been filed" for the inspection of bidders, bids may be advertised for. It was held (two judges dissenting) that bids could not be asked for several different kinds of pavements, the kind to be selected after bids were opened, even though the specifications as to each kind were complete, if it had been the sole one advertised for.

The writer of this note suggests that most, if not all, of the objections urged against specifications which name several different kinds of materials, one of which is to be chosen after bids are in, would be obviated if the contracting board would in advance decide upon the relative numerical efficiency and desirability of the different materials sought, and cause their determination to be inserted in the specifications. For example, if bids for paving are asked for brick and also for creosoted blocks, and it is determined in advance that their relative efficiency is as 2:3, then, if a bid for the former is $1,000 and for the latter $1,400, it may be easily known by a mere calculation that the latter is the better bid, uncertainty and the consequent danger of favoritism would be thus overcome, the field of competition widened, and the danger of combinations to enhance prices lessened by increasing the number of persons who may compete.

Council for defendants in error have, in an excellent and well-considered brief, said for this contract all which is possible to be said for it. It appears from the agreed statement of facts and the notice that plans and specifications for the main building were on file and available to all parties seeking to bid. They showed the size of the building, the rooms, every opening and partition, and doubtless disclosed the exact dimensions of every part of the structure. It was the heating and ventilating system which the parties involved in this controversy sought to bid on, and they, with the public, had before them the definite plans and specifications of the building. Furthermore, they were informed that the system to be installed was to be a steam force blast system, which, doubtless, to the men engaged in that business, had a definite, certain meaning. The system to be bid upon was to be controlled by automatic heat regulation in all rooms other than halls and toilets, board and superintendent room, wall radiation. This information, as is said, was doubtless well understood by men engaged in the business of installing heat and ventilation systems. With reference to the amount of air each pupil was to receive, and the degrees to which the different portions of the building were to be heated in the coldest weather, all were given information. Here, again, with the knowledge which men schooled in this line of work have, with the plans of the building before them giving information of the number and size of openings, size of the rooms, and other matters which they were to take into consideration, and knowing the temperature of the latitude where Lawton is situated, they would be able to figure very closely the size of the system necessary to be installed in order to bring about these results. But is not the foregoing all that can be said for the information given by the notice on which the board called for bids? It appears from the agreed statement of facts that the complete plans and specifications for the construction of the main building did not include plans and specifications for the heating and ventilating system. It is suggested by counsel for plaintiff in error that under the terms contained in the notice set out the steam force blast system to be installed might use boilers known as the high pressure tubular or low pressure tubular, and there might be used the high or low fire box boiler, commonly known as the locomotive type; that there might be used a low pressure cast-iron sectional boiler, or there might be used a water safety tube boiler; and that, in the matter of power, either gasoline power, steam power, electric or water motor power might be used, and in the matter of radiation, there might be used cast-iron radiation or pipe coil radiation, and that in the matter of registers, there might be used what are known as diffusers, or there might be used valve opening and closing apparatus or grilled or screen opening registers, and in reference to the automatic regulation, there might be used any one of three different systems, and it is contended by counsel that a variation in the adoption of these different kinds of engines or appliances would mean a difference in the cost to the purchaser. Furthermore, to our minds the absence of any specific plans or definite specifications leaves it uncertain whether one, two, or three boilers were desired, also their weight, durability, and also what would be the character of the pipes or conduits for the conveyance of the heat from the place where generated to the different parts of the building, whether of iron, sheet iron, or tin, and whether with or without asbestos wrapping, and numerous other details, all of which would make for either expense or economy in the system. These things would involve the permanence, desirability, and durability of the system proposed, and determine no doubt in a great measure whether it would endure and serve during the life of the building, or require renewal at an earlier date. There were likewise many other details left entirely to conjecture. For instance, there was no provision whatever as to which the successful bidder or the general contractors should perform the work and bear the burden of expense incident to arranging the basement walls to conform to the heating plans, provide fresh air intake from the outside air, or inlet to the tempering coils, or to provide for foul air gathering rooms in the attic, or who should set the roof ventilators furnished by the heating and plumbing contractors, or who should build in the floor sleeves, castings, and hangers as required. Neither was it determined in advance who should cut the openings in the walls, floors, partitions, ceilings, or roof as required: nor was there anything said in reference to who was to do the excavating required for the ducts and foundations, nor was it determined who should furnish the smokestack nor how it was to be built. If these things were to be performed by the contractor constructing the building, then the contractor securing the heating and ventilating contract would be relieved of it, and his bid to that extent would be diminished. If, on the other hand, he would be required to do this work, then his bid would be to that extent increased, and, without definite knowledge in advance, there was no way to compare bids for this work. To cover these details, therefore, the successful bidder herein as a part of his bid required all of this work to be done by the general contractor, and it was testified on his behalf that the work referred to above is the work required of the general contractor,—that is, the most of it, if not entirely all of it, in his contract. It was testified by plaintiff that there was no provision in the general plans for any intake or foul air gathering chambers, and that he expected to provide that and put it in, and that it was a part of the heating contractor's business to put in the hangers and to do his own excavating necessary to install his work. Necessarily, therefore, from these considerations, the successful bidder did not include in his bid the expense for this work, while at least one other contractor from his evidence expected to do it, and doubtless charged for it, all of which, while probably not materially affecting the system to be installed, did doubtless have a material effect on the price charged. Unquestionably each of the bidders who submitted his proposal to construct this system did so with the hope of securing the contract. There is no evidence in the record to raise a doubt on this proposition. And yet, two of them, each of whom submitted a cheaper bid than the one who received the contract, had their bids rejected, and the agreed statement of facts is that each of the plans and specifications was different. In other words, this simply meant that each party bid on his own plans and work, along with the material which he proposed to use to carry it out. No other bidder bid on that plan and on that material, but each likewise bid on another plan and work and different material, and the consequence is that while the result sought to be attained, to wit, the heat and ventilation for the building, might have been accomplished under the system adopted, there was but one bid offered, and no competition on it, and this bid may as well be termed the highest as the lowest.

The laws of Pennsylvania relating to the letting of city contracts provided (§ 6, act May 23, 1874, P. L. 233) that the same shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder. In the case of Mazet v. Pittsburgh, supra, the bidders on a certain kind of pavement were directed to prepare their own specifications, which was accordingly done. On a controversy arising, the supreme court, in the consideration of this law, and these facts, said: "There were no specifications as to what is called an asphalt pavement." As to that kind of pavement, bidders were directed, as charged in the bill, to prepare their own specifications, and that was accordingly done by each of the bidders. . . . In the face of the facts above referred to, all of which appear in the pleadings, it is idle to contend that the contract in question was regularly awarded in accordance with the charter and ordinances of the city. The charter requires contracts 'to be given to the lowest responsible bidder.' How can there be a lowest bidder, when parties proposing to bid are instructed to prepare their own specifications and submit them with their respective bids? The expression 'lowest bidder' necessarily implies a common standard by which to measure the respective bids, and that common standard must necessarily be previously prepared specifications of the work to be done, and materials to be furnished, etc., specifications freely accessible to all who may desire to compete for the contract, and upon which alone their respective bids must be based. The court was therefore clearly right in pronouncing the contract in question 'illegal, null, and void.' Not a respectable authority can be anywhere found to sustain it as a valid contract, under any system of competitive bidding such as the charter and ordinances of the city of Pittsburgh require."

The Constitution of the state of Arkansas (§ 16, art. 19) provides that all contracts for erecting public buildings shall be given to the lowest responsible bidder. The construction of this section was before the supreme court in the case of Fones Bros. Hardware Co. v. Erb, 54 Ark. 645, 13 L.R.A. 353, 17 S. W. 7, and of it the court said: "The method prescribed is well understood, clearly defined, and of distinctive character, specially adapting it to a conservation of public interests. It embodies three vital principles,—an offering to the public, an opportunity for competition, and a basis for an exact comparison of bids; and any statutory regulation of the matter which excludes or ignores either principle destroys the distinctive character of the system, and thwarts the purpose of its adoption. Any arrangement which excludes competition prevents a letting to the lowest bidder, and it does not matter that such an arrangement maintains the form of public letting; if it excludes the essential principle of competition, there can be no real public letting. . . . When a contract to build a bridge is to be let, there are two kinds of competition that may arise: First, that between persons desiring to build different kinds of bridges; and, second, that between those desiring to build the same kind. And, as was said by Judge Christianity in discussing a provision similar to that under consideration, the bidding which it contemplates is of the latter kind,—bidding for the same particular thing, to be done according to the same specifications. For, says he, no bids for different kinds of work, and referring to different specifications, could be recognized as coming in competition with each other for the purpose of determining the lowest bid, within the requirement of this section, without opening the door to the same corrupt combinations, and furnishing facilities for the same fraudulent practices, which it was the purpose of this provision to prevent. Atty. Gen. ex rel. Cook v. Detroit, 26 Mich. 263. As the competition contemplated is that between those desiring to do the same particular thing according to the same specifications, it is obviously essential that an opportunity should be given all persons to enter into competition for the specific thing which is the subject of the letting; and such opportunity cannot be afforded, unless the specific thing to be let has been determined upon and made known. The Constitution contains no express provision with regard to plans and specifications, but the requirement of an award to the lowest bidder implies the further requirement that such information shall be put within the reach of bidders as will enable them to understand the offering and bid intelligently, and enable the representatives of the county to know who is the lowest bidder."

In the case of Chippewa Bridge Co. v. Durand, 122 Wis. 85, 106 Am. St. Rep. 931, 99 N. W. 603, it appears that in reference to a certain bridge which was being built, the definite plans and specifications were not agreed upon in advance, each bidder being permitted to arrange details to suit his own manufacturing facilities, subject to general specifications and subject to the approval of the city engineer. The laws of Wisconsin under which this work was done provided in substance that all contracts for work should be let to the lowest reasonable, responsible bidder. In reference to this law and the contract, the court said: "The reason for such enactments as the one in question is, in the main, to preclude public officers from making contracts in such a way as to enable them to sacrifice the public interests to satisfy favoritism, mere improvidence, or to a corrupt desire for private gain. There is no better safeguard against infidelity of officials in that respect yet discovered, than to require municipal contracts to be publicly let, the scope of the service to be performed and the terms of payment being so definitely mapped out in advance as to enable persons experienced in respect thereto to estimate with reasonable certainty the actual cost thereof, and to require the award to be made without change in such service or terms. A requirement of that kind forms part of the governmental system of nearly every political organization from the nation itself down to the minor governmental agencies in towns. . . . Many charters contain such express direction. In such circumstances it has been uniformly held that failure to call for bids in the prescribed way, or to provide plans and specifications for the work within the convenient reach of bidders, is fatal to the proceeding. . . . In harmony with that, we hold that the charter in question required, as an essential to the validity of the contracts for the bridge, the preparation of proper plans and specifications for those parts of the bridge proposed to be let separately, the placing thereof within convenient reach of all desiring to consult the same for the purpose of bidding for the work, and the giving of public notice in some way reasonably appropriate to reach all persons likely to desire to participate in the competition."

In the case of Ricketson v. Milwaukee, 105 Wis. 591, 47 L.R.A. 685, 81 N. W. 864, it appears there was a call made by the board of public works of the city for contracts for the construction of a garbage crematory including all necessary buildings, which were required to be of brick, with stone foundation and iron roof, for the incineration of all garbage within the city limits, such buildings and equipments suitable for the reduction and disposal of 100 tons of garbage per day. The bidder was to specify the system, the size, dimensions, and manner of construction, along with the number of tons of fuel required, and the number of men necessary for its operation. Some other details were given. General plans and specifications were prepared by the board of public works, but the bidders were left to submit the plans and specifications of the building, showing a description of the buildings, machinery, furnaces, and appurtenances. The law contemplated that there should be competition among bidders for the work, and that a plan or profile accompanied by specifications for doing the same, along with a description of the kind and quality of material furnished, should be placed on file at the office of the board for information of bidders and others. Speaking of the general specifications adopted, the supreme court of Wisconsin in the foregoing case said: "The general specifications adopted required each bidder to submit with their bids, 'complete plans and specifications, fully showing and describing the buildings, machinery, furnaces, and other necessary appurtenances of the entire cremation plant in detail, with all dimensions given.' This was a plunge in the dark. In a general way, such specifications called for the construction of a complete garbage cremation plant capable of destroying not less than 100 tons of garbage per day. No system of garbage cremation was adopted. No dimensions of buildings or description of machinery was given. Each bidder might bid with reference to using the smokestack of the sewerage pumping works, if it was of sufficient height and capacity, and the board approved of its use. Each bidder was to use his judgment as to what were 'proper foundations,' except that they were to be stone or concrete. Ample provisions for windows were to be made, but how many, or what dimensions or quality, was left to the bidder. A coal shed of sufficient size to store six months' supply of fuel was to be erected, leaving it for the contractor to determine its size and shape. No attempt was made to describe or locate the machinery or any of the necessary appurtenances. The number of furnaces was left to the discretion of the bidder, except that the daily capacity must be as stated. "The plant must be complete in every respect," a result greatly to be hoped for, but left to the judgment of each individual bidder. . . . 'The indefinite character of the specifications, and the absence of plans, had the effect of stifling all competition. Each bidder was called upon to make a proposal, resting largely upon his own judgment, with absolutely no guide as to details. No one could tell which was the lowest bid, because no two would be on the same basis. That fact alone condemns the action taken. . . . If the city has not a sufficiently definite idea of what it wants, to cause proper plans and specifications to be made, then it must wait until further information can be secured, or the plan has become so far developed as to be more than a long-felt want."

But, say counsel for defendants, to pursue such a policy, and specify the particular thing required, would necessarily exclude everything else, and thereby defeat the statute by limiting competition, one of the very things which the law was intended to secure. Counsel in this contention, it seems to us, are correct if the board seeking to secure a heating system should have designated the identical make of engines, and the identical regulators, and the specific make of each article which was to go into the system, if this would throw the furnishing of these different articles into the hands of people who had a monopoly thereon, and thereby exclude from actual competition all other bidders. It is not the intention of the law that such a condition shall arise, nor yet that the public be denied the benefit thereof where a patented article is shown to be better for the purpose desired than another. A discussion of this proposition by the learned Justice Cooley of the supreme court of Michigan is contained in the case of Atty. Gen. ex rel. Cook v. Detroit, 26 Mich. 263, wherein it is said: "The requirement that contracts shall be let to the lowest bidder is, in many cases, peculiarly susceptible of abuse. Its purpose is to secure competition among contractors for public works and supplies, and to give the public the benefit thereof. In some cases the most ample competition would be invited by presenting to bidders complete and particular specifications, which indicate the precise things wanted or which are to be done, and leave nothing to discretion or negotiation afterwards. But this could only be true where the case was such that many persons could bid for the work or materials, and would have a legal right to do the one and furnish the other, and where the materials were not monopolized in single hands, but were readily obtainable from several sources. If a patented article were desired, which was owned by a single person who refused to sell the right to territory or to fix a royalty, or if stone or any other material were required, and a single person owned all within a practicable distance of the place where it was to be used, nothing could be more obvious than that proposals which confined bids to the particular article or material would invite no valuable competition, and that the protection of the public must lie in the power of the council to reject unreasonable offers. In such a case nothing is easier than for the council to obey strictly the letter of the law, and yet dishonestly and corruptly award a contract to one who is lowest bidder for no other reason than because no one can bid against him, and who, having a practical monopoly, is allowed to fix his own terms. Now, if the purpose of the charter is to secure competition of work or supplies for the public, something is necessarily left to the discretion of the council; and they must determine in each case what competition the nature of the case will admit of, and what is the best method to secure it. If they invite proposals for a particular thing or process, they necessarily, in so doing, exclude everything else which might have been substituted for the thing called for; and there is no clearer field for corruption and favoritism than in shaping proposals, if in fact the city is in corrupt hands. The matter of paving affords an apt illustration of this truth. From the proposals before us, it would be a reasonable inference that there are several patented wood pavements nearly equal in value and cost; but if the council call for proposals for one only, they necessarily exclude all the others; and I am aware of no legislation, and I can conceive of no process, by which they can be compelled always to make the selection from public motives exclusively, if their disposition shall be to do otherwise. It would be worse than idle for the law to mark out, or for the council to follow, any one unvarying course in these cases. The same course which under some circumstances would be manifestly proper and most for the public good, under others, would be so plainly detrimental, and place the public so completely at the mercy of interested parties, that it could not be adopted by a body having any liberty of choice without justly subjecting themselves to the charge of corruption. It must therefore be manifest that any inflexible rule which the law should lay down, and which should trust nothing to the integrity, and nothing to the discretion, of the council, must necessarily work mischief in many cases, and it would be productive of good, I think, in few cases, if any."

Counsel also ask, Is it the purpose of the law to leave nothing to the integrity, discretion, or judgment of the board? In our judgment this question is in a measure, at least, answered in the case last discussed. In that case the common council of the city of Detroit determined to have a certain avenue paved, and instead of determining in advance what particular kind of pavement should be put down, and confining their invitation for proposals to that kind, caused definite plans and specifications for each of several different kinds of wood and stone pavement to be prepared and filed with the comptroller, and then advertised that sealed proposals would be received for paving the avenue with either of the different kinds already named. Thus, there was submitted to all an opportunity to bid on the different plans, kinds, and characters of paving which were to be considered by the council. Each bidder could bid on all or any, but no bidder could select something different and prepare his own plans and specifications, and then quietly bid upon them and have them considered. There was, by the council, determined in advance definitely what they desired to have bids upon, and thus there was known to each bidder in advance the identical things which would be considered by the council, and each bidder was enabled and required thereby to compete with every other bidder; hence each would be in direct competition with all others. This character of discretion seems to meet the sanction of nearly if not quite all of the courts, and especially is this true of many cases to which counsel for defendants have called our attention. For instance, in the case of Ampt v. Cincinnati, 8 Ohio S. & C. P. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Dec. 624, and afterward affirmed by the supreme court of the state, the syllabus reads as follows: "Under the statute in question there can be no objection to inviting bids for certain kinds of work in a certain event, and for certain kinds of work in another event; so long as the work to be done, under the circumstances and surroundings under which it is to be done, is understood and fully known by both parties, then there can be no objection to alternative bidding. In such cases the bidders can bid upon the specific work to be done, and the commissioners can adopt whichever plan or system they think best."

Also, in the case of Baltimore v. Flack, 104 Md. 107, 64 Atl. 702, the commissioners of the city of Baltimore for opening streets prepared three separate and distinct specifications, each exact and complete in itself, and each calling for a different kind and character of pavement. After advertisement one bid was submitted on one kind, two on another, and three on the third; the first bid was rejected because it was not based upon specifications furnished, but which the bidder claimed would produce a pavement as good as that called for. In the consideration of that case, the court of appeals of Maryland said: "Competition was invited and secured both as to materials and as to price, and the contract was awarded to the lowest responsible bidder on the material selected, though there was another bidder whose price was lower on a different material. Was this method of procedure and this action in violation of §§ 14 and 15 of the charter? There are two kinds of competition,—the one, competition between different things which will equally answer the same general purpose; and the other, competition between the prices bid respectively upon each of those distinct things. . . . Thus, by the selection of the materials or the kind of pavement after the bids have been received, combinations between bidders to inflate prices may be in a great measure avoided, since it is altogether improbable that parties who compete for the adoption of their respective materials will all ask exorbitant prices, as each party will most likely strive by depressing prices to secure the contract. As in such an instance no bidder knows in advance which kind of pavement will be selected, each is in reality stimulated to propose terms which, in order to secure him the contract, will produce the best results so far as the public are concerned. . . . That such a method as that pursued in this instance may be open to the charge of being dominated by favoritism, or of being corruptly manipulated, may be true, but it is equally true, and much more likely, that both favoritism and fraud will control if the material is secretly selected, and the bids are confined to that one material, since, by inviting proposals for one particular thing or process, the public officials necessarily exclude everything else which might have been substituted for the thing called for, and there is no clearer field for corruption and favoritism than in secretly shaping proposals, if in fact the city is in corrupt hands."

Thus, it will be seen that there is in certain instances and cases a discretion vested in boards charged with duties similar to the school board in this case. Nor does this seem to be the sole discretion, for, by the phrase "lowest responsible bidder," as used in the statute, it is not intended to limit the power of the board to a simple examination of the different bids tendered without reference from whom they come, and blindly select the one solely from the consideration that it is the lowest in price, but it requires the board to select the bidder who, all things being considered, has ability to respond to the requirements of the contract, having full regard to the subject-matter thereof. People ex rel. Assyrian Asphalt Co. v. Kent, 160 Ill. 655, 43 N. E. 760; Boseker v. Wabash County, 88 Ind. 267; Hoole v. Kinkead, 16 Nev. 217. Or, as is said in the case of Com. ex rel. Snyder v. Mitchell, 82 Pa. 343: "The word 'responsible,' as employed in the act, when applied to contracts requiring for their execution not only pecuniary ability, but also judgment and skill, imposes, not merely a ministerial duty upon the city authorities, such as would result did their powers extend no further than to ascertain whose was the lowest bid, and the pecuniary responsibility of the bidder and his sureties, but also duties and powers which are deliberative and discretionary. In this we concur with the court below. For it is scarcely open to doubt but that the word under consideration, as it is used in the statute, means something more than pecuniary ability. In a contract such as the one in controversy, the work must be promptly, faithfully, and well done; it must or ought to be conscientious work. To do such work requires prompt, skilful, and faithful men. A dishonest contractor may impose work upon the city, in spite of the utmost caution of the superintending engineer, apparently good, and even capable of bearing its duty for a time, which in the end may prove to be a total failure, and worse than useless. Granted that from such a contract or pecuniary damages may be recovered by an action at law, this is at best but a last resort, that often produces more vexation than profit,—a mere patch upon a bad job, an exceedingly meager compensation, at best, for the delay and incalculable damage resulting to a great city from the want of a competent supply of water. The city requires honest work, not lawsuits. Were we to accept the interpretation insisted upon by the relators, the difference of a single dollar in a bid for the most important contract might determine the question in favor of some unskilful rogue as against an upright and skilful mechanic. Again, we know that, as a rule, cheap work and cheap workmen are but convertible terms for poor work and poor workmen; and if the city, for the mere sake of cheapness, must put up with these, it is indeed in a most unfortunate position."

And, in our judgment, the discretion which counsel for defendants insist is vested in the school board is limited to that set forth in the foregoing authorities. To extend it further, and to allow the board to make general plans and specifications without definitely and specifically enumerating and fixing the quality and quantity of the thing required and the manner of the construction, so that all parties bidding will have presented to them the same thing, would be to open the door for the entrance of every element which the statute intended to exclude. Counsel asks in all seriousness, Shall the board be required to specify the size of the bolts, rivets, etc.? This question in our judgment is answered in the case of Ampt v. Cincinnati, supra, cited by counsel to sustain their contention which holds in substance that, where plans and specifications previously adopted are sufficiently definite to convey to the bidders or those engaged in the work the required knowledge upon which to base a definite bid for the work to be done, this will be considered a compliance with the statute, no matter how meager such plans and specifications may appear to persons unaccustomed to such matters. This holding virtually states the conclusion to which we arrive in this case, to wit, that the plans and specifications previously adopted must be sufficiently definite to enable all bidders to make a definite bid for definite work to be done. Now, if it is necessary in order to furnish a definite basis for a definite bid in this or any other case, to specify the size of the bolts, rivets, etc., then it is necessary to do this in order to comply with the statute. Otherwise, not. That it was necessary for the plans and specifications to be more definite than the information contained in the published notice gave is manifest from the agreed statement, which shows that the plans bid upon and submitted by the different parties were all different. The information given by the board was not sufficiently definite for similar plans to be prepared, and the bids range all the way from $10,500 to $11,340. The plans and specifications accompanied by the highest bid were by the board accepted, and it may have been that both the other bidders would have offered a lower bid thereon, had they been given an opportunity, and perhaps many other bidders would have participated had they seen them, and some responsible party might have bid much less than either. The taxpayers who will be required to meet the amount bid were entitled under this statute to have the benefit of that chance, and the successful bidders were not entitled to have considered, nor was the board authorized to accept, a bid upon such unadopted plans and specifications.

From the foregoing consideration it will be seen that the judgment of the trial court rendered herein is reversed. We wish to say, however, that this is not done in response to anything leading us to believe that the board in the course taken committed either fraud or favoritism, or that the successful bidders did aught else than in good faith respond to the call made, and secured the contract in an honest and conscientious endeavor. In holding as we do we give to the statute the only construction to which we deem it susceptible, and in which public policy and the law both meet. The state of Oklahoma and its several subdivisions, counties, townships, cities, school districts, etc., are entering upon an era of public improvement. A statehouse is to be built, college and school buildings, courthouses, and bridges are to be erected and constructed all over the state. These improvements are to be paid for from taxes levied upon our whole people, and thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars are to be expended therefor. The boards and public agencies intrusted with the important and responsible duties of selecting the materials, deciding upon the character of the work, letting the contracts, and spending this money, should be surrounded by every reasonable safeguard possible. This should be done not only for the safety of the funds and the public welfare, but for their own protection. They are seldom engaged because of any peculiar training or fitness they possess over that common to all, and their compensation is frequently wholly inadequate to cover the time and energy they are required to bring to their labor. Under these circumstances a requirement that shall fix in advance upon certain definite plans and specifications or propositions to be considered, and then submit these for open competition upon sealed proposals, the contract then to be awarded in an impartial way to the lowest responsible bidder, will tend to remove them from temptation and opportunity for fraud or favoritism. It will do more; it will materially assist in removing suspicion of unfairness and favoritism, and relieve honest men upon whom these duties devolve of unjust charges.

Taking judicial notice of these conditions and speaking thereto, the supreme court of Michigan in the case of Holmes v. Detroit, 120 Mich. 226, 45 L.R.A. 121, 77 Am. St. Rep. 587, 79 N. W. 200, says: "When a public work is to be undertaken, those having it in charge are seldom left to conduct their negotiations, make the contracts, and answer to the public for a faithful performance of duty. Everyone who has anything to sell insists on being heard; one accuses another of bribery; the board having the matter in charge, and its individual members, are accused of corruption; and after the award the work is delayed by litigation and injunctions, to the great inconvenience and cost of the taxpayers, and almost uniformly without any good result. So prevalent are these practices that they have become most serious obstacles to public improvement, and prolific sources of slander and vituperation, until many of our best citizens refuse to give to municipalities the benefit of their services, lest they be subjected to such charges. These things are so common that we may properly take notice of them, and we may well doubt a construction of a law which shall encourage them and produce such results." Likewise speaks the Supreme Court of the United States through the late Justice Peckham in the case of McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 651, 43 L. ed. 1117, 1122, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 839: "Upon general principles it must be apparent that biddings for contracts for public works cannot be surrounded with too many precautions for the purpose of obtaining perfectly fair and bona fide bids. Such precautions are absolutely necessary in order to prevent the successful perpetration of fraud in the way of combinations among those who are ostensible rivals, but who in truth are secretly banded together for the purpose of obtaining contracts from public bodies such as municipal and other corporations at a higher figure than they otherwise would. Just how the fraud is to be successfully worked out by the combination, it is not necessary to show. It is enough to see what the natural tendency is. Public policy requires that officers of such corporations, acting in the interest of others, and not using the sharp eye of a practical man engaged in the conduct of his own business, and not controlled by the powerful motive of self-interest, should, so far as possible, and for the sake of the public whom they represent, be protected from the dangers arising out of a concealed combination, and from fictitious bids." If the public is to receive the services of its best men for these unremunerative, but important, duties, it should, to the extent that is possible, shield them from temptation, and, entering honest, enable them to come out unsullied. The conclusion to which we have come is not only responsive to the language of the act, but will most nearly attain and effect these salutary results. Under this, good men, without fear of being corrupted or slandered, will be more inclined to tender their services, and the dishonest man will find more difficulty in plundering the public. All of which is of the highest importance to the citizenship of Oklahoma, just entering upon an era of extraordinary public improvement.

No other questions raised have had our consideration. The plaintiff is a resident taxpayer, and as such has such interest as will give him a standing to bring this action. Kellogg v. School Dist. No. 10, 13 Okla. 285, 74 Pac. 110.

The judgment is accordingly reversed, and the case is remanded to the District Court of Comanche county, with instructions to set it aside and enter one sustaining plaintiff's petition.

ERROR to the District Court for Noble County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property by the obstruction by defendant of a street. Reversed.

Statement by Hayes, J.:

This action was brought by the plaintiff in error as plaintiff in the district court of Noble county, Oklahoma territory, against defendant in error as defendant, seeking to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in error on account of the construction of a railway by the defendant in error upon one of the streets in the city of Perry. Plaintiff alleges in its petition that it is the owner of two certain

Note. — Sufficiency of equitable title to sustain action for injury to real property.

The general question as to the sufficiency of an equitable title to sustain an action for trespass to land, is considered in the note to Russell v. Meyer, 47 L.R.A. 637. As suggested in that note, it is unnecessary to invoke or rely upon an equitable title where one in actual possession brings trespass for injury to the possession against a mere intruder, or one who cannot show a better legal title or right of possession. In some cases (e. g., Witheral v. Muskegon Booming Co. 68 Mich. 48, 13 Am. St. Rep. 325, 35 N. W. 758; Honsee v. Hammond, 39 Barb. 89; Arnold v. Pfoutz, 117 Pa. 103, 11 Atl. 871; Hough v. Patrick, 26 Vt. 435), where the action was by one in actual possession, against a mere intruder, for an injury to the possession, the fact that the plaintiff was the equitable owner, or was in possession under a contract with the owner, is alluded to, but the actual possession alone seems to have been sufficient to sustain the action.

As is said in George v. Fisk, 32 N. H. 45: "Where the plaintiff is in possession, in describing his right or interest in the property against a wrongdoer for the recovery of damages, and not the land itself, it is sufficient to state in the declaration that the plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was possessed of the land. His rights and interest are matters of evidence only."

When, however, as in Russell v. Meyer, supra, the plaintiff has neither legal title nor actual possession, the question may arise whether his equitable title will draw to itself the constructive possession, so as to entitle him to maintain the action.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Bullard (Tex. Civ. App.) 127 S. W. 1152, it was held that a purchaser of land under an executory contract, afterwards fully performed, was entitled to maintain an action against a railroad company for damage to the grass by fire, notwithstanding that, at the time of the injury, the vendor was in possession. It is stated in this case that the vendor remained in possession but a very short time lots in the city of Perry fronting upon A street, a public street in said city, and that about the 1st day of October, 1903, the defendant, without the consent of plaintiff, erected a large fill immediately in front of the plaintiff's property, and built in front of said property a steam railway track a distance of about 20 feet from the curb line of plaintiff's property, thereby greatly obstructing the means of ingress and egress to and from said lots, and rendering them unfit for business purposes, and that, on account of such obstruction, said property of the plaintiff was diminished and depreciated in value in the total sum of $3,000. A second cause of action was alleged in plaintiff's complaint, but, as same appears to have been abandoned by plaintiff in the trial of the case, we do not consider it necessary to make further reference to same. Defendant filed its answer, and denied that plaintiff was the owner of the lots at the time said railway was built by it, and at the time said damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff occurred, and further averred that it had obtained from the city of Perry a grant, granting to it the right to use and occupy certain of the parks, streets, and alleys in the city of Perry; that A street is one of the streets, the use of which for railway purposes had been granted to it by the city of Perry, and that it erected railway tracks, roadbeds, and switches complained of in plaintiff's petition on said street by virtue of and under the authority conferred and granted to it after the fire, and distinctly disavowed any injury to himself.

But in Gates v. Comstock, 107 Mich. 546, 65 N. W. 544, although the defendant was apparently a mere intruder, or at least, was not connected with the legal title, the court said that, in order to maintain trespass, one must have the legal title or be in actual possession of the premises; and that a vendee in a land contract who had neither actual nor constructive possession could not maintain the action. In this case, however, the plaintiff, at the time of the trespass, merely held a license to enter upon the land for the purpose of cutting timber, from one who had an executory contract for the purchase of the land; and it is expressly stated that he could not cut or allow the timber to be cut without the consent of his licensor (the purchaser under the executory contract). Subsequently to the trespass, the plaintiff procured an assignment both from the vendor and the purchaser; but, as it was not alleged in the declaration, he could not rely thereon.

And in Olson v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 89 Minn. 280, 94 N. W. 871, it was held that a purchaser under an executory contract, entitled by implication to the right of possession, but not in actual possession, could not maintain an action of trespass quare clausum against defendant, apparently a mere intruder, for the reason that the constructive possession was in the vendor, as the owner of the legal title, if no other person was in actual possession. The court cited in support of its decision Moon v. Avery, 42 Minn. 405, 44 N. W. 257, but that case merely held that the plaintiff could not maintain an action of trespass committed before he acquired the title to the property, and at a time when, so far as appears, he had neither actual possession nor equitable title.

In Gilbert v. McDonald, 94 Minn. 289, 110 Am. St. Rep. 368, 102 N. W. 712, the right of plaintiff to maintain an action for trespass committed by mere intruders while the plaintiff had an equitable or inchoate title by virtue of the filing of an application for a specific tract of land under a soldier's additional homestead certificate was upheld. And under similar circumstances the right to maintain an action for conversion of logs was sustained in Hastay v. Bonness, 84 Minn. 120, 86 N. W. 896. But in these cases the patent had issued from the government subsequently to the trespass, and was held to relate back to the date of the application.

In Newman v. Mountain Park Land Co. 85 Ark. 208, 122 Am. St. Rep. 27, 107 S. W. 391, the right of one who, at the time of the alleged trespass, was merely a vendee under an executory contract, and not in actual possession, to maintain an action of trespass under the statute to recover treble damages against the vendor and a third person, was denied upon the ground that to entitle one to maintain an action of trespass to realty he must have the legal title to, or be in actual possession of, the land. It was held, however, that the action could be maintained against the vendor as an equitable action for waste upon removal to the chancery court, but that the third person was not a party to the action. It will be observed that one of the defendants in this case was the vendor, and the other defendant was perhaps acting under the vendor's authority. The court might perhaps have ruled otherwise as to the right to maintain trespass if the defendants had been mere intruders without title.

The right of the owner of the equitable title, not in actual possession, to maintain an action of trespass, is also denied in Van Buskirk v. Dunlap, 2 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 233. The defendant in this case was apparently a mere intruder. The damage was apparently one to the freehold, or a permanent damage, though the decision is not expressly limited to such a case.

See also note in 47 L.R.A. 638, for other cases on the question whether the equitable title will draw to itself the constructive possession, so as to enable the holder thereof to maintain the action.

When, as in FOSTER LUMBER CO. v. ARKANSAS VALLEY & WESTERN R. CO., the owner of the equitable title, though in actual possession, seeks to maintain an action under the ordinance of the city of Perry, granting it the right to build upon said street a railway. Plaintiff introduced evidence to sustain the allegations of its complaint, and rested its case. Thereupon defendant demurred to the plaintiff's evidence, which was sustained, and judgment rendered for defendant. A further statement of facts will appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. H. B. Martin and D. M. Tibbetts for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. James B. Diggs and Flynn & Ames for defendant in error.

Hayes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff introduced in evidence in support of its allegation of ownership of said lots a deed from Timothy McGrath, Amos B. Fitts, and Fred L. Bailey, as trustees for the town site of Perry, Oklahoma, to Thomas S. Foster, of date the 2d day of April, 1895, conveying to the said Thos. S. Foster lots 7 and 8, in block 46, in the city of Perry, and being the lots involved in this action, and further introduced in evidence a deed of date the 25th day of July, 1896, from Thos. S. Foster, conveying said lots to Benj. B. Foster. The deposition of Benj. B. Foster was then read in evidence, by which it was proved that about the time of the opening of the town site of Perry, said Thos. S. Foster and Benj. B. Foster, as a partnership, were engaged in the lumber business in the city of Perry; that said for permanent injuries to the property, the equitable title must be invoked and relied on, since the actual possession alone would not be sufficient to sustain the action, even as against a mere wrongdoer. The distinction in this respect between an action for injury to the possession and an action for permanent injury to the freehold is clearly indicated by McKenzie v. Ohio River R. Co. 27 W. Va. 306, where it is said that the wife's actual possession of the property would of itself have entitled her alone to recover for a mere nuisance or disturbance of the possession, without joining her husband; and her equitable title to the fee, under a conveyance directly from her husband to her, which, by the local statute, only gave her an equitable estate, was sufficient to support the action by her for a permanent injury to the freehold. To the same effect is Clay v. St. Albans, 43 W. Va. 539, 64 Am. St. Rep. 883, 27 S. E. 368.

In McDonald v. Bear River & A. Water & Min. Co. 13 Cal. 220, 1 Mor. Min. Rep. 626, it was held that an instrument, insufficient to pass the legal title, because not under seal, created an equitable interest, which, being united with the present possession, enabled the grantee to maintain an action for an interruption of the possession or any injury to the property.

And the right of the vendee in actual possession of land under an executory contract, to maintain an action against the wrongdoer for permanent injury, is upheld in Hueston v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 76 Minn. 251, 79 N. W. 92 (injury by boom causing overflow of land); Hastings & G. I. R. Co. v. Ingalls, 15 Neb. 123, 16 N. W. 762; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Brown, 29 Neb. 492, 46 N. W. 39; Gartner v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 71 Neb. 444, 98 N. W. 1052 (damage by railroad embankment); Gotshall v. J. Langdon & Co. 16 Pa. Super. Ct. 158 (trespasser mining coal on land); Virginia R. Co. v. Jeffries, 110 Va. 471, 66 S. E. 731 (damage by railroad embankment).

In the Hueston Case, the court said: "The plaintiff was rightfully in possession under his contract, the terms and conditions 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) of which he had kept and performed up to that date. He was the equitable owner of the land, and the vendor held the legal title merely as security for the deferred payments of the purchase money. Upon full performance of his contract plaintiff was entitled to the conveyance of the property. The general rule is that damages in an action of trespass upon real property may be such as are appropriate to the tenure by which the plaintiff holds. Possession alone will entitle him to recover damages for any injury solely affecting it. . . . In this case, the injury is wholly to plaintiff. He will have to pay his vendor the full contract price, notwithstanding that the premises may have been depreciated in value by the trespass."

In Honsee v. Hammond, 39 Barb. 91, upholding the right to maintain the action for injury to the possession, the court said it was unnecessary to inquire whether the plaintiff, who was in actual possession as holder of an executory contract, was entitled to recover for an injury to the freehold.

In Virginia R. Co. v. Jeffries, supra, it was further held that, the contract having been performed subsequently to the injury, the wrongdoer could not take advantage of the fact that, at the time of the trespass, it could not have been enforced against the vendor if the latter had objected.

Wrightsville & T. R. Co. v. Holmes, 85 Ga. 668, 11 S. E. 658, merely denies the right of a husband and wife to maintain jointly an action of trespass to recover for a damage to the freehold, where the husband purchased the land with money belonging to the wife, and took the deed to himself. The court did not pass upon the right of the wife, as the equitable owner, to maintain an action in her own name.

But the right of a vendee in possession under an executory contract which did not give him any possessory interest in the land, to recover against a stranger for damages to the freehold, was denied in Des Jardins v. Thunder Bay River Boom Co. 95 Mich. 140, 54 N. W. 718, upon authority of Moyer v. Scott, 30 Mich. 345 (cited in the earlier note).

partnership occupied said lots as a lumber yard during the existence of the partnership; that later there was organized the Foster Lumber Company, a corporation, to whom was sold all the property and assets, including the real estate, of the partnership theretofore composed of Thos. S. Foster and Benj. B. Foster; that from the time of the opening of the town site of Perry, said lots had been occupied either by the partnership or by the plaintiff in this action; that while the deed to said lots was taken in the name of Thos. S. Foster, who afterwards conveyed the same to Benj. B. Foster, the purchase price of same was paid out of the funds of the partnership, and that said lots never, in fact, belonged to either of the Fosters, but were at all times the property of the partnership, and that, when the assets of said partnership were sold to the Foster Lumber Company, plaintiff in error, said lots were sold to and became the property of said Foster Lumber Company, but that no deed of conveyance was ever executed by Benj. B. Foster to the plaintiff; that the Foster Lumber Company paid for all the improvements on the lots, which amounted to something over $1,000, and that said company had paid the taxes thereon. To the introduction of this testimony defendant objected. The court at the time sustained the objection as to part of same, and later, upon motion of defendant, struck out all that part of the deposition that tended to prove that plaintiff was the owner of said lots, and that, while the legal title to the same was in Benj. B. Foster at the time the alleged damages were sustained and at the time of the trial, he had no interest whatever in said lots; that he had never occupied or been in possession of the same; and that said lots had been paid for by plaintiff, and had been occupied by it as a lumber yard for a number of years.

To the action of the court rejecting said evidence, plaintiff in error makes its first assignment of error. The question presented by this assignment of error resolves itself into the proposition whether an action for damages to real property may be maintained by the holder of the equitable title. If it cannot, then said evidence was incompetent. The evidence offered by plaintiff and excluded by the court tended to prove that Benj. B. Foster held at the time of the trial and at the time of the alleged injuries involved in this action the legal title to said lots as the trustee in resulting trust for the benefit of the plaintiff. It is contended by defendant in error that this action, being for the recovery of permanent injuries or damages to the freehold, cannot be maintained by any other person than the one holding the legal title to the property injured. Sutherland on Damages, § 1012, says: "Damages in this action [referring to an action for trespass] may be such as are appropriate to the tenure by which the plaintiff holds, and such as result from the injury suffered. Possession alone will entitle him to recover damages for any injury solely affecting it. If he seeks to recover for the future, he must show that his title gives him an interest in the damages claimed, and he can recover none except such as affect his own right, unless he holds in such relation to the other parties interested that his recovery will bar their claim." In the case of Houston v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 76 Minn. 251, 79 N. W. 92, the plaintiff sought to recover damages resulting to a certain mill and lands adjacent thereto by reason of the de-

As to whether the equitable title will sustain an action for permanent injury or injury to the freehold, see also the case cited in the note in 47 L.R.A. 639.

The question as to the effect of the equitable title to sustain the action also arises where the action is against the owner of the legal title, or one claiming under him.

Thus, a vendee who goes into possession under an executory agreement is but a tenant at will, and cannot maintain ejectment or trespass against the vendor, or one taking title from him. Bick v. Hill, 27 Mo. App. 554; Richardson v. Thornton, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 458.

But in Skinner v. Terry, 134 N. C. 305, 46 S. E. 517, it was held that the equitable title of the purchaser under a decree for specific performance would have entitled him to maintain an action against the vendor for possession of the land, or for trespass thereon, and would, therefore, enable him to maintain an action for an injury to his possession against one who claimed under a deed from the vendor, sub-30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sequently to the rendition of the decree. See further on this point, the cases cited in the note in 47 L.R.A. 637.

In Ruggles v. Nantucket, 11 Cush. 433, the court said that even assuming that a full and clear equitable title would enable one to maintain an action against a town for the destruction of a house to prevent a fire, under a statute giving such right of action to the "owner," yet that one who merely held a parol contract for the land, under which he would be entitled to a deed upon payment of the entire purchase money, only part of which had been paid, was not the equitable owner, and could not maintain the action. See also cases cited in note in 47 L.R.A. 639.

Cases like Brown v. Arkansas C. R. Co. 72 Ark. 456, 81 S. W. 613, and Olson v. Seattle, 30 Wash. 687, 71 Pac. 201, as to the equitable owner's right to compensation when the land is taken for a public use, are, of course, not within the scope of this note.

defendant's having built on an island in the Mississippi river a short distance below plaintiff's lands a boom for the purpose of catching logs, thereby causing the river to overflow plaintiff's land, and to break into his mill, and to greatly injure his land and mill. The evidence developed that the plaintiff occupied the land at the time the injury was suffered as the vendee under an executory contract of sale. Defendant denied plaintiff's right of recovery on the ground that plaintiff did not possess the legal title to the property injured, and contended that the right of recovery for same, if any, was in his vendor. The court held that plaintiff could recover both for the injuries to the land and to the mill, and, commenting upon same, said: "The general rule is that damages in an action for trespass upon real property may be such as are appropriate to the tenure by which the plaintiff holds. Possession alone will entitle him to recover damages for any injury solely affecting it. If he seeks to recover for the future, he must show that his title gives him an interest in the damages claimed, and he can recover none except such as affect his own right, unless he holds in such relation to other parties interested that his recovery will bar their claim. . . . In this case the injury is wholly to plaintiff. He will have to pay to his vendor the full contract price, notwithstanding that the premises may have been depreciated in value by the trespass. . . . Whether he could in equity impound the damages recovered in this action if the injury to the premises was so great as to leave them inadequate security for the unpaid instalments of purchase money, it is unnecessary now to inquire."

It was held in McKenzie v. Ohio River R. Co. 27 W. Va. 366, that the plaintiff, who held the equitable title to certain real estate, could maintain an action for damages thereto with or without her husband, in whom was the legal title, joining in the action. The rule announced in that case was adopted by the same court in the case of Clay v. St. Albans, 43 W. Va. 539, 64 Am. St. Rep. 883, 27 S. E. 368, in which case the court holds that, where a conveyance of land has been made to a trustee for the benefit of the wife of another person, by which she is permitted to have the possession and use of said land, although she is vested with only an equitable title, she and her husband or she alone may maintain an action for trespass to both possession and the inheritance. In Hastings & G. R. Co. v. Ingalls, 15 Neb. 123, 16 N. W. 762, the plaintiff in the court below sought to recover damages from the defendant for building its road, for use as a railway, upon a public road a portion of which was on plaintiff's land, thereby imposing additional burdens upon the land of plaintiff. It developed in the progress of the trial that the legal title to the property at the time of the alleged injury was in another person than the plaintiff; that plaintiff occupied the same under a contract for purchase, and was at said time in default of payment on his contract; and that his contract, under which he held and was in possession of said land, was subject to forfeiture. The vendor, in whom the legal title existed, however, had not taken advantage of the default. The defendant in the court below insisted that no recovery could be had because defendant in error had not the legal title at the time the injury occurred, and did not have the legal title at the time of the trial. The court held in that case that defendant in error was entitled to recover; that, at most, there was a defect of parties; and that, no objection having been raised by the pleadings to such defect of parties, the same was waived. The same rule was adopted by the supreme court of Nebraska in Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Brown, 29 Neb. 513, 48 N. W. 46, in which case the court said: "It would be very strange, indeed, if the purchaser of real estate who, in equity, is treated as the owner, should be powerless to protect his rights in case his real estate, held under a valid contract, was injured; but such is not the law." And the same court in Gartner v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 71 Neb. 444, 98 N. W. 1052, held that one who is in possession of real estate under a contract with the owner for the purchase thereof has sufficient title to maintain an action for damages to the land. That a person holding the equitable estate in land may maintain an action for injury to the freehold has been held in the following cases: Miller v. Zufall, 113 Pa. 317, 6 Atl. 350; Cleaveland v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 42 Vt. 449; Rood v. New York & E. R. Co. 18 Barb. 80; Russell v. Meyer, 7 N. D. 335, 47 L.R.A. 637, 75 N. W. 262; Chouteau v. Boughton, 100 Mo. 406, 13 S. W. 877.

The facts offered to be proved by that part of the deposition of Benj. B. Foster excluded by the court would have established that Benj. B. Foster had the naked legal title to said lots as a trustee in resulting trust in favor of the plaintiff in this action. Plaintiff was in possession, and had been ever since it was organized as a corporation, and had paid the purchase price of said lots, paid for the improvements thereon, and paid the taxes. Benj. B. Foster had never been in possession. Whatever injury occurred to said property, resulting in the depreciation in the value thereof, was the loss of the plaintiff. Whatever increase in the value of the same might occur would be the gain of the plaintiff. The plaintiff is the real party in interest, and in equity would be regarded as the owner of the lots, and a judgment in its favor in this case could be pleaded by defendant in an action against it by the said Benj. B. Foster, upon proof of the facts offered to be proved by the plaintiff, as a bar to a recovery by Benj. B. Foster. While it would have been better practice to have made the person holding the legal title a party to the suit, not having done so does not defeat the right of recovery of the plaintiff in this action, and the action of the court in rejecting said evidence was error.

The evidence introduced by plaintiff established that its lots fronted on A street, in the city of Perry, and that the same had been occupied and used as a lumber yard by plaintiff for several years; that the defendant had built upon A street in front of said lots its main line of railway and four switch tracks; that the nearest track of said railway was 10 feet from the door of the building on plaintiff's lots. The evidence further establishes that said lots are located on a corner; that on the south side of same is Seventh street, but that said street is not passable on account of there being a creek across same, over which there is no bridge; that the space between plaintiff's property and the nearest railroad track was not sufficient for teams to go in and out. There is no evidence in the record disclosing what right defendant had to build its railway track upon A street, or whether any permission had been granted it by the city of Perry to build the same upon said street; but it appears from the record that the case was tried in the court below upon the theory that authority had been obtained from the city of Perry by the defendant to construct its railroad upon said street, and such is the theory of the case as presented by the briefs of both parties filed in this court, and we shall therefore consider the case upon the theory upon which it was tried in the court below and as presented in the briefs of the parties.

It is contended by plaintiff that defendant, by constructing its tracks of railway, the nearest of which is within 10 feet of plaintiff's property, has greatly obstructed and injured its means of ingress and egress to and from its said lots, and has rendered the same unfit for business purposes, and for the purposes for which plaintiff was using them, and that, on account of such obstruction to plaintiff's means of ingress and egress to and from its lots, the same have been greatly diminished and depreciated in value, and that such acts of defendant constitute a "taking" of plaintiff's property. Plaintiff has, by virtue of its ownership of said lots, an interest in A street on which said lots abut, and a right therein common with the public to pass over the same as a public highway. In addition thereto, it has a special right in said street, not common to the public, to wit, the right of ingress and egress over the same, to and from its lots. The decisions of the courts, made under statute or constitutional provision, to the effect that the complaining party can recover only where there is a "taking of private property for public use," are nearly uniform on the question that, where the injury complained of by the abutting property owner is one that is common to the general public, such injury is damnum absque injuria. The decisions of the courts, however, are by no means uniform upon what constitutes a "taking" of property in cases similar to the one at bar, but we believe the weight of the better authorities, if not the greater in number, is that such a "taking" may result without conversion of the property or any part thereof, as under statutes and constitutional provisions which provide that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation. Some of the courts have held that, where no conversion of the property is made, there must be a physical injury to the same, or a physical invasion thereof, before a right of recovery exists. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. McGinnis, 79 Ill. 269.

The Supreme Court of the United States in Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557, held that it is not necessary that property should be taken in the narrow sense of the word to bring the case within the protection of a statute or a constitutional provision that private property cannot be taken for public use without compensation. The court held in that case that there may be such a serious interruption to the common and necessary use of property as will be equivalent to a "taking." In that case the interruption to the common and necessary use of the property complained of was that the defendant had built a dam across a river which formed the outlet of a lake, by which dam the waters of the lake were raised so high as to overflow the land of plaintiff, and to tear up his trees and grass by the roots, and wash them, with his hay thereon, away, and to choke up the ditches on the land, and to saturate some of his land with water, and to dirty and injure other parts thereof by leaving thereon deposits of sand. The facts in that case do not establish a "taking" of the property in the narrow sense of the word. The injury sustained for which a recovery was sought in that action was a physical injury to the land. But we do not understand the court in holding that a recovery could be had therefor to limit the injury for which a recovery may be had to a physical injury where there is a "taking" of the property in the narrow sense of the word. On the other hand, the reasoning of the court in that case is that the test by which it may be determined whether there has been a "taking" is not the manner in which the injury was done, but whether one's common and necessary use of his property has been seriously interrupted. Plaintiff in the case at bar, by virtue of its ownership of said lots, had the right of access over A street to the same. Such right is one peculiar to itself, in which the general public has no interest, and exists in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament attached to said lots, and is a valuable property right,—one that, under some circumstances, may constitute the greater element of value of the abutting property, and is one that cannot be taken away or materially impaired without compensation. Elliott, Railroads, ¶ 1085. In Reining v. New York, L. & W. R. Co. 128 N. Y. 157, 14 L.R.A. 133, 28 N. E. 640, a case in which the defendant had built a railroad upon a street, several feet high, with perpendicular walls, leaving a space of only about 8 or 9 feet for carriage way between said walls and the plaintiffs' property, the New York court of appeals held that the owners' right of ingress and egress to and from such abutting property had been substantially closed against them for ordinary street purposes, and that they were entitled to recover. The right of the abutting property owner to access over the street adjacent to his property, as an appurtenance to his property, and to have such access protected from material obstruction, has been recognized by many of the courts, and it has been held by such courts that an obstruction that materially injures or deprives the abutting property owner of ingress and egress to and from his property over the street is a "taking" of his property, for which recovery may be had. Newport & C. Bridge Co. v. Foote, 9 Bush, 265; Parrot v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 10 Ohio St. 625 (in this latter case the obstruction was 20 feet from plaintiff's property); Protzman v. Indianapolis & C. Co. 39 Minn. 286, 1 L.R.A. 493, 12 Am. St. Rep. 644, 39 N. W. 629; Lamm v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 45 Minn. 73, 10 L.R.A. 268, 47 N. W. 455; Abendroth v. Manhattan R. Co. 122 N. Y. 1, 11 L.R.A. 634, 19 Am. St. Rep. 461, 25 N. E. 496. The supreme court of the territory of Oklahoma in the case of Scrutchfield v. Choctaw, O. & W. R. Co. 18 Okla. 308, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 496, 88 Pac. 1048, recognizes, we think, the correct rule of law governing in cases similar to the case at bar. In the syllabus of that opinion, the court says: "The location and operation of a railroad upon a public highway may occasion incidental inconvenience and injury to an abutting landowner, but until it cuts off or materially interrupts his means of access to his property, or imposes some additional burden on his soil, his injury is the same in kind as that suffered by the community in general, and he cannot recover in an action therefor." Mr. Justice Gillette, who delivered the opinion of the court, further said in the opinion: "Every person has the same interest and right in a public street or thoroughfare that any other person has, except that property owners have a special right of ingress and egress to their property from the street, which right may not be taken from them without just compensation, because this is an injury peculiar to the particular property owners so affected." If the evidence in this case fairly tended to show that the construction of defendant's railroad tracks in the street in front of plaintiff's property was such as to cut off or materially interrupt plaintiff's means of access to its property, such acts of the defendant amounted to a "taking" of plaintiff's property, for which defendant would be liable. The evidence establishes that the nearest track of the railway lies within 10 feet of plaintiff's property line; and, while there is no evidence as to the width of the sidewalk next to the property of plaintiff nearest the railway track, there is evidence that the space between said track and the property of plaintiff is too narrow for teams to go in and out. Since there was some evidence that plaintiff's means of ingress and egress to and from its property over A street had been materially interrupted, it was for the jury to find whether such right of plaintiff had been materially impaired.

It is suggested by defendant in error that the lumber company has a means of access to its property over Seventh street, adjoining its property on the south. The decisions of the courts upon the right of the abutting property owner to recover where his access is obstructed on one street, but where he has a means of access from another street, are not uniform. Some courts have held both ways upon this proposition. In the case of Kansas, N. & D. R. Co. v. Cuykendall, 42 Kan. 234, 16 Am. St. Rep. 479, 21 Pac. 1051, the supreme court of Kansas held that where the abutting property owner's ingress and egress was obstructed on one street, but he had a means of access from another street, there was no right of recovery. In this opinion all the justices concurred. In the case of Ft. Scott, W. & W. R. Co. v. Fox, supra, the same court held, all the justices concurring, that an abutting property owner is entitled to recover his damages for the permanent appropriation of the street in front of his property, although it is accessible from another street. We can see no reason that will justify the taking of one's special property right in one street because he may have a special property right in another street. If the plaintiff's property in this case is situated upon a corner of the block, and therefore adjacent to two streets, he has a right of ingress and egress to and from said property over both streets; and he who obstructs this access from one street, and deprives the owner of the property of such property right, cannot relieve himself of liability by pleading that the owner of the property may reach his property from another direction. The accessibility of one's property may in some instances constitute a great part of its value, and to permit a material impairment of his access would result in the destruction of a great part of the value of his property, and his property is therefore as effectually taken as if a physical invasion was made thereon and a physical injury done thereto.

There is some evidence tending reasonably to establish the material averments alleged in plaintiff's cause of action, and, if plaintiff had been permitted to prove its ownership of the property, there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury; and the cause will be reversed and remanded.

A petition for rehearing having been made Hayes, J., on March 9, 1909, filed the following additional opinion:

We are asked, on rehearing in this case, to reverse the opinion rendered by this court on the original hearing (20 Okla. 583, 95 Pac. 224), for the reason that it 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

conflicts with the following decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States: Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 336; Gibson v. United States, 166 U. S. 269, 41 L. ed. 996, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578, and Scranton v. Wheeler, 179 U. S. 141, 45 L. ed. 126, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon rules of law were controlling upon the courts of the territory of Oklahoma at the time this case originated and was tried in the lower court; and, if the decisions of that court above cited are applicable to the case at bar, and the opinion heretofore rendered by us is in conflict with them, then our former opinion should be reversed, and the judgment of the trial court affirmed.

In Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, supra, the damages sustained by the abutting property owner resulted from the construction by the agents of the city of a tunnel along one of its streets under the Chicago river, where the river crossed said street. In the construction of the tunnel, the city authorities materially obstructed the abutting property owner's access to his property from the street and his access to the river, which his property adjoined. The court held that for this obstruction to his access the law afforded him no remedy, for the reason that such obstruction, caused by the act of the city in making public improvements, was not a taking of private property for public use. In the cases of Gibson v. United States and Scranton v. Wheeler, supra, the interference with the riparian owner's access to the navigable waters resulted from public improvements made by the government or its agents. In each of these cases the improvements were made by the government, solely for public use, and the effect of the opinions of the court in these cases is that the private right of the riparian owner to access to the navigable stream which his land adjoins is subordinate to the public right, that such right of access is subservient to the public right of navigation, and the control of Congress over that right, and that if an injury occurs to his means of access, by public improvements made by Congress in the exercise of its right to improve navigable streams, no violation of any right to him occurs, for the reason that such right of access ceases the moment it comes in conflict with the rights of the government to control navigable streams. But none of these decisions holds that the abutting owner's right of access is subordinate to the right of a railway company which constructs a steam railway upon a street, under legislative authority; and although this case has been reargued upon rehearing, and ably and exhaustively rebriefed by counsel, no decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in which it has been held that the abutting owner's access to his property may be destroyed in such manner without compensation has been called to our attention, in which that court was uncontrolled by a rule of property of a state court, and we think none exists. There are decisions, however, from that court, which follow the rule of property of state courts, and hold that damages cannot be recovered where the construction of the railroad interferes with the access of the abutting owner, where the title to the street is in the public. Meyer v. Richmond, 172 U. S. 82, 43 L. ed. 374, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106, is one of such cases. That case arose in the courts of Virginia, and was an action for damages resulting from the obstruction of an abutting owner's access to a street by a railroad built upon the street, not in front of the abutting property, but across the street, to the north of it. The supreme court of appeals of Virginia held that such obstruction was not a taking under the Constitution and laws of Virginia, and this construction by the court of that state of the Constitution and laws of that state was, as to the Supreme Court of the United States, a rule of property which that court did not undertake to review. Mr. Justice McKenna, who delivered the opinion of the court, uses the following language: "The substantial thing is not that one may be damaged by an obstruction in a street,—not that one may be specially damaged beyond others,—but is such damage a deprivation of property, within the meaning of the constitutional provision? According to the Virginia cases, an additional servitude may be said to be another physical appropriation, and hence another taking, and must be compensated. But the plaintiff's case is not within this doctrine, nor is there anything in the decisions of Virginia which make consequential damages to property a taking, within the meaning of the Constitution of that state. Decisions in other states we need not resort to or review. Those of this court furnish a sufficient guide. Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, supra; Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820; Marchant v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 153 U. S. 380, 38 L. ed. 751, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 894; Gibson v. United States, 166 U. S. 269, 41 L. ed. 906, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 578."

If the language quoted, referring to other cases of the Supreme Court of the United States, can be construed as an expression that the rule of that court in those cases is in harmony with the court of Virginia in holding that the obstruction to the access of the abutting owner is not a taking, then we have an expression of the Supreme Court of the United States which appears to indicate that the cases of Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago and Gibson v. United States establish the rule contended for by defendant in error in this case; but our construction of the language used by the court is that the intention of the court in referring to those decisions was not to indicate that the rule of property adopted by the supreme court of appeals of Virginia was supported by those decisions, but that, the supreme court of appeals of Virginia having held that the abutting owner had no right of access in the street which constituted property which could be taken in the manner complained of, then such damages as were sustained by the abutting owner were consequential damages, and that the cases cited support the rule that consequential damages do not constitute a taking of property. In discussing this question, in one of the cases referred to, the court said: "The first proposition asserted by the plaintiff, that her private property has been taken from her without just compensation having been first made or secured, involves certain questions of fact. Was the plaintiff the owner of private property, and was such property taken, injured, or destroyed by a corporation invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use? The title of the plaintiff to the property affected was not disputed, nor that the railroad company was a corporation invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use. But it was adjudged by the supreme court of Pennsylvania that the acts of the defendant which were complained of did not, under the laws and Constitution of the state, constitute a taking, an injury, or a destruction of the plaintiff's property. We are not authorized to inquire into the grounds and reasons upon which the supreme court of Pennsylvania proceeded in its construction of the statutes and Constitution of that state; and, if this record presented no other question except errors alleged to have been committed by that court in its construction of its domestic laws, we should be obliged to hold, as has been often held in like cases, that we have no jurisdiction to review the judgment of the state court, and we should have to dismiss this writ of error for that reason." [172 U. S. 98.] In determining, therefore, whether there is a difference between the abutting owner's right of access as against a railway corporation constructing its railroad upon the street, under legislative authority, and between such abutting owner's rights and the right of the public or of the government to improve the street for public purposes, we are compelled to resort to reason and decisions of the state courts for answer.

It is the doctrine of the courts of nearly all the states that an abutting property owner cannot recover for damages to his property resulting from change of grade in the street, made by the municipal authorities, under authority of law, where there is no physical injury to his property. His right in the street is subject to the right of the public to grade and improve it for a public highway, and the injury he sustains therefrom is not a taking. And this doctrine prevails whether the fee is in the abutting owner or in the public. 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. 2d ed. § 96, and Sauer v. New York, 206 U. S. 536, 51 L. ed. 1176, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 686. Two classes of cases have arisen in the courts under statutory or constitutional provisions similar to the one now under consideration. The first class consists of those cases where the title to the street was in the abutting owner, and the second class consists of those cases where the title to the street was in the public. There are some cases that hold that an abutting owner who owns the title to the street cannot recover the damages he sustains from the building of a railroad on the street in front of his property, where it is built under legislative authority (Perry v. New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. 55 Ala. 413, 28 Am. Rep. 740; Mercer v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 36 Pa. 99; Snyder v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 55 Pa. 340); but the doctrine of these cases is against the weight of authority (§ 115, 2d ed. 1 Lewis, Em. Dom.). The reasoning of the courts upon which they have established the general rule that, where the fee is in the abutting owner, there is a taking, is not uniform. Many of the courts place it upon the ground that the location of the track of a railroad upon a street is an additional burden and servitude upon the owner's land, for which he is entitled to additional compensation. Other courts place it upon the ground that it is an exclusive appropriation by the railroad company of the soil of the street to its own use, and that, since the owner of the title has the right of use of the soil for all purposes not inconsistent with the easement in favor of the public, the act of the railroad company in placing its tracks upon the street is a taking, and compensation is allowed. But the courts, upon whichever ground they place the right of recovery, as a rule permit the recovery, not only for the additional burden or servitude upon the land of the abutting owner in the street, or for the taking from him the use of the soil of the street, to which he has the right to use except so far as it in conflict with the right of the public, but to recover also for depreciation in the value of his abutting property.

We do not, however, refer to this class of cases to discuss the reasoning upon which the courts have permitted abutting property owners to recover, but that it may be noticed that the decided weight of authorities, where the abutting property owner owns the fee to the street, makes a distinction between his right of ingress and egress over the street as against the public, and his right therein as against a railway company, building upon the streets under authority of law. His right as to the public is a subservient right, but as to the railway company it is a superior right, which may not be materially interfered with or destroyed without compensation. There is, however, great conflict among the decisions of the second class, to which the case at bar belongs, and in some instances the decisions of the same court are irreconcilable. In some of the states the rights of the abutting owner in the street, the title to which is in the public, are regarded as of the same degree as those of the public, and no recovery is permitted for interfering with his right of egress and ingress over the street to his property, where such interference occurs from the construction of a railroad upon the street, under legislative authority; but the doctrine of the courts in all the following cases is sufficiently broad to permit a recovery where the abutting property owner's access to the street is destroyed or materially obstructed or interfered with: Reining v. New York, L. & W. R. Co. 128 N. Y. 157, 14 L.R.A. 133, 28 N. E. 640; Leavenworth, N. & S. R. Co. v. Curtan, 51 Kan. 432, 33 Pac. 297; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Davidson, 52 Kan. 739, 35 Pac. 787; Willamette Iron Works v. Oregon R. Co. 26 Or. 224, 29 L.R.A. 88, 46 Am. St. Rep. 620, 37 Pac. 1016; White v. Northwestern North Carolina R. Co. 113 N. C. 610, 22 L.R.A. 627, 37 Am. St. Rep. 630, 18 S. E. 330; Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 39 Minn. 286, 1 L.R.A. 493, 12 Am. St. Rep. 644, 39 N. W. 629; Lamm v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 45 Minn. 71, 10 L.R.A. 268, 47 N. W. 455; Ft. Scott, W. & W. R. Co. v. Fox, 42 Kan. 490, 22 Pac. 583; Central Branch Union P. R. Co. v. Twine, 23 Kan. 585, 33 Am. Rep. 203; South Carolina R. Co. v. Steiner, 44 Ga. 546; Egerer v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 130 N. Y. 108, 14 L.R.A. 381, 29 N. E. 95; Burlington & M. River R. Co. v. Reinhackle, 15 Neb. 279, 48 Am. Rep. 342, 18 N. W. 69; Callen v. Columbus Edison Electric Light Co. 66 Ohio St. 166, 58 L.R.A. 782, 64 N. E. 141; Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 66 Miss. 285, 4 L.R.A. 735, 14 Am. St. Rep. 564, 6 So. 230; Indiana, B. &

W. R. Co. v. Eberle, 110 Ind. 542, 50 Am. Rep. 225, 11 N. E. 467; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Noftager, 148 Ind. 101, 47 N. E. 332. There are other cases which support or recognize the doctrine of these cases, but it is unnecessary to prolong this opinion by citing them or quoting therefrom.

The cases cited are cases that arose under statutes or constitutional provisions providing that private property shall not be "taken" for public purpose without compensation. In some of the states, subsequent to the decisions cited, statutes have been enacted, or constitutional provisions adopted, which extend the terms of the statutes or constitutional provisions theretofore existing by providing that private property shall not be "taken, damaged, or injured" for public purposes without compensation. The decisions of the courts under these statutes or Constitutions as amended are not applicable to the case at bar. The reasoning upon which the courts have permitted the abutting owner to recover when his access to his property has been materially interfered with is by no means uniform. Some of them do not place it upon the ground that there has been a taking of property, but that his right has been interfered with. In some of the states the rule is broader than in others. In some the building of the road upon the street entitles the abutting property owner to recover, although the road is built upon the grade of the street; in others no right of recovery exists unless the construction of the railroad upon the street is such as to interfere with his right of access to his property; and in others there is no right of recovery unless the abutting owner's access has been entirely destroyed.

In Reining v. New York, L. & W. R. Co. supra, the abutting owner recovered damages resulting from the railroad company's constructing an embankment upon the street in front of his property, on which the company placed its railroad tracks. The court of appeals of New York said: "It is no longer open to debate in this state that owners of lots abutting on a city street, the fee of which is in the municipality for street uses, although they have no title to the soil, are nevertheless entitled to the benefit of the street in front of their premises for access and other purposes, of which they cannot be deprived except upon compensation. The right of abutting owners in the streets is not, however, of that absolute character that they can resist or prevent any and all interference with the street to their detriment, or which can be asserted to stay the hand of the municipality in the control, regulation, or improvement of the streets in the public interest, although it may be made to appear that the privileges which they had theretofore enjoyed, and the benefits they had derived from the street in its existing condition, would be curtailed or impaired to their injury by the changes proposed."

The right of the abutting owner to have free access over the street to his property, and the relation of such right to the right of the public to make public improvements upon the street, and to the right of agencies acting under legislative authority, in making improvements on the street other than for the purpose of a highway or street uses, is well expressed in 1 Lewis on Eminent Domain (§ 91e, p. 172) in the following language: "But as all streets are established primarily for the public use and general good, the right of the public is paramount to the right of the individual. And so the private rights of access, light, and air are held and enjoyed subject to the paramount right of the public to use and improve the street for the purposes of a highway. And as these private rights are thus subject to the right of the public to use and improve as a highway, it follows that, when such uses or improvements are made, no private right is interfered with, and consequently no private property is taken. It follows also that, as these private rights are subject only to the use and improvement of the street by the public for the purpose of a highway, an interference with these rights by the use or improvement of the street for any other purpose, or by any other agency, under legislative authority, is a taking of private property to the extent of such interference."

The three cases from the Supreme Court of the United States relied upon by defendant in error in its petition for rehearing, which have been referred to supra, are cases in which the riparian owner's access to the navigable stream, or the abutting property owner's access to the adjoining street, were interfered with by improvements made by the public, and for the purpose of improving either the navigable stream or the street as a highway. The same author, in the sentence preceding the above quotation, says: "Numerous cases, decided since the first edition of this work, establish beyond question the existence of these rights or easements of light, air, and access, as appurtenant to abutting lots, and that they are as much property as the lots themselves." This language is quoted with approval by the Supreme Court of the United States in Muhlker v. New York & H. R. Co. 197 U. S. 544, 49 L. ed. 872, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522. That case, as well as others announcing the doctrine, is often referred to as the "Elevated Railroad Cases," and supports the doctrine that the abutting owner's easements of light and air may not be interfered with by the construction of an elevated railroad in the street in front of his property, under legislative authority, without compensation. Able counsel for defendant in error contend that the rule in this class of cases is not applicable to the case at bar, and we are aware that there are expressions from some of the courts that such is the case, but to our minds it is mockery to say that a railway company, acting under legislative authority, may not take away or interfere with the abutting owner's easements of light and air without compensation, but that the same company may, without compensation to the abutting owner, construct upon the street in front of his property obstructions that destroy, or materially interfere with, his access to his property, the very means by which he may enjoy the other easements which the court holds the law protects him in the enjoyment of from the interference of such railway company, or other agencies, acting under legislative authority. On this subject Mr. Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain (vol. 1, p. 233), says: "Highways are established to accommodate the public in traveling from place to place. From time immemorial, prior to the discovery of steam, they were for the common use of every citizen, by any means of locomotion he chose to select. They were not used by one person in any way which was not open to all. No one had a private right or any exclusive privilege therein. It was free to all upon like conditions. Such being the character of the public highway, it was subject to use by any new means of locomotion which could be employed by all the public, and was not destructive of the old methods of travel. A carriage propelled upon the ordinary surface of the road by steam or electricity would be just as legitimate as a carriage drawn by horses. Such use would be equally open to every citizen. The railroad does not fall within the scope of such uses. It requires a permanent structure in the street, the use of which is private and exclusive. It gives to an individual or corporation a franchise and easement in the street, inconsistent with the public right. To hold that a railroad is one of the proper and legitimate uses of a street leads to the absurd consequence that a street might be filled with parallel tracks which would practically exclude all ordinary travel, and still be devoted to the ordinary uses of a highway."

The fee in the street, in the case at bar, is in the public for street uses, and upon a vacation of said street, the same would become the property of plaintiff. Blackwell, E. & S. W. R. Co. v. Gist, 18 Okla. 516, 90 Pac. 889. The construction of a steam railway upon the street, although a public use, and made by a private corporation engaged in a public service, is not a legitimate street use. It is true that the legislative department of a state may grant to a steam railway company the right to construct its tracks upon the streets of a city, or, as in this case, a municipality, under authority from the legislature, may grant such right, but such authority granted relieves the company only from liability to suits, civil and criminal, by the public, and does not authorize it to interfere with any of the private property rights of the abutting owners. It has only the effect to make that legitimate which would otherwise be a nuisance and actionable as such. If railway tracks are constructed under legislative authority, upon the surface of the street, at the grade thereof, and the abutting owner's means of access are not materially interfered with, he cannot complain; but if, as in this case, where five tracks of railroad have been constructed in the street in front of plaintiff's property, the nearest of which is so near the property line of plaintiff that teams cannot pass each other, and so constructed, according to the testimony of one witness, as to render it almost impossible for plaintiff's lumber yard upon its property to be reached by vehicles, the railway is so constructed as to destroy, or materially interfere with, the abutting owner's means of ingress and egress to and from his lot, and the value thereof is destroyed or depreciated from such cause, its property is as effectually taken as if a physical invasion had been made. We cannot say that the conclusion here reached is, numerically speaking, supported by the weight of the decisions from the state courts; but, in the absence of any decision from the Supreme Court of the United States directly upon the question here involved, which, if it existed, we should feel it our duty to follow as controlling in this case, we are constrained to adopt that construction and follow that rule which to us appears to be supported by the best reasoning, and that will best serve the purposes of justice.

We therefore adhere to our former opinion.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

BEAUFORT LAND & INVESTMENT COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

NEW RIVER LUMBER COMPANY,
Resp't.

Pleading — variance — title and possession.

1. One alleging title and possession may recover damages for trespass on proof of possession and invasion by defendant, without proving a perfect title.

Trespass — title of defendant — power of court to determine.

2. The court cannot, in an action to recover damages for trespass to real estate, determine that defendant's title, which is not connected with a grant from the state, is perfect.

Same — adverse possession — sufficiency.

3. The court cannot, in an action to recover damages for trespass upon real estate, direct a verdict for defendant in case the locus in quo is not covered by plaintiff's written chain of title, if he also relies on adverse possession.

Evidence — boundary — declarations of former owner.

4. In an action for damages for trespass upon real estate, declarations of defendant's predecessor in title, as to the boundary lines made while he was owner of the property, are admissible in evidence against defendant.

(July 18, 1910.)

Note. — Necessity and character of title or possession of plaintiff to sustain action of trespass quare clausum fregit.

The question of the sufficiency of an equitable title to sustain an action of trespass to land is not included within the scope of this annotation, but is covered by a note in 47 L.R.A. 637, and a supplemental note to Foster Lumber Co. v. Arkansas Valley & W. R. Co. ante, 231.

Authorities on the right of a widow, prior to assignment of dower, to maintain trespass quare clausum fregit, are collected in a note in 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 209; and cases on the subject of trespass quare clausum fregit by a tenant in common of realty against a cotenant are collected in a note in 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 212.

Necessity of possession, actual or constructive.

The doctrine is well established by the authorities that to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit the plaintiff must, at the time of the trespass, be in the actual or constructive possession of the land upon which the acts of the trespass were committed. This doctrine is based on the theory that trespass quare clausum fregit is an injury to the right of possession only.

Mr. W. Huger Fitz Simons, for respondent:

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The verdict and judgment were in favor of the defendant. The numerous exceptions submitted on behalf of the plaintiff, relating mainly to alleged errors in the charge of the circuit judge, will be more clearly understood after a brief statement of the pleadings.

The complaint alleges "that the plaintiff is the owner in fee and in possession of that tract of land known as the 'Crapse Purchase' or 'Wiggin Land,' containing 1,800 acres, more or less, according to a plat made by O. P. Law, surveyor, April 17, 1885, and has the following distances and bearings; . . . that the defendant, its agents, and servants at numerous times have entered on the land with force and arms and cut much valuable timber and committed irreparable waste thereon, and, disregarding plaintiff's warnings, threatened to continue the acts of trespass; that the said acts of defendant are without any right or authority whatever and contrary to law, and are an irreparable loss to plaintiff; that the defendant could not respond in damages, and that plaintiff has already been damaged to the amount of $2,000." It is said in 9 Bacon's Abr. 458, that 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"only the person who has the possession in fact of the real property to which an injury has been done can maintain an action of trespass" for the injury, because the gist of an action of trespass for an injury to either real or personal property is the being disturbed in the possession of the property; and the having the general property does not, in the case of real property, as it does in the case of personal, draw to it a possession in fact.

"A plaintiff cannot recover in trespass quare clausum," said the court in Moon v. Avery, supra, "when he negatives possession in his pleadings, for the gist of the action is the breaking and entering his close. Without possession, either actual or constructive, trespass cannot be maintained." A similar statement was made by the court in Rogers v. Brooks, 99 Ala. 31, 11 So. 753.

An oral agreement establishing a boundary line under which no occupancy or acquiescence is shown is insufficient to authorize a party to maintain an action of trespass for the removal of a fence which he erected along such claimed boundary. Hooper v. Herald, 154 Mich. 529, 118 N. W. 3, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 149.

For want of actual possession, the court in Taylor v. Townsend, supra, denied the right of a mortgagor to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a mortgagee in possession, after the recovery of a bill in equity by the former to redeem, but before possession was taken under the judgment.

Absence of possession of the locus in quo defeated, in Schufelt v. Sweet, 15 N. Y. Week. Dig. 1, the right of one to maintain an action of trespass on land for which he had contracted in behalf of his wife, to whom the deed was subsequently given.

And in Brown v. Hartzell, 87 Mo. 564, want of actual possession defeated the right of a vendor of land to maintain an action of trespass upon lands which were, at the time the alleged act was committed, in the possession of defendant under a contract of sale.

$2,000 and for an injunction against further trespass.

The defendant by its answer, in addition to a general denial, alleges twenty years' possession in itself and its grantors, and specifically denies that the plaintiff and those under whom it claims have been in possession of the land within twenty years, or within ten years, prior to the commencement of the action; it alleges further that any right which the plaintiff may have had accrued more than ten years before the commencement of the action; and that the land is the property of W. R. Pritchard and others, who conveyed to the defendant the timber thereon, and that defendant's entry was made under that conveyance.

Under these pleadings the court charged:

In Broker v. Scobey, 56 Ind. 588, which was an action of trespass, it was held that where the evidence showed that, prior to the commission of the alleged acts of trespass, the plaintiff had delivered possession of the locus in quo to another pursuant to a contract of sale, it was error for the court to refuse to charge the jury that if such possession was delivered pursuant to the contract of sale, evidence by a written memorandum thereof, and such sale had not been rescinded, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The seceding members of a religious organization who induced the owner of the parcel of land on which a wooden building had been erected and leased to the society, to indorse a cancellation on the back of the lease and sell the building to them, have no such title to the building as will enable them to maintain an action of trespass against one who broke the lock and entered therein. Payne v. Davis, 128 Mass. 383.

Parties who contributed their share for the construction and maintenance of a small building to be constructed by individual contributions of money for the use and benefit of the people of "Walnut creek neighborhood," as a school building when subscriptions for such purpose could from time to time be raised, have no such interest or title in the building as will authorize them to maintain an action of trespass in taking the same away. Lomax v. Phillips, 113 La. 850, 68 L.R.A. 661, 37 So. 777.

On the theory that actual and exclusive possession is necessary to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, it was held in Religious Cong. Soc. v. Baker, supra, that a religious society which was permitted by the owner of a building to hold services therein cannot maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against another religious organization which assembled therein, thereby preventing the former from holding its services.

After the termination of a contract of employment, a servant who occupied a house as a part of the contract price for 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"I charge you that before you can render a verdict in behalf of the plaintiff for damages in this case you must be satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiff has a complete and perfect title to the land described in the complaint." The plaintiff contends that while this is a correct statement of the law in an action to recover possession of land, it was erroneous in this action, which was not to recover possession, but for damages for a trespass, and that therefore the charge should have been to the effect "that if the plaintiff has satisfied you that it was in actual possession of the tract of land described in the complaint, and that defendant has committed trespass within the lines of said tract, then the plaintiff will be entitled to recover, unless the defendant has satisservices to be performed by him has no such possession of the locus in quo as will entitle him to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against the former employer for a disturbance of his possession. Heffelfinger v. Fulton, 25 Ind. App. 33, 56 N. E. 688.

Proof of actual possession essential to the maintenance of an action of trespass is not shown by evidence of a survey of the land made for the purpose of locating a certain lake, of an advertisement of the land for sale or rent, and of a notice to a certain party to keep his cattle off "that land." Odd Fellows' Sav. Bank v. Turman (Cal.) 30 Pac. 966.

A reversioner has no right in the property, which enables him to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for cutting and carrying trees from land by another under authority of a tenant in dower. Shattuck v. Gragg, 23 Pick. 88; Livingston v. Mott, 2 Wend. 605.

But a reversioner who regained possession of the demised property wrongfully is entitled, being in pedis possessio, to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a stranger who invaded his possession. Rollins v. Clay, 33 Me. 132.

A remainderman, not being entitled to possession, cannot maintain an action of trespass quare clausum for cutting standing trees. Lawry v. Lawry, 88 Me. 482, 34 Atl. 273.

And an heir cannot maintain an action of trespass committed upon the quarantine lands of the widow before assignment of dower, not being in possession before that time. Latham v. Latham, 3 Call. (Va.) 181.

The heirs of a deceased owner of land have no title which will authorize them to maintain trespass to land owned by the decedent at the time of his death, but sold for the payment of the debts of the estate many years before the alleged trespass was committed. Belangia v. Branning Mfg. Co. 152 N. C. 3, 67 S. E. 48.

But a sole devisee in possession of land pending the settlement of the estate is entitled to maintain an action of trespass fled the jury that it has good title in itself to the land upon which the alleged trespass was committed, or that it did the acts complained of as trespass by the permission or under a license from the real owner of the land."

The important question is thus raised whether a plaintiff alleging both title and possession is entitled to recover damages upon proof of his possession and the invasion of it by the defendant, without proving also that he has a perfect title. The question must be answered in the affirmative. One person who finds another in possession of land cannot, by seizing the possession or invading it, put him whose possession he seized or invaded to proof of his title. In such a case possession is prima facie evidence of title, and he who invades it must establish his title. If this were not so, the holders of land could be put to proof of title against the world by anyone who might choose to trespass or squat upon their lands. This conclusion is well supported by authority. When the plaintiff alleges an invasion of his possession this gives character to the action, as one in the nature of the old action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Couch v. Burke, 2 Hill, L. 534; Connor v. Johnson, 59 S. C. 115, 37 S. E. 240.

The court in Young v. Watson, 1 McMull. L. 449, intimated by the words we have italicized that the possession of a plaintiff of which he had been deprived by the entry of a defendant would support even an action of trespass to try title; for the court said, as in her own name against one engaged in blasting in an adjoining lot. Colton v. Onderdonk, 69 Cal. 155, 58 Am. Rep. 556, 10 Pac. 395.

In Dexter v. Sullivan, 34 N. H. 478, the court held that a will stating, "All the residue and remainder of my estate, whether real, personal, or mixed, I direct my executors to sell at such times as they may deem expedient," gives the executors no estate in the land, and therefore an heir in possession is entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit.

A widow in actual possession of lands claimed to be held as a homestead, may maintain an action of trespass against an adult heir at law of her husband who disturbed her possession. Patterson v. Patterson, 49 Mich. 176, 13 N. W. 504.

The grandchildren of a life tenant holding under a devise to her for life, and upon her death to her children and the children of such as are dead, cannot, for want of possession, maintain an action of trespass in removing timber from the land devised. Latham v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co. 139 N. C. 9, 111 Am. St. Rep. 764, 51 S. E. 780.

Exclusive possession necessary to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit was held not to have been established in Church v. Meeker, 34 Conn. 421, in which it appeared that the locus in quo was a line of beach between ordinary and extraordinary high-water mark; the beach was not in any inclosure of the plaintiff, nor connected with any upland upon which the tide ever flowed, but was upon the side of an extended field of salt meadows, and was formed by an abrasion of the shore and the washing and piling up of coarse sand and gravel by the action of the waves on that arm of the sea. The public had immemorially used the beach by passing and driving over it and taking seaweed from it. The plaintiff owned the adjoining shore between high and low water mark, but neither the plaintiff nor his grantors had used the beach other than in the way it had been used by the public. The plaintiff's father had, in a few instances, for-bidden individuals to remove the seaweed, and the plaintiff had at one time set up a sign prohibiting entry upon the land, but the notice had been generally disregarded.

In Newcomb v. Love, 112 Mich. 115, 70 N. W. 443, it appeared beyond dispute that the defendant had used the land in question for farming purposes for seven years, that it was situated on his side of a fence built by him to mark the boundary line, and that the plaintiff acquired his alleged possession by breaking through the fence. In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit the court held that the plaintiff failed to show actual possession, and therefore could not maintain the action.

A mere claim of ownership, with frequent cutting and removing of timber from the tract from which the alleged acts of trespass were committed, does not constitute actual possession or occupancy within the meaning of the rule. Ohio & B. S. R. Co. v. Wooten, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 383, 46 S. W. 681.

An action of trespass quare clausum fregit will not lie in favor of one having a right of way across a proprietor's land, against another for using such way by permission of the proprietor, since the plaintiff is not entitled to the right of exclusive possession of the land. Morgan v. Boyes, 65 Me. 125.

Proof that all of a piece of timber land is occupied as a wood lot for the purpose of fuel and fencing was held in Argotsinger v. Vines, 82 N. Y. 308, to be sufficient evidence of actual possession to sustain an action of trespass for cutting and carrying away timber.

And evidence that the lots on which the acts of trespass were alleged to have been committed had been used for about twenty years as a wood lot to the farm on which the plaintiff lived; that during all of such time the plaintiff and his father, under whom the former claimed title, had cut their wood, saw logs, and rail timber, had made maple sugar thereon, and had constructed a house for that purpose; and that it was the only wood lot the plaintiff had, —was held in Machin v. Geortner, 14 Wend.

to the mere prior possession of the plaintiff: "It cannot be allowed to prevail against the actual possession of the defendant, who did not enter upon the plaintiff, and which, for aught that appears, may be as rightful as that which the plaintiff formerly held;" and Judge O'Neill, in a concurring opinion, said: "Where the plaintiff's possession, actual or constructive, is entered upon, I think that such possession is evidence of title to put the defendant to prove his title." In Connor v. Johnson, supra, the court held that the action was in the nature of trespass quare clausum fregit,—that is, an action for the invasion of the possession of plaintiff,—where the complaint alleged the plaintiff to be in possession under a paper title, and that the defendant had trespassed, and the answer denied all the allegations, including, of course, the allegations of plaintiff's possession and his paper title, and set up title in himself. In such an action it was held that it was only necessary for the plaintiff to show possession, and that for defendant to prevent a recovery it was not sufficient to show that the plaintiff had no title, but that he must show title in himself. That case seems conclusive of the point under discussion. To the same effect is Hillhouse v. Jennings, 60 S. C. 401, 38 S. E. 599, where the court says: "We may say, however, that when the allegations of the complaint are such as would have sustained an action of trespass quare clausum fregit under the former practice, peaceable possession alone is sufficient to support the action, and 239, to be sufficient proof of actual possession to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, although the proof does not show that the lot was inclosed by a fence or that there was any clearing upon it.

Trespass quare clausum fregit being a possessory action, a landlord, not being in actual possession, is not entitled to maintain the action. He has, of course, an appropriate remedy for any injury to the freehold. Tilghman v. Cruson, 4 Harr. (Del.) 341; Gould v. Sternburg, 4 Ill. App. 439; Walden v. Conn, 84 Ky. 312, 4 Am. St. Rep. 204, 1 S. W. 537; Ross v. Philbrick, 39 Me. 29; French v. Fuller, 23 Pick. 104; Bascom v. Dempsey, 143 Mass. 409, 9 N. E. 744; New Jersey Midland R. Co. v. Van Syckle, 37 N. J. L. 496; Robertson v. George, 7 N. H. 306; Anderson v. Nesmith, 7 N. H. 167; Cannon v. Hatcher, 1 Hill, L. 260, 26 Am. Dec. 177; Torrence v. Irwin, 2 Yeates, 210, 1 Am. Dec. 340; Greber v. Kleckner, 2 Pa. St. 289; Reynolds v. Williams, 1 Tex. 311; Kretzer v. Wyson, 5 Gratt. 9; Roys v. Cramer, 12 U. C. Q. B. 165.

A landlord, not being in possession of the land, is not entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for entering upon the land and cutting grass. Bartlett v. Perkins, 13 Me. 87; Lyford v. Toothaker, 39 Me. 28.

And trespass quare clausum fregit cannot be maintained by the owner of land against a third person for passing and re-passing over the land while the premises are in the actual occupation of a tenant. Holmes v. Seeley, 19 Wend. 507.

Likewise, in Clark v. Smith, 25 Pa. 137, the court held that the owner of land which another holds under a parol agreement indefinite as to the term of occupancy cannot, before an entry upon the premises, maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit.

A lessor has no right of action against one who entered upon the land in the possession of a tenant, and built a fence thereon, thereby depriving the tenant of the use and enjoyment of a portion of the premises. Speaking with reference to the right of action for an injury to the possession, the court said: "It is a well-settled rule that when a contract of tenancy is consummated by the entry of the tenant, the exclusive right of possession is thereby instantly changed from the landlord to the tenant during his term, and, for any injury to that possession, the right of action is exclusively in him. This is so whether he retains the possession or not, because it is his exclusive right of possession that gives him the exclusive right of action for any injury done to it, either by the landlord himself or a stranger, during the existence of that exclusive right. During the continuance of the tenant's right of possession, the landlord has no right of action for any injury done to it by a stranger or the tenant himself. His right is confined to the protection of his reversionary interest merely. For any injury to his reversionary interest, either by his tenant or a stranger, he may have any appropriate action of redress, but not an action of trespass, because that action lies alone for an immediate and direct injury to the possession, and the tenant having the exclusive right to the possession, he alone can resort to that kind of action." Walden v. Conn, 84 Ky. 312, 4 Am. St. Rep. 204, 1 S. W. 537.

On the same theory it has been held that one who had let the locus in quo for the term of one year cannot, after his re-entry, maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against another for cutting and destroying apple trees committed while the tenant held over under the lease. Wickham v. Freeman, supra.

It was held in Miller v. Fulton, 4 Ohio, 434, that one who had leased to another a water gristmill, and lands adjoining, for an indefinite period, receiving as rent a portion of the proceeds of the mill, cannot, not being in possession, maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a stranger who entered upon the premises and destroyed the milldam.

throws upon the defendant the burden of proving a better title." Turner v. Poston, 63 S. C. 244, 41 S. E. 296; Watts v. Blalock, 17 S. C. 163. In the case last cited the reason for the rule is thus well stated: "If the defendant in this case had brought his action against the plaintiff, he could not have recovered on such a title as he has shown in this case, and he cannot be allowed to put himself in a better position by committing a trespass on the plaintiff. The right of possession is a very sacred one, and the court will not allow the repose which it gives to be endangered by giving improper advantages to a trespasser. If defendant had a good title he should have resorted to the courts, where he could have obtained any redress to which by law he was entitled." The same principle has been laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Burt v. Panjaud, 99 U. S. 180, 25 L. ed. 451; Bradshaw v. Ashley, 180 U. S. 59, 45 L. ed. 423, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 297, and other cases. The cases relied on by defendant's counsel are very clearly distinguished, and are in no sense opposed to the rule stated.

In Geiger v. Kaigler, 15 S. C. 262, the action was exclusively for the recovery of the possession of land; the allegation of the complaint being that the defendant had acquired possession in 1863, many years before the action was brought, from the executor of the will under which plaintiffs claimed. There was no allegation that the plaintiffs had ever been in possession. The defendant

But a lessor who retains certain possessory rights in the demised premises is entitled to maintain the action. Thus, in Jordan v. Staples, 57 Me. 352, the court held that a landlord who by the terms of the lease retained the right to occupy a barn on the leased premises for the purpose of storing hay, etc., therein, may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a stranger for entering the barn and removing the hay.

In Wickham v. Freeman, supra, mere evidence that the plaintiff leased the premises in question for a year, without proof that he had the title, was held insufficient to bring him within the New York statute giving an action of trespass to a remainderman or reversioner notwithstanding an intervening estate for life or years. There also seems to be an implication that the fact that the term of the lease had expired at the time of the trespass would prevent the application of the statute, although the tenant was holding over at the time of the trespass. It was also held that such evidence would not sustain the action as to a trespass committed after the tenant had vacated, and while the premises were vacant, since it did not show any title which would, in judgment of law, draw after it the possession.

In Jones v. Taylor, 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 434, it was held that the fact that one is in possession of land under an equitable title, with the consent of the legal owner, but with no estate cognizable by a court of law, does not prevent the legal owner from maintaining trespass quare clausum against a third person for an injury by cutting and removing trees.

Some of the cases have made an exception where the tenant in possession is merely a tenant at will, and hold that in such a case the landlord may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit for an injury to the freehold. This view was adopted in Starr v. Jackson, 11 Mass. 519, after a thorough investigation of the subject.

This exception to the general rule is also supported by Curtiss v. Hoyt, 19 Conn. 154, 48 Am. Rep. 149 (obiter, the real ground of the decision being that the occupation of two or three rooms in a building by tenants did not deprive the owner of possession, preventing him from maintaining trespass for injury to the building as a whole); Davis v. Nash, 32 Me. 411 (Little v. Palister, 3 Me. 6, and Bartlett v. Perkins, 13 Me. 87, denying the right of the owner to maintain trespass q. c. f., the property being in possession of a tenant at will, are distinguishable for the reason that the injury was to the possession only, and not to the freehold); Hingham v. Sprague, 15 Pick. 102; Cushing v. Adams, 18 Pick. 110; Allen v. Thayer, 17 Mass. 299 (obiter); Spencer v. Weatherly, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 327; Cannon v. Hatcher, 1 Hill, L. 260, 26 Am. Dec. 177 (obiter); M'Colman v. Wilkes, 3 Strobb. L. 465, 51 Am. Dec. 637 (obiter, the persons in possession in this case being regarded as agents, rather than tenants).

In Woodman v. Francis, 14 Allen, 198, it was declared in effect that if the property at the time of the trespass was in possession of a tenant at will paying rent, that in itself would defeat an action of trespass quare clausum fregit by the landlord, notwithstanding that some of the acts of the trespasser were of such a character that they would give a cause of action to a reversioner. This case is perhaps distinguishable from Starr v. Jackson, for the reason that, as the opinion states, the action was for a violation of the plaintiff's possession, and the acts done upon the land were alleged merely in aggravation, and not in such a manner as to make them the foundation of the suit.

The right of the landlord to maintain trespass quare clausum fregit for acts committed while the property was in possession of a tenant at will was also denied in Hersey v. Chapin, 162 Mass. 176, 38 N. E. 442. That the injury in this case included damage to the freehold is apparent from the fact that recovery was allowed upon a count (apparently on the case) for an in-denied that Henry J. Geiger, who made the will under which plaintiffs claimed, had ever been seised of the land; and, for a second defense, alleged that he had purchased the land from the executor of the will of Henry J. Geiger, who was empowered to sell; that he had paid the purchase money and had been in the possession since 1863. As there was no proof of the second defense, it was held that it could not be considered. In this state of the case the court held: "This action was brought, as stated, expressly to recover the land in dispute, upon the ground that the plaintiffs had title to the same; and even if the old rule as to the necessity of proving title should now be held to be modified so as to allow a person deprived of the possession of land, under proper allegations, to recover that possession without proof of title, it can have no application to this case. Here prior possession cannot stand for title, although it is an action in the form prescribed by the Code, and not technically trespass to try title under the statute. The plaintiffs staked themselves upon their title, and they must recover, if at all, upon the strength of this title." This is very far from holding that a person in possession cannot recover from one who disseises him or undertakes to assert ownership by cutting timber or otherwise invading the possession.

Heyward v. Farmers' Min. Co. 42 S. C. 138, 28 L.R.A. 42, 46 Am. St. Rep. 702, 19 S. E. 963, 20 S. E. 64, was an action for injunction to restrain trespass. The circuit jury to the reversion. The opinion, however, does not refer to the Starr Case, and in view of the circumstances can hardly be regarded as overruling that case.

Some cases, however, have expressly denied any such exception to the rule, and have expressly held, in absence of statute to the contrary, that the owner may not maintain trespass quare clausum fregit where the premises are in possession of a tenant at will, even though there is an injury to the freehold. Campbell v. Arnold, 1 Johns. 511; Tobey v. Webster, 3 Johns. 468; Steltz v. Kretschmar, 24 Wis. 283; Gunsolus v. Lormer, 54 Wis. 630, 12 N. W. 62. (The rule appears to have been changed by statute in New York. See Wickham v. Freeman, 12 Johns. 183.)

It is to be observed that the point just discussed does not relate to the question whether the owner of the land is entitled to recover, in a proper form of action, from the wrongdoer for damage to the freehold,—as to that there is no question,—but merely to the question whether he may enforce such right in an action in form of trespass quare clausum fregit. Therefore cases like Hastings v. Livermore, 7 Gray, 194, and Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cusenberry, 86 Tex. 525, 26 S. W. 43, in which it does not appear that the action was in that form, or which at least make no point of the form of the action, are not relevant, though they sustain the right of the landlord to recover for an injury to the freehold while the premises are in actual possession of a tenant at will.

Constructive possession.

As implied in the statement of the general rule, however, actual possession is not in all cases necessary to enable one to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit; but the constructive possession which the legal title draws to itself where the property is not in the actual possession of anyone or the person in actual possession is the mere agent or representative of the owner of the legal title, is sufficient to enable the owner to maintain the action. 30 L.R.A. Rochester, 8 Cow. 115; Miller v. Long Island R. Co. 71 N. Y. 380; Cowenhoven v. Brooklyn, 38 Barb. 9; Donovan v. Herbert, 4 Ont. Rep. 635.

"Everyone who has a title to land by deed," said the court in Amick v. Frazier, Dud. L. 340, "has a constructive possession, and can maintain this action (quare clausum fregit) for a casual trespass committed on the land after the title was acquired, without an actual entry. After an judge in granting the injunction required the plaintiff to "institute on the law side of the court such action as he may be advised by his counsel for the purpose of determining the question as to title to the land described in the complaint." From this order there was no appeal. The action was brought under this order, and therefore the plaintiff, as the actor, was bound by the order to do what it required, namely, to assert and prove his title to the land. In addition to this, the state was a party defendant, entitled to stand upon its prima facie ownership of the soil. It was on these considerations that the court held that the plaintiff, though alleging his own possession and a trespass thereon, was obliged to prove actual entry,—which is, going on the land and openly asserting a dominion over it,—he may maintain the same action against a trespasser who obtrudes himself into the actual possession of a part of the land. But when a defendant is in the actual and exclusive possession before and at the time the plaintiff acquires his title and makes his entry, the plaintiff cannot regard it as a trespass on his possession, so as to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit; for it is a solecism in terms to say that he can have a constructive possession of that which is in the actual possession of another. This would be to make a concurrent and exclusive possession consistent."

So, in a case in which the plaintiff in trespass does not claim actual possession of the land from which timber was wrongfully cut, he must allege in his declaration and prove his title to the land and the constructive possession which the law attaches. Holliday-Klotz Land & Lumber Co. v. Markham, supra.

When the lands on which the alleged acts of trespass were committed are not in the actual possession of another, an averment in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit that the plaintiff owns the lands is sufficient. Hammontree v. Huber, 39 Mo. App. 326; Bell v. Clark, 30 Mo. App. 224; Renshaw v. Lloyd, 50 Mo. 368.

Merely proof of the plaintiff's title to the locus in quo draws after it a constructive possession sufficient to entitle him to maintain an action for a trespass thereon, in absence of evidence of any adverse possession thereof. Broker v. Scobey, supra; Bartholomew v. Edwards, 1 Houst. (Del.) 17.

The petition in Renshaw v. Lloyd, supra, alleged that on a certain date, "the defendants without leave, and wrongfully, entered on the northeast quarter of Sec. 18. Twp. 45, range 16, of which the plaintiff was then the owner, and then and there tore down the fences of plaintiff and scattered his rails, and left his fields open and exposed, by which acts and doings of the defendants the plaintiff was damaged" in a 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

title. The case is obviously taken out of the general rule by its peculiar facts.

In Loan & Exch. Bank v. Peterkin, 52 S. C. 236, 68 Am. St. Rep. 900, 29 S. E. 546, the plaintiff brought an action to foreclose a mortgage, and the record does not indicate that there was any allegation of possession, either in the mortgagee or the mortgagor. The defendant set up paramount title and possession of a part of the land originating before the mortgage was given. The holding that on the legal issue of title the plaintiff had the burden of proof, therefore, does not affect the question now under consideration.

The case of Love v. Turner, 71 S. C. 322, 51 S. E. 101, was held to be not an action in the nature of trespass quare clausum certain sum. On the trial the lower court refused to permit the plaintiff to give any evidence, because of his failure to allege that he was in possession of the premises described. In reversing the judgment the appellate court said: "In this state the owner of lands is presumed to be in the possession till the contrary appears. It has never been held here that there must be an actual possession to maintain trespass. When a party has the legal estate in fee in lands, he has the constructive possession when there is no actual possession in anyone else. The word 'owner,' as used in this petition, means that the plaintiff has the legal estate in the lands and is in the possession."

Actual possession, necessary to sustain an action of trespass, may be shown by evidence of fencing or cultivation, or other acts of exclusive control by an agent, without residence by anyone. VanBuskirk v. Dunlap, 2 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 233.

But the mere marking of trees around a tract of forest land is not of itself possession, either actual or constructive, so as to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Oatman v. Fowler, 43 Vt. 462. In cases of trespass upon unseated or uncultivated lands, it is the settled law that the title thereto carries with it a sufficient right to sustain an action of trespass in entering upon the land. Trexler v. Africa, 33 Pa. Super. Ct. 395; Enterprise Transit Co. v. Hazelwood Oil Co. 20 Pa. Super. Ct. 127; Wilkinson v. Connell, supra; Caldwell v. Walters, 22 Pa. 378; Miller v. Zufall, 113 Pa. 317, 6 Atl. 350; Irwin v. Patchen, 164 Pa. 51, 30 Atl. 436; Yahoola River & C. C. Hydraulic Hose Min. Co. v. Irby, 40 Ga. 479, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 460; Gent v. Lynch, 23 Md. 58, 87 Am. Dec. 558; Miller v. Miller, 41 Md. 623; M'Graw v. Bookman, 3 Hill, L. 265; Cannon v. Hatcher, 1 Hill, L. 260, 26 Am. Dec. 177; Roy v. Cramer, 12 U. C. Q. B. 165.

The court, in Safford v. Basto, 4 Mich. 406, said that "a party having the title to unoccupied lands is constructively in possession, and may maintain trespass against one who, without his license or authority, fregit but an action to recover possession of real estate. There the complaint alleged: "That the said defendant continues to assert her claim of title against this plaintiff to said premises, to deny plaintiff's right therein and asserts her determination to prevent the use and enjoyment of said premises by plaintiff, or persons holding under plaintiff, and to continue to use and occupy it for her own benefit; rendering it necessary for plaintiff to apply to this court for relief and for the protection of his title." There was no allegation that the plaintiff was in possession, and that his possession had been invaded by acts of trespass. On the contrary, the plaintiff insisted that the action was to recover possession.

It is true that in Shettlesworth v.

having no color of title to the lands, and whose acts evince no intention to retain permanent possession, enters upon them, and cuts and carries away standing timber."

A warrant and survey for unimproved lands was held in Baker v. King, 18 Pa. 138, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 404, to give to the owner of them a constructive possession of the land which will enable him to maintain trespass for digging ore against anyone having no actual possession of the locus in quo.

So, one having title to a mining claim, and who has in good faith complied with the requirements essential to a valid location, is entitled to the exclusive possession of the claim, and may maintain trespass against one entering thereon and removing timber, although he has not an actual pedis possessio thereof. McFeters v. Pierson, 15 Colo. 201, 22 Am. St. Rep. 388, 24 Pac. 1076.

On the theory of constructive possession, the court in Raub v. Heath, 8 Blackf. 575, held that a purchaser of land at a sheriff's sale, which was vacant and unimproved at the time of the sale and when the deed was given, may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. In reaching this decision the court relied upon Wood v. Mansell, 3 Blackf. 125, which was a similar case.

And it was held in Cressy v. Sawyer, 18 N. H. 95, that the levy of an execution upon the land of a debtor with delivery of seisin and possession by the officer enables the judgment creditor to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against the judgment debtor, who was subsequently found to be in possession against the former's will. This is based on the theory, as stated in Gore v. Brazier, 3 Mass. 523, 3 Am. Dec. 182, that a creditor, after a regular levy and delivery of possession, is regarded as being in the actual seisin and possession of the locus in quo, and that the judgment debtor was regarded only as a tenant at sufferance.

Hughey, 9 Rich. L. 387; Parker v. Leggett, 12 Rich. L. 200, and Sims v. Davis, 70 S. C. 362, 49 S. E. 872, it was held that the verdict was decisive of the title in an action of damages for trespass brought by one in possession, when the title was put in issue. But in none of these cases is it held that on the trial of the issue the plaintiff in possession must assume the burden of proving his title against the world. As we have seen, possession not obtained by a tortious act is prima facie evidence of title, and upon this the plaintiff may rest until the defendant justifies his invasion of the possession by proving either title in himself, or a license to enter from the true owner.

We conclude, therefore, that if the plaintiff held possession of the land not acquired a deed described the land in question, a part of which was uninclosed woodland; that the grantee had exercised acts of ownership over a certain tract as belonging to the farm conveyed by the deed; and that those who had known the land between forty and fifty years understood that the tract in question was a parcel of the farm conveyed. In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit the court held that this evidence was legally sufficient to show that the occupant had such possession as entitled him to maintain the action.

But a void patent to vacate lands will not confer constructive possession of the locus in quo so as to entitle the patentee to maintain an action of trespass, where the patentee has no actual possession. Greer v. Bowling, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1648, 55 S. W. 1081.

An unrecorded deed of wild land is not, of itself, sufficient evidence of possession by the grantee to enable him to maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against another. Estes v. Cook, 22 Pick. 295.

Likewise, the holder of an invalid tax deed of vacant lands has, for want of legal title, no constructive possession of the locus in quo which will sustain an action of trespass. Kraus v. Congdon, 88 C. C. A. 182, 161 Fed. 18.

Proof of a grant from the state to plaintiff, made after the occurrence of the alleged acts of trespass, has been held to be insufficient to show constructive possession necessary to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Gordner v. Blades Lumber Co. 144 N. C. 110, 56 S. E. 695.

Under the provisions of N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 960, proof by plaintiff, in an action for trespass upon unoccupied lands, of an unbroken chain of title in himself for the period of thirty years next preceding the commission of the act of trespass, will be presumptive evidence of his ownership of such lands, and entitle him to maintain the action. Ridgway v. Hawkins, 123 App. Div. 15, 107 N. Y. Supp. 416.

Legal title will not, however, draw after it actual possession of the locus in quo, by the disseisin of the defendant, it was entitled to hold the land, and to recover of the defendant damages for invasion of its possession and for the cutting of timber, unless the defendant proved a title in himself, or a license from one proved to be the true owner, and that the court was in error in charging otherwise.

The court was also in error in charging that if the land in dispute was covered by defendant's chain of title, then the defendant had shown perfect title to the land, unless its title had been defeated by adverse possession. The defendant's chain through written instruments only extended back to 1867 and was not connected with a grant from the state. Hence it was not for the court to say that the chain of title was perfect; since the jury must necessarily determine whether there had been such possession as to presume a grant from the state, or such adverse possession as would complete its title.

The exception alleging error in the following instruction must also be sustained: "I charge you that if the written instrument introduced by plaintiff does not cover the land described in this complaint he cannot recover. If the written chain of title introduced here by plaintiff does not cover and embrace and convey the land described in the complaint he cannot recover, and if it is not covered by his written chain, written instruments here, that would be a failure on the part of the plaintiff to establish a written title or written chain of title to the

which is actually in the occupancy of another, so as to enable such owner to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Wood v. Lafayette, 68 N. Y. 181; Percival v. Chase, 182 Mass. 371, 65 N. E. 800.

A plaintiff who has title to the locus in quo, but who has never entered or had possession, cannot maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against another who has actual pedis possessio under claim of adverse title. Peareson v. Dansby, 2 Hill, L. 466; Pratt v. Battels, 28 Vt. 685.

An action of trespass quare clausum fregit for working a mining claim and removing gold from the ground cannot be maintained by one not in possession of the claim, against another in adverse possession of the same. Raffetto v. Fiori, 50 Cal. 363, 14 Mor. Min. Rep. 469.

A purchaser of land at a sheriff's sale who has not obtained actual possession of the locus in quo by ejectment is not entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one who entered and removed the crops. Beggs v. Thompson, 2 Ohio, 105, 15 Am. Dec. 539.

In Zorn v. Haake, 75 Hun, 235, 27 N. Y. Supp. 38, it appeared that owners in possession of adjoining lots constructed a fence on what they supposed to be the dividing line, but which subsequently proved to be entirely on the lot of the plaintiff. In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit upon the portion of the lot on defendant's side of the fence, the court held that the plaintiff, not being in possession of such strip of land, could not maintain the action.

In Bailey v. Massey, 2 Swan, 167, the court held that where two persons have deeds covering the same lands, but neither of whom had actual possession of the premises, the owner of the older title is entitled, on the theory of constructive possession, to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against the owner of the younger title before the latter has taken actual possession of the locus in quo. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But the court also held that after the defendant had gone into actual possession of the premises claiming under an adverse title, the plaintiff could not, for want of actual possession in himself, maintain the action.

The occupancy of a person put in possession of land to prevent others from committing acts of trespass thereon is regarded as the possession of the owner, who is the one entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, notwithstanding the fact that such agent or employee is permitted to cultivate a part of the land for himself; the portion so cultivated is not regarded as in his exclusive possession for the purposes of the action. The court distinguished this case from those where the land was in possession of a tenant. Davis v. Clancy, 3 M'Cord, L. 422.

The rule that actual possession of the locus in quo is essential to the maintenance of an action of trespass will not be extended or enlarged by construction, so as to authorize the plaintiff to maintain an action for trespass upon a portion of the tract not actually occupied. Thus, one proving possession under a patent of the south end of a certain tract of land, the construction of a house thereon, and the working of a mine, does not show constructive possession of the north end of the tract so as to enable him to maintain an action of trespass. Aikin v. Buck, 1 Wend. 466, 19 Am. Dec. 535.

And in Blackburn v. Baker, 7 Port. (Ala.) 284, it was held that the actual occupancy of one half of a quarter section of land does not draw to its occupant the possession of an adjoining quarter section of unimproved and unoccupied land over which he had exercised acts of ownership, as cutting logs, so as to authorize him to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one who entered thereon and cut logs and who was in the occupancy of land as near to the locus in quo as that occupied by the plaintiff.

A person who enters upon land without title or color of title is deemed to be in land." The plaintiff relied not only on written instruments, but on the claim of presumption of a grant from twenty years' possession, and on adverse possession. Even under the theory of the case adopted by the circuit judge, that the plaintiff could in no event recover without proof of perfect title, the jury might have found a perfect title in the plaintiff from the presumption of twenty years' possession, or from adverse possession for ten years.

The court excluded evidence of the declarations of Mr. Pritchard, one of the persons under whom the defendant claims, as to the land lines and as to trespassing on the lands of the plaintiff. These declarations, if made while Mr. Pritchard was owner of the property, were competent. Ellen v. Ellen, 16 S. C. 132; Levi v. Gardner, 53 S. C. 24, 30 S. E. 617.

We have covered in the discussion a number of the exceptions not particularly mentioned. The remaining exceptions are hypercritical and unsubstantial.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the cause be remanded to that court for a new trial.

possession of no more land than he actually occupies. Moor v. Campbell, 15 N. H. 208.

Sufficiency of possession.

Since possession of the locus in quo, either actual or constructive, is essential to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, questions frequently arise as to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's possession to entitle him to maintain the action.

The court in First Parish v. Smith, 14 Pick. 297, said that "it is a settled rule of law, that any actual possession of real estate is sufficient to enable the party in possession to maintain quare clausum fregit against a stranger; and everyone must be deemed a stranger who can show no title and no elder possession." A similar statement of the rule occurs in Graham v. Peat, 1 East, 244.

"It is sufficient, in an action of trespass," said the court in McCormick v. Huse, 66 Ill. 315, "that the plaintiff was in the possession of the property trespassed upon. It is not necessary that his possession should have been an exclusive one."

In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for entering premises and taking away a horse, a charge in the declaration that the "defendant broke and entered plaintiff's close" was held in Finch v. Alston, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 83, 23 Am. Dec. 299, to be a sufficient averment of possession of the locus in quo at the time of the alleged act of trespass to entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action.

An entry upon land, partially fencing and cultivating the same, cutting timber, and exercising continuous public acts of ownership, constitute actual possession thereof sufficient to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against another intruding without paramount title. McLean v. Farden, 61 Ill. 106.

And an entry upon a parcel of land with the view of taking possession of it under a claim of title, and marking the lines by spotting the trees around the tract, is regarded as a sufficient possession to sustain an action of trespass against one who is unable to show any right to enter upon the land. "It is not necessary," said the court, "to cultivate or to build a fence, in order to take possession of land. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

An actual pedis possessio, with a marking of the boundaries by definite and distinct monuments, is good against one who subsequently comes without any evidence of a right to enter, and will entitle the party who has thus taken actual possession to maintain an action of trespass." Woods v. Banks, 14 N. H. 101.

Evidence of the frequent cutting of wood and timber on a tract of woodland for more than twenty years, under a claim of title, will support an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one who shows no title. Kilborn v. Rewee, 8 Gray, 415.

Uncontradicted proof which shows that plaintiff, eighteen years before the alleged trespass took place, took possession of the locus in quo, set out a row of fruit trees on its boundary, leveled and generally improved the ground, is sufficient to sustain plaintiff's right to maintain an action of trespass. McGinnis v. Murphy, 23 N. Y. Week. Dig. 215.

One who showed that he had been in possession of the locus in quo for more than thirty years before the alleged trespass was committed, under a written instrument purporting to convey the land included in the locus in quo, and that he had cleared and improved the land and actually occupied a portion thereof, has been held to have possession sufficient to enable him to maintain an action of trespass against an intruder. Donohue v. Whitney, 133 N. Y. 178, 30 N. E. 848.

Parties engaged in mining and using ditches in the prosecution of that business have sufficient possession of such ditches as will enable them to maintain an action of trespass against one having no right thereto. Bileu v. Paisley, 18 Or. 47, 4 L.R.A. 840, 21 Pac. 934.

A wife, during the absence of her husband, who owned the house, was held in Ford v. Schliessman, 107 Wis. 479, 83 N. W. 761, to be in possession sufficient to enable her to maintain an action of trespass against one who entered therein late in the evening and made indecent demonstrations to her. The court said that "in the case at bar we must hold that the plaintiff was at the time in the exclusive possession of the dwelling house and premises, as against the defendant; and upon the evidence in the record she has the right to recover such damages as she has sustained by reason of such invasion of her possession and rights."

And in Bieri v. Fonger, 139 Wis. 150, 120 N. W. 862, the court held that a wife during the absence of her husband was in such exclusive possession of the house and premises as to entitle her to maintain an action of trespass against one who wrongfully entered the house for the purpose of soliciting carnal intercourse.

A similar decision was rendered in Newell v. Whitcher, 53 Vt. 589, 38 Am. Rep. 703. In this case it appeared that the plaintiff, who was a blind girl, gave music lesson to the defendant's daughters, and was in the habit of lodging in his house on the days when she gave lessons. On one occasion the defendant came to the room set apart for the plaintiff, about midnight, sat upon her bed, and made repeated solicitations for sexual intercourse, which she repelled. The court held that the plaintiff's right to her private sleeping room during the night was exclusive, and that she was entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against the defendant.

And in Lewis v. Ponsford, 8 Car. & P. 687, there is a dictum to the effect that a female servant of the occupant of a house has such possession of her bedroom as will enable her to maintain action of trespass against a wrongdoer who forces himself into it while she is in bed.

A man who constructed a house upon the lands of his wife, in which he resided with his wife and family, having control of the house, and who owned the stock on the farm, which he operated in his own name, is entitled to maintain an action of trespass against one who violently broke into and entered such house. The court said that "the wife had the right to confer upon her husband the possession and control of the property; and if she did so, he was entitled to defend such possession and to maintain an action of trespass against a stranger who should unlawfully and forcibly disturb him in the enjoyment of it. In one sense, it is true his possession would be hers; that is to say, it would not be hostile to her title, and would inure to her benefit as that of a tenant inures to the benefit of his landlord; but, nevertheless, he would have the right to protect it against a trespasser." The court further said that the jury was justified by the facts in finding that the wife had put the husband into possession of the farm. Alexander v. Hard, 64 N. Y. 228.

The fact that the plaintiffs shortly before the alleged act of trespass was committed left the house unoccupied for a time is not sufficient to defeat their possessory title, where it appears that they had been in possession of the house and lot under a deed, that they locked up the building and placed it in charge of an agent to rent it. Holman v. Herscher (Tex.) 16 S. W. 984.

A trustee upon whom an estate is set-

led by a decree of the chancery court for the benefit of a feme covert, who remained in possession of the premises, becomes, upon acceptance of the trust, in legal contemplation vested with the actual possession, and may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a mere wrongdoer although the decree creating the trust may be technically defective. Rogers v. White, 1 Sneed, 68.

The possession of land by a guardian is regarded as possession by the ward so as to entitle the latter to maintain, by his next friend, an action of trespass for an act committed by the wrongful consent of the guardian. Johnson v. Meyer, 4 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 383.

A right to the possession of land by an administrator of a deceased owner who died while in actual possession is sufficient to enable him to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, although he never was in actual possession. Carter v. Jackson, 56 N. H. 364.

The occupancy by a widow of land of which she took possession upon the death of her husband, was held in Byrne v. Van Hoesen, 5 Johns. 66, to be sufficient to enable her to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for entering the close and cutting down trees, on the theory that she is entitled to possession by right as guardian in socage of her infant children.

The use of a church for divine worship by a religious society, the building being kept locked when not in use, is a sufficient possession to enable the trustee of the society to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a person breaking into the building, although such trustee is not a regular or constant attendant at the services, since the possession of the congregation will be regarded as his possession. Carrine v. Westerfield, 3 A. K. Marsh. 331.

A person who contracted with the owner of a close for the purchase merely of a growing crop of grass thereon was held in Stevens v. Adams, 1 Thomp. & C. 587, to have such an exclusive possession of the close, though for a limited purpose, as to entitle him to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against any one entering the close and taking the grass, even with the assent of the owners of the soil.

A grant to one, his heirs, and assigns, of all of the trees standing and growing in a certain close forever, with a license to cut and carry them away, transfers an estate of inheritance in the trees with an exclusive interest in the soil so far as it may be necessary for the support and nourishment of the trees, and entitles the grantee to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against the owner of the soil for cutting down the trees. In reply to the defense that the plaintiff could not maintain trespass for breaking the close, the court said: "Upon looking into the cases, we are satisfied that the plaintiff, having an inheritance in the trees, and an exclusive right in the soil of the close, as far as was necessary for their support and nourishment, may maintain trespass for breaking the close, as well as for cutting. It appears to be a principle of law well settled, that where a man has a separate interest in the soil for a particular use, although the right of the soil is not in him, if he be injured in the enjoyment of his particular use of the soil, he may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit; but not if his interest is in common with others." Clap v. Draper, 4 Mass. 266, 3 Am. Dec. 215.

In reaching a decision in Clap v. Draper, supra, the court applied the doctrine announced in Wilson v. Mackreth, 3 Burr. 1824. In this case it appeared that the plaintiff had and exercised an exclusive right of digging turf in a certain parcel of land in which he with other tenants had common pasturage, the right of the soil being in the lord of the manor. The defendant dug and removed peats from the place in question, and the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against him.

An action of trespass quare clausum fregit by one who, having the right to enter upon certain land, sold to another the pine trees thereon, with the right to enter to cut and carry them away, against the latter for his act in removing trees belonging to the former. The court said that "when the defendant, being in possession for the purpose of removing the pine timber, goes further and takes the cedar timber belonging to the plaintiff, and for the removal of which he is in possession, as the exceptions show, such act of the defendant is not only a violation of the plaintiff's right of property, but is a violation of his possession; and this cannot be affected by the fact that the defendant has the right to go to all parts of the premises where the pine timber is to be found to remove it. As it is only to that extent that he is to be regarded as in possession, when he goes beyond this, as he must in all cases where he attempts to take the other timber, he becomes a trespasser on the possession of the plaintiff; he goes where he has no right to go, and where he has no possession, his possession being limited by his right." Haskin v. Record, 32 Vt. 575.

In Hull v. Sanctuary, 68 Vt. 57, 33 Atl. 890, the facts showed that the defendant leased to the plaintiff the basement of an old mill to be used for creamery purposes, and agreed to furnish water to operate the same; the water by which power was furnished was conducted through a ditch and flume from a dam located about half of a mile from the mill. In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for opening the dam and thereby preventing the use of the water by plaintiff, the court held that the lease did not give the plaintiff any title or interest in the dam so as to entitle him to maintain the action.

Pick, 297, showed that the proprietors of a township, by vote, appropriated a parcel of ground for the purpose of constructing a meetinghouse thereon. Some time after the erection of the building the town was incorporated and assumed entire charge of its parochial affairs. The land surrounding the meetinghouse was known as the "common" or "meetinghouse land," was always open, and was intersected by numerous ways; it was used as a site for horse sheds, as a training field, as a place for town meetings, and for all purposes incident to a house of worship. Many years after the erection of the building the proprietors voted to sell portions of the grounds, and at times had exercised other acts of ownership over the premises. In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for plowing up a part of the grounds, the court held that the first parish, as successor of the town in its parochial capacity, might, having actual possession, maintain the action. The court said that the vote of the proprietors and the actual erection of the meetinghouse gave an actual possession of the land to the parish, sufficient to enable it to maintain the action.

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Boyd, 63 Md. 325, it appeared that the city of Baltimore passed an ordinance opening a certain street on condition that the defendant railroad company which laid its tracks therein pay to the city all damages suffered by the property owners. Subsequently the damages were paid as directed, but the city failed to distribute the money among the various property owners. In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, the court held that there was no such ouster or dis-eisin by the defendant, as will prevent the plaintiffs from maintaining their action.

In Martin v. Tobin, 123 Mass. 85, the court held that a lessee who had become the owner of an undivided portion of the premises was entitled to the right of possession as against all persons, except the one to whom he had mortgaged his portion and who had entered to foreclose, and therefore entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit.

Joint possession of the locus in quo with other persons is sufficient possession to enable the plaintiff to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Holly v. Brown, 14 Conn. 255.

The possession of one of the proprietors of common lands is sufficient to avail the corporation, composed of such proprietors, of the right to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit without showing his authority to act for the others. Monumoi Great Beach v. Rogers, 1 Mass. 150.

Evidence of the possession of one of two plaintiffs, involving a claim of the right of both, is admissible in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit as showing that the action was properly brought. Kinney v. Service, 91 Mich. 629, 52 N. W. 53.

Under an Arkansas statute it is held that the payment of taxes on wild and unimproved lands, under color of title, constitutes such possession for each successive year in which payment is made as will enable the payor to protect the property against acts of trespass. Towson v. Denison, 74 Ark. 302, 86 S. W. 661; Price v. Greer, 76 Ark. 426, 88 S. W. 985.

But in absence of proof that the taxes were paid on such lands for the year during which the acts of trespass were alleged to have been committed, the plaintiff cannot maintain the action. Price v. Greer, supra.

An island, whether cultivated or not, is sufficiently inclosed if surrounded by navigable water, to support an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. In absence of analogous cases, the court in this instance applied the fence law, which provides that a deep, navigable stream is equivalent to a fence. Fripp v. Hasell, 1 Strobb. L. 173.

In Cook v. Rider, 16 Pick. 186, the court held that one who entered upon an uncultivated and unappropriated tract of land, drove in stakes with his initials on them to mark the extent of his possession and claim, and erected buildings thereon, was entitled to judgment in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against another who entered upon a portion of the claim so staked out, if the jury find that the plaintiff entered with an intention to take possession, and if they find that the defendant knew or might by the use of ordinary care have found out that fact, and if such mode of inclosing lands of that character had been acquiesced in by the people of the town in which it was located, as giving a valid right of possession.

Possession of government lands by one who has filed his declaratory statement for the purpose of pre-empting the land, and to whom the government has issued the usual receipt, is sufficient to enable the occupant to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Courchaine v. Bullin, Min. Co. 4 Nev. 309, 12 Mor. Min. Rep. 235.

In order to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit upon public lands under the act of 1837, it is not necessary that the premises be inclosed by a fence, or that the plaintiff should settle on the same tract of land upon which the trespass was committed or one immediately adjoining it. Gleason v. Edmunds, 3 Ill. 448.

Prior possession of public lands will entitle the possessor to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Grover v. Hawley, 5 Cal. 485.

A mere occupant of lands owned by the government may bring an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against anyone who wrongfully dispossesses him. The court said that the common-law rule that any possession is sufficient to sustain trespass against a wrongdoer was established as a legal protection to persons occupying land not their own, and to preserve peace 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and quiet. Duncan v. Potts, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 82, 24 Am. Dec. 768.

But under Gen. Stat. § 90, providing that "any person settled upon any of the public lands belonging to the United States may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit," providing that his claim is "marked out so that the boundaries thereof may be readily traced and the extent of such claim readily known," and is in actual possession of the claim, or has made improvements thereon to the value of $100, it was held in Martin v. Pittman, 3 Colo. App. 220, 32 Pac. 840, that a settler who has merely had his claim surveyed, put eight logs in the foundation for a cabin valued at $10, worked upon the place about eleven days grubbing, which constituted all of the improvements made, and who had never resided upon the tract, cannot maintain an action of trespass against another who entered upon the land, cut wild hay growing thereon and "picketed" his horses on a portion of the claim.

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Timmermann, 61 Tex. 680, the court held that a widow who for more than four years after the death of her husband had been in exclusive possession of the locus in quo as her homestead, in which possession her children acquiesced, is entitled to maintain an action of trespass.

A town which has only the care and superintendence of a national road the fee to which is in the state has no such possessory right in the road as will enable it to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Summit, 3 Ill. App. 155.

A similar decision was rendered in Conner v. New Albany, 1 Blackf. 88, 12 Am. Dec. 207, in which it was held that the qualified possession which by law the president and trustees of an incorporated town have in the streets, is not sufficient to enable them to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for an injury thereto. The court said that "a street in a town is a public highway. It is a subject of common use, and not of exclusive possession, an incorporeal hereditament, in which all persons possess equal right,—the right of passing over it,—and is in its nature incapable of being reduced into possession. But it is a subject of government; and the government of it is, by the act regulating the incorporation of towns, placed in the hands of the corporation. They have the power to keep it in repair, to remove nuisances, etc.; but this power is no more than a supervisor possesses over a common highway, and is certainly of a very different nature from a possession, either absolute or qualified. Consequently, no possessory right exists in the corporation by which the action can be supported."

But in case in which the corporation owns the freehold or has the actual possession of the soil of a market place, it has been held that an action of trespass will lie against one who placed stalls, tables, etc., thereon without permission. Norwich v. Swann, 2 W. Bl. 1116.

An action of trespass quare clausum fregit may be sustained upon a temporary interest in the plaintiff, but the settled rules require such interest to be entire or exclusive. Thus, in Dorsey v. Eagle, 7 Gill & J. 321, it was held that the right of ingress and egress given an outgoing tenant after the termination of his lease, for the only purpose of enabling him to gather and carry away the growing crops, is not sufficient to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against the succeeding tenant, to whom the lease gave the right to seed down the field on which such crop stands, before it was ready for the gathering. This decision was based on the theory that the incoming tenant only was entitled to the exclusive possession of the locus in quo.

An action of quare clausum fregit will lie at the instance of a mere licensee, against one who planted oysters within the range occupied by the former and who subsequently harvested the crop. Paul v. Hazleton, 37 N. J. L. 106.

The doctrine of the Paul Case was approved and followed in Miller v. Greenwich Twp. 62 N. J. L. 771, 42 Atl. 735, in which the court held that one who had a parol license to maintain a sewer from his own land across that of an adjoining owner may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one who injured or destroyed the sewer while cutting down a public street.

And in Crosby v. Wadsworth, 6 East, 602, it was held that one who contracted with the owner of the close for the purchase of a growing crop of grass to be made into hay by the vendee had such an exclusive possession of the close, though for a limited purpose, that he could maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against one entering the close and removing the grass.

One having an irrevocable license consisting of a lease under seal granting him the sole and exclusive right to cut and carry away from a certain pond all of the ice cut for private use or as merchandise may maintain an action against another for breaking and entering upon the close known as a certain pond, and cutting and carrying away ice. The court said that "it is not necessary to discuss the somewhat nice questions whether the plaintiff had such an interest in the land that he could bring trespass quare clausum, or whether he had such property in the ice that he could maintain an action of trover against the defendants. He had an interest greater than a mere revocable license, and could bring an action against Daggett [the lessor] if he interfered with his rights under the lease; he had, as we have said, a valuable right, and, if a stranger unlawfully encroached upon this right, we can see no reason why he might not maintain a proper action therefor." Richards v. Gauffret, 145 Mass. 486, 14 N. E. 535.

One who had erected abutments to a milldam under a parol license from the owner of the land was held in Wilson v. Chalfant, 15 Ohio, 248, 45 Am. Dec. 574, to have such possession of the locus in quo as will enable him to maintain an action of trespass against another for tearing down the abutments.

A grantee of the right to convey water through the land of the grantor by means of a race to the former's mill may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for an injury to such right. Baer v. Martin, 8 Blackf. 317.

The owner of only the profits of the soil may maintain an action of trespass for breaking and entering his close. Stevens v. Adams, 1 Thomp. & C. 587. The land in this case was owned by the wife of the plaintiff.

A judgment in forcible detainer is sufficient to establish the right of one in whose favor it was rendered to immediate possession, and to enable him to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Western Book & Stationery Co. v. Jevne, 78 Ill. App. 668.

Possession sufficient to enable one to maintain an action of trespass for breaking and entering a house is not shown by proof of the delivery to him by the owner of the house of a key thereof for the purpose of removing goods stored in the building. Davis v. Wood, 7 Mo. 162.

Facts showing possession sufficient to support an action of trespass quare clausum fregit were not presented in United Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Franks, 85 Me. 321, 27 Atl. 185. In this case it appeared that the plaintiff, which claimed under a sheriff's deed, defective for absence of a seal, worked the property for a year and then ceased operations. The superintendent of the plaintiff retained the keys, but the locks were afterwards taken from the buildings, some of the windows broken, the buildings allowed to become out of repair, and some of the machinery had been removed. The defendant went into possession under a tax deed void for irregularity, and removed certain machinery left on the premises. The court held that possession of the plaintiff was insufficient as against the defendant.

Proof in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit that the plaintiff, who had no title to the locus in quo, was inclosing the same when the alleged act of trespass was committed, one side being still open, is insufficient to show such actual possession as will entitle him to maintain the action. The court said that the doctrine of constructive possession can have no application to a case like this one, where the plaintiff has no title and relies upon his naked actual possession. Nelson v. Carter County Justices, 1 Coldw. 207.

The evidence in Bailey v. McNeily, 20 U. C. Q. B. 451, showed that the husband of the plaintiff lived close to the land in question, had for many years cut fire wood and made sugar thereon, and that it had been assessed to him for some time. Others had made similar use of the land, but not to the same extent; it had never been inclosed, and the neighbors' cattle as well as his own had been accustomed to roam over it. A short while before the commencement of the action the plaintiff had put up a fence on the land, and defendants put up another within his fence. In an action of trespass, the court held that the plaintiff, who showed no title, had not such possession as would entitle her to maintain the action.

In Greaves v. Hilliard, 15 U. C. C. P. 326, the only evidence of possession was plaintiff's entry upon and his presence at the survey of the land in question which he claimed as his own, but to which he showed no title. The defendant also assisted in the survey, and did not object to plaintiff's claim of right of possession, but asserted his own right to do the acts complained of. The court held that the plaintiff presented no proof either of actual or constructive possession such as would entitle him to maintain an action of trespass.

The use, by the owner of land bounded on one side by a highway, of a strip of land between his own and the traveled portion of the highway, by moving a wall, planting trees, cutting brushwood, and digging up the soil for fifteen years, gives him no right of possession sufficient to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The court said: "Having no fee in the soil under the deed, and having upon the evidence acquired none by adverse possession, her right in the premises was a right of way,—an easement. For the interruption of that easement this action of trespass quare clausum will not lie." Smith v. Slocomb, 11 Gray, 280.

Occasional use by a mechanic of land located near his shop, for purposes connected with his trade, depositing wood thereon, etc., is not evidence of possession sufficient to enable him to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, since there was nothing in his use of the land that excluded others from using it also, or of showing any intention on his part of excluding others. The court further held that evidence, in addition to the above, that he constructed the foundation of a building upon the land, showed an intention to assert occupation in an absolute and permanent sense which would entitle him to maintain the action. Moore v. Hodgdon, 18 N. H. 144.

One who entered into possession of land under an agreement to lease the same, but who afterwards refused to execute a written lease, never acquired any right to the possession of the land, and cannot, therefore, maintain an action of trespass. Welsh v. Quaid, 5 N. Y. Week. Dig. 471.

So, one in possession as a servant or employee of the owner has no interest in the land which will authorize him to maintain an action against a trespasser. Rogers v. Duhart, 97 Cal. 500, 32 Pac. 570.

A schoolmaster, who has no interest in the school building beyond the mere liberty of occupying the same during the day for the purpose of teaching, has no such possession as will entitle him to maintain an action of trespass against another for breaking into and entering the building. Monaghan v. Ferguson, 3 U. C. Q. B. 484.

In reaching the decision in Monaghan v. Ferguson, supra, the court relied upon Wildbor v. Rainforth, 8 Barn. & C. 5, in which it appeared that a pauper, who had been allowed by the overseers of the poor to occupy a small tenement, went away leaving her children in the house; a few days thereafter the overseer took possession of the place, put a lock on the door and removed the children to the workhouse. In an action of trespass brought by the pauper, the court held that she could not sue in trespass, for she was not a tenant of the premises, but was merely allowed to occupy them by the parish officers, the possession being in fact theirs.

One in possession of a farm under an agreement with the owner to work the same on shares for a single crop has no such possession of the premises as will entitle him to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against another. Decker v. Decker, 17 Hun, 13; Bradish v. Schenck, 8 Johns. 151.

And one whom a tenant permits to put in a crop of rye upon shares cannot, not being in possession, maintain an action of trespass for cutting and carrying away the crop. McKeeby v. Webster, 170 Pa. 624, 32 Atl. 1096.

But one in exclusive possession of a parcel of land under an agreement to work the same on shares may maintain an action in the nature of trespass quare clausum fregit against an officer making an unlawful entry under a writ of attachment. Darling v. Kelly, 113 Mass. 29.

So, a lessee of land on shares who was given exclusive possession of the land, and entire charge and control of the crops, may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum against one who entered and removed a portion of the crops. The court said that "where . . . the owner parts with his entire possession of the land to his lessee or tenant, and is to receive his half by way of rent in kind, the relation of tenants in common [of the crops] does not exist; but it is that of lessor and lessee. The lessor has no right to disturb the lessee in his possession or to interfere with or take his half, for, the possession of the land being in the lessee, the property in the crop must necessarily follow the interest in the land until the time for division." Warner v. Abbey, 112 Mass. 355.

A tenant at sufferance has no right to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against the landlord, since as against the latter he has no legal right of possession on which to found the action.

Wilde v. Cantillon, 1 Johns. Cas. 123; Easty v. Baker, 50 Me. 325, 79 Am. Dec. 616.

The making of pole bridges over a ditch on one side of a public road for the purpose of driving cattle into a tract of swamp land, the ranging of the cattle on the swamp, and occasionally cutting a few trees, is not such a possession as will sustain an action of trespass. Morris v. Hayes, 47 N. C. (2 Jones, L.) 93.

Under the rule that a plaintiff in trespass must show actual possession or title to the land, evidence that plaintiff on several occasions rode along a highway which extended through the land and had paid taxes on the land a few times was held in Powers v. Halter, 152 Ala. 636, 44 So. 859, to be insufficient to show actual possession necessary to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit.

The facts in Gaster v. Welna, 23 Neb. 564, 37 N. W. 456, showed that the defendant had possession for four years of a certain tract of land under a tax deed, and used the land as a pasture. The plaintiff, who had obtained a deed from the grantee, of the patentee, drove out the cattle of the defendant and constructed a fence around the tract. The court held that the plaintiff had no such possession as entitled him to maintain an action of trespass against the defendant, who broke down the fence and drove his cattle back.

A sale by a town of all the seaweed that may land upon the town's beaches for the ensuing year gives to the purchaser no such possession of the beach as will entitle him to maintain an action of trespass against one entering upon the beach and removing the seaweed therefrom. Speaking with reference to the purchaser's right of possession, the court said: "But he acquired no interest in the land. He acquired only a right to the manure that might be thrown thereon, and a license to enter for the purpose of securing it and taking it away. He needed no exclusive right in the land, nor any separate interest in it, in order to obtain the full benefit of his purchase. . . . The gist of this action is the breaking and entering of the plaintiff's close. As he failed to prove that the close was his, he cannot recover damages for the taking and carrying away of the manure, even on proof that it was his property." Parsons v. Smith, 5 Allen, 578.

In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit the circuit court charged the jury "that either the possession or the right of possession would authorize the maintenance of the action." On appeal this charge was held to be erroneous because the right of possession and the right of entry are synonymous terms, and authorize the bringing of an action of ejectment, but not of trespass. In commenting on the error of the trial judge, the court said: "It is possible that by the right of possession the court meant constructive possession, but they are very different in their significance, and this court cannot but think that by this charge the jury were misled, as 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

there is no proof of an actual or constructive possession on the part of the plaintiff, and the court cannot see upon what principle this verdict was founded. . . .

The court should have charged the jury that a constructive possession would authorize the maintenance of this action against a casual trespasser, where there was no person in the adverse possession of the disputed premises. But that the action could not be supported under any other circumstances, unless the plaintiff were in the actual possession at the time when the injury was committed." Polk v. Henderson, 9 Yerg. 310.

"The pursuit of game, the occasional cutting of trees, or gathering of herbage or wild fruits, and the like," said the court in Moore v. Hodgdon, 18 N. H. 144, "furnish no presumption that the entry is made for the purpose of taking possession; in the first place, because they are not exclusive in their character, and may well consist with like enjoyment of the land by others; and, in the second place, because there is nothing in such proceedings that indicates the limits of the country embraced in the occupation. But it is otherwise where one enters under a deed, which defines his claim, or where one, by a fence, attempts to exclude others, or where, by the particular use which he makes of the land, he indicates with precision the extent to which he proposes to enjoy it to the exclusion of others."

When several plaintiffs seek to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, it is necessary for them to establish a joint possession. Storer v. Hobbs, 52 Me. 144.

And where two parties have a concurrent or mixed possession of land, but neither of whom has any title or exclusive priority of possession, one cannot maintain an action of trespass against the other. Thus in Barnstable v. Thacher, 3 Met. 239, it was held that a town which took possession of uninclosed land to which it had no title, and prohibited anyone from taking cranberries therefrom except upon compliance with certain conditions, cannot maintain an action of trespass against persons taking cranberries from such land under a license from one who claimed a right to the land before the town took possession, but who could not show any title thereto.

Possession without title or under defective title.

Since trespass quare clausum fregit involves an injury to the right of possession of the locus in quo, the question of title is not generally involved and therefore is immaterial unless the plaintiff relies upon constructive possession which attaches to the title when the property is not in actual possession of anyone. The authorities sustain the rule that actual possession of the locus in quo without title or with a defective title is sufficient to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one having no superior right.

English.—Lambert v. Stroother, Wille's Rep. 221; Cary v. Holt, 2 Strange, 1238.

As was well said by the court in Myrick v. Bishop, supra, "it is consistent with first principles [that possession alone should be sufficient to maintain an action of trespass], and in fact would be strange if it were not so; for wretched would be the policy which required the title to be shown in every instance where the peaceable possession was disturbed by an intruder who had no right. It would tend to broils and quarrels, and the possessor would resort to force to defend his possession if the law afforded him no redress."

"No principle is more firmly established," said the court in Mallett v. White, supra, "than that mere possession of land, however recent, is a sufficient title to support an action of trespass against one who has not a better right. Indeed the person who is in peaceable possession is regarded as owner, except in a contest with one who shows a superior title." A similar statement was made in Catteris v. Cowper, 4 Taunt. 547.

In Lankford v. Green, 62 Ala. 314, the court said that "the action is trespass quare clausum fregit, and to maintain it, the plaintiff is not bound to show title. Possession, whether founded on a good or bad title, will support the action against a stranger or wrongdoer. Or, the possession may be tortious, and a wrongdoer cannot justify or excuse an invasion of and injury to it."

"A party peaceably in possession of lands," said the court in Larue v. Russell, 26 Ind. 386, "may maintain trespass for an injury to his possession, though the trespasser have a better title to the lands."

A plaintiff in possession of the locus in quo is entitled to a judgment in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, as against one showing no superior right. Jenkins v. Palmer, 72 N. H. 592, 58 Atl. 42.

In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, the court in Sullivan v. Clements, 1 Colo. 261, holds that if the plaintiff does not show title to the locus in quo he must show that he was in actual possession thereof at the time of the alleged act. A similar statement was made in Heinrichs v. Terrell, 65 Iowa, 25, 21 N. W. 171, and in Oatman v. Fowler, 43 Vt. 463.

Actual possession of land, though wrongful, is sufficient to support an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a mere stranger or intruder. Courchaine v. Bullion Min. Co. supra.

One in possession of land under color of title, though the same is defective, may maintain an action of trespass against a wrongdoer. Nelson v. Mather, 5 Kan. 151; Magowan v. Branham, 95 Ky. 581, 26 S. W. 803; Douglass v. Dickson, 31 Kan. 310, 1 Pac. 541; Boyington v. Squires, 71 Wis. 276, 37 N. W. 227.

Possession of land without even a claim of title vests a sufficient right of property in the person having such possession, to enable him to hold the land against all of the world except the true owner; it is prima facie evidence of seisin in fee. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnson, supra.

In McFarlane v. Ray, 14 Mich. 465, the court said that proof of possession of land and claim of title thereto under a deed which purports to convey it is prima facie evidence of title in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one who shows no right in himself. A similar statement was made by the court in Blaisdell v. Roberts, 37 Me. 239.

A declaration in trespass for cutting and carrying away the trees of the plaintiff is good without an averment that the land on which the trees were growing belonged 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to the plaintiff. Gronour v. Daniels, 7 Blackf. 108.

Proof of title is not necessary to entitle a plaintiff to recover in an action of trespass for breaking and entering plaintiff's close, under a petition which alleged his title to and possession of the locus in quo, when the defendants did not deny the plaintiff's possession or set up any adverse claim thereto. Printz v. Cheeney, 11 Iowa, 469.

A party in possession of land without title or claim of title, and claiming no interest therein further than his mere possession thereof may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one not having the slightest interest or claim to the land, for damage done by the latter's cattle. The court said that "trespass quare clausum fregit is a mere possessory action, and may be maintained against a mere wrongdoer by any person in the possession of the land upon which the trespass is committed, without any reference to who owns the land." Hesley v. Baker, 19 Kan. 9.

One owning a house adjoining an alley may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a municipality for removing steps extending 30 inches into the alley, and a board walk and drain extending in the alley along the side of the house, where it appears that the municipal corporation is not the owner of the alley and has no authority by law to remove the structures as nuisances. New Windsor v. Stocksedale, 95 Md. 196, 52 Atl. 596.

A contractor in possession of a parcel of ground for the purpose of erecting a building thereon has actual possession, and is entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Illinois & St. L. R. & Coal Co. v. Caldwell, 17 Ill. App. 409.

One in possession of a tract of land, the owner in severalty of a portion of the tract not objecting thereto, may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a mere stranger. Preston v. Robinson, 24 Vt. 583; Hibbard v. Foster, 24 Vt. 542.

A dowress in actual possession of land set off to her is entitled to maintain an action of trespass for breaking and entering the close and taking away sand, wood, trees, and cranberries, regardless of the validity of the proceedings by which the land was set off to her. Nickerson v. Thacher, 146 Mass. 609, 16 N. E. 581.

In Sweetland v. Stetson, 115 Mass. 49, it appeared that each party had as much land as the deed called for, and that the controversy was over a strip 1 foot wide on which the fence between the two lots stood. The court held that the plaintiff, being in possession of the disputed strip, was entitled to maintain an action against the other party for the tort in breaking and entering the close and pulling down the fence.

An action of trespass quare clausum

fregit may be maintained for cutting and carrying away timber from a piece of land in the possession of the plaintiff, who claims title under a patent issued to an incompetent Indian and a deed from such Indian, which had never been approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The court said that the plaintiff has color of title to the locus in quo, and, however defective such title may be, yet, for the purposes of this action, he must be deemed to be the real owner of the premises, and may recover for the disturbance of his possession. "It would be very bad policy," the court continued, "to allow a mere wrongdoer after he has committed a trespass, when he is sued for it, to interpose embarrassing and perplexing questions of ownership, to litigate nice and intricate questions of title, with the party in possession, who claims to be the owner, and who has color of title." Nelson v. Mather, supra.

Actual possession of land under an invalid tax collector's deed is sufficient to support an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Maxfield v. White River Lumber Co. 74 N. H. 158, 65 Atl. 832.

"Even though the [tax] deed be shown to be in fact invalid," said the court in Douglass v. Dickson, supra, "yet, where possession is taken and held under it, either personally or by tenant, such possession, being under color and claim of title, is sufficient evidence of title to sustain a recovery of damages as against a mere trespasser."

Actual possession of land under claim and color of title of a tax deed was held in Kunkel v. Utah Lumber Co. 29 Utah, 13, 81 Pac. 897, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 187, to be sufficient to maintain an action against one who, without title or right of possession, entered upon the land and removed a building therefrom.

One who takes possession under a grant from the government, of more land than his grant conveyed to him, may maintain an action of trespass against another entering upon the part not included within the grant, and removing trees therefrom. Cutts v. Spring, 15 Mass. 135.

In Morse v. Iman, 42 Ill. 150, 89 Am. Dec. 417, it appeared that two parties fenced off a piece of land which they did not own in fee for the purpose of using the grass thereon, and without a partition fence agreed that each should use a certain portion of the tract. After thus occupying the land for a period of three years, one of the parties gave a third person permission to enter upon the land and cut hay, and the latter cut the same from the other party's portion of the field. The court held that the plaintiff was in such actual possession of the part of the tract assigned to him as to maintain an action of trespass against the one so removing the grass from his part. In speaking of the rights of the occupant, the court said: "The law is well settled, that a person in possession of property may recover for damages done to the property, as against all persons but the true owner, and may maintain any appropriate action for a recovery against any person but the true owner, precisely as if it were his own. By the agreement or understanding between appellant [plaintiff] and Larson [the other party in possession], each was entitled to hold and enjoy his portion, as they did, in severalty, subject only to the rights of the owner of the soil. Either might maintain an action against the other for any invasion of his possession. By their understanding each was in the exclusive possession of his several portion. This being so, neither had the right to license strangers to enter on the portion of the other. Appellee [defendant] therefore acquired no right to enter upon this land and cut and appropriate this hay by obtaining permission from Larson."

A minister of a parish settled for life or a term of years was held in Cargill v. Sewall, 19 Me. 288, to be entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit.

One in possession of another's land, to take care of the premises and to prevent others from doing injury to them, is entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Russell v. Thorn, 1 Mo. 390.

Likewise, the former owner of a house which had been sold to a municipal corporation may, on the ground that he is still in possession, maintain an action of trespass against a neighbor who entered and pulled down the house. Glass v. Dobson, 14 U. C. Q. B. 419.

And one who sold his land but remained in possession thereof by the permission of the grantee, which was a town-site company, has sufficient possession to maintain an action of trespass against a mere stranger, although the grantee had regularly laid out the land as a township site and had made and filed a survey. Sell v. Graves, 16 Mont. 342, 40 Pac. 788.

A defendant in an action to recover land, who gives a replevy bond which entitles him to the possession of the premises as against the plaintiff until the suit is decided or the writ of sequestration is quashed, is entitled to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one entering under the authority of the plaintiff in the action to recover the land. Linard v. Crossland, 10 Tex. 462, 60 Am. Dec. 213.

The levy of an execution under the provisions of § 4, chap. 107, Mass. Stat. 1844, was held in Wellington v. Geary, 3 Allen, 508, to be prima facie sufficient proof of title to sustain an action of trespass in the nature of trespass quare clausum fregit against a mere wrongdoer, without showing that an action to recover possession of the land had been brought within a year from the return of the execution on which the levy was made, as required by such statute.

One in actual possession of land under a deed thereof to commence in futuro may maintain an action of trespass against a stranger. Allen v. Taft, 6 Gray, 552.

It was held in Ashley v. Landers, 9 Allen, 250, that an entry under deeds of warranty upon land over which a way existed gives sufficient seisin and possession to sustain an action of trespass for breaking and entering plaintiff's close, removing a fence from the same, and cutting trees thereon, against one showing no title to justify his acts.

A grantee entering into possession of land belonging to infants under a deed given by their guardian may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a third party, although the deed is ineffectual to transfer title. Todd v. Jackson, 26 N. J. L. 525.

A railroad corporation organized for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad within the territory of New Mexico, acquires an interest in the location which has, in good faith, been surveyed, staked out, and adopted, sufficient to authorize it to maintain an action of trespass. Arizona & C. R. Co. v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 13 N. M. 345, 84 Pac. 1018.

But a deed of special warranty from a person who does not appear to have had any title in himself, in absence of proof of an actual possession thereunder, will not authorize the grantee therein to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Dugan v. Ferguson, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 342, 1 S. W. 539.

And certified transcripts of recorded deeds, one of which purports to convey a "portion" of the land described in the complaint but which fails to describe any particular portion, and another of which conveys a "further portion," and a third the "remaining portion," in absence of proof showing title in the grantors, or that the grantees under such deeds were in actual possession of the locus in quo, are insufficient proof of title to authorize the grantees to maintain an action of trespass. Odd Fellows' Sav. Bank v. Turman (Cal.) 30 Pac. 966.

Likewise, a deed of release and quitclaim from one who claimed to have purchased the locus in quo at a sale by a collector of taxes, in absence of proof of actual or constructive possession thereunder, is insufficient to enable the grantee to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit for breaking and entering a certain lot and carrying away trees. Marr v. Boothby, 19 Me. 150.

And in Savage v. Holyoke, 50 Me. 345, it was held that evidence of a quitclaim deed from one who never had possession or title to the locus in quo and which was not recorded until after the commission of the alleged acts of trespass, without proof of any possession by the plaintiff under the same, is insufficient to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit.

common sold its undivided interest to another, who died before obtaining the deed; thereafter, the tenant, cotenant, and administrator of the purchaser agreed upon a partition of the land. The tenant shortly thereafter deeded its undivided interest to the heirs of the purchaser, and the cotenant deeded to the administrator the portion of the land which had been set apart for him. It also appeared that the administrator was one of the heirs of such purchaser and had gone into possession. In an action of trespass for cutting and carrying away trees, the court held that the title of the administrator was good as against a stranger committing such acts, and that he was entitled to maintain the action.

One who had entered upon public lands and had obtained a certificate of entry is held to be the owner of such an estate therein as will enable him to maintain an action of trespass. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clark, 41 C. C. A. 597, 101 Fed. 678.

A United States Land Office certificate showing an entry upon or purchase of government lands has been held to be competent evidence of title in the one to whom it was issued to authorize him to maintain an action for injury to the turpentine trees on such land. The Mississippi Code, § 1959, provides that such certificate "shall vest the full legal title to such land in the person to whom such certificate is granted; his heirs, or assigns, so far as to enable the holder thereof to maintain an action thereon, and the same shall be received in evidence as such, saving the paramount rights of other persons." Johnson v. Davis, 91 Miss. 708, 45 So. 979.

A report of government commissioners appointed to adjust claims of citizens to lands in the territory of Michigan, which report had been confirmed by an act of Congress, has been held to be equivalent to a grant, and therefore sufficient to authorize him in whose favor the report was rendered to maintain an action of trespass against persons who broke into and entered the land occupied by him for fishing purposes. Solomon v. Grosbeck, 65 Mich. 540, 36 N. W. 163.

One who obtained a special warrant of survey and procured a certificate of survey to be made and returned upon a tract of land which included a parcel of vacant land inclosed by a fence and held by another, and paid the composition money upon the certificate for the whole tract, and who subsequently obtained a patent of the land, may lawfully maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against the one who held such parcel for a time, but which was abandoned before the patent was issued, for his act in carrying away a fence. Chapline v. Harvey, 3 Harr. & McH. 396.

And it was held in Gilbert v. McDonald, 94 Minn. 289, 110 Am. St. Rep. 368, 102 N. W. 712, that a patent to government lands will authorize the patentee to maintain an action of trespass for cutting and removing timber, committed after the date of application for the patent but before confirmation thereof.

A statute granting to the owners of parcels of land along a certain river, and their heirs and assigns, the right to erect and maintain wharves extending to the channel of the river, gave the grantees a possessory title to the soil sufficient to enable them to maintain an action of trespass for entering upon the property and filling up a dock. Hamlin v. Pairpoint Mfg. Co. 141 Mass. 51, 6 N. E. 531.

A homestead entryman in actual possession of vacant government land may maintain an action of trespass against one who entered upon the land and took away a crop. Matthews v. O'Brien, 84 Minn. 505, 88 N. W. 12.

An entryman under the homestead laws of the United States, in actual possession and cultivation of the land, may maintain an action of trespass although final proof has not yet been made. Wendel v. Spokane County, 27 Wash. 121, 91 Am. St. Rep. 825, 67 Pac. 576.

A receipt from a receiver of the United States land office for the fees and commissions paid by an applicant for a homestead under the provisions of the homestead act of Congress, was held in Gaither v. Lawson, 31 Ark. 279, to be sufficient to authorize the holder in possession to maintain an action of trespass. A similar decision was rendered in Pierce v. France, 2 Wash. 81, 26 Pac. 192, 807.

On the theory that one in actual possession of the locus in quo, although without title thereto, may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, the following authorities sustain the right of a tenant in possession to maintain the action: Haligan v. Chicago & R. I. R. Co. 15 Ill. 558; Walden v. Conn. 84 Ky. 312, 4 Am. St. Rep. 204, 1 S. W. 537; Rowland v. Rawland, 8 Ohio, 40; State v. Burns, 123 Ind. 427, 24 N. E. 154; Herr v. Slough, 2 Browne (Pa.) 111; Davis v. Clancy, 3 M'Cord L. 422; Roussin v. Benton, 6 Mo. 592; Lindenbower v. Bentley, 86 Mo. 515; Smith v. Fortiscue, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 65; Wentworth v. Portsmouth & D. R. Co. 55 N. H. 540.

A lessee in possession was held in Walker v. Wilson, 8 Bosw. 586, to be entitled to maintain an action of trespass for an injury to his possession by a debtor who entered the former's premises with the malicious intent of provoking a quarrel with the lessee's clerk in case a small debt should not be paid.

A hunting club in possession of a hunting preserve as tenant may maintain an action of trespass for breaking and entering the close, without showing more than a prima facie ownership of the land in the lessor. Kellogg v. King, 114 Cal. 378, 55 Am. St. Rep. 74 46 Pac. 166. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A tenant from year to year holding under a lease from the remainderman, to which the life tenant has given his consent, has sufficient title to maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against a gas company for destruction of a potato crop. Salimonia Min. & Gas Co. v. Wagner, 2 Ind. App. 81, 28 N. E. 158.

One in possession of glebe land under a lease which is void under the act of 13 Eliz. chap. 20, for nonresidence of the rector of the parish, was permitted in Graham v. Peat, 1 East, 244, to maintain an action of trespass upon his possession by a wrongdoer. "Any possession," said the court, "is a legal possession against a wrongdoer." A similar statement occurs in Harker v. Birkbeck, 3 Burr. 1563, and in Chambers v. Donaldson, 11 East, 65.

Possession sufficient to sustain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit was shown in Harper v. Charlesworth, 4 Barn. & C. 574, in which it appeared that the plaintiff paid a nominal rent to the King for the use of a certain woodland, the wood thereon being reserved to the Crown, and that he exercised the privilege of shooting on the land and of removing the grass therefrom.

The possession of a tenant during the pendency of an appeal from a judgment rendered against him in an action of forcible detainer was held in Tobin v. French, 93 Ill. App. 18, to be sufficient to authorize him to maintain an action of trespass for the disturbance of his peaceable occupancy of the demised premises.

A tenant in possession may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against another for forcibly entering upon land and tearing down buildings thereon. Uttendorffer v. Saegers, 50 Cal. 496.

So, a tenant in possession may maintain an action of trespass for acts of another in breaking down the fences. Foster v. Elliott, 33 Iowa, 216.

A life tenant may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit for entering and removing standing timber from the property. C. W. Zimmerman Mfg. Co. v. Daffin, 149 Ala. 380, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 663, 123 Am. St. Rep. 58, 42 So. 858; Perry v. Jefferies, 61 S. C. 292, 39 S. E. 515.

Tenancy by the courtesy was held in Clark v. Weeton, 1 Root, 299, to entitle the occupant to maintain an action of trespass.

The lessee of a strip of land bordering on a stream, leased for the sole purpose of enabling the lessee to fish in the stream without asking permission to go upon the land, may maintain an action for trespass in entering upon the strip of land. Beach v. Morgan, 67 N. H. 529, 68 Am. St. Rep. 692, 41 Atl. 349.

In Salimonia Min. & Gas Co. v. Wagner, supra, it appeared that the plaintiff had leased a tract of land from the remaindermen, with the consent of the life tenant, and that the defendant had purchased the land in question subject to the lease of the plaintiff. In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit the court held that the plaintiff had sufficient title to sustain the action.

In Albin v. Lord, 39 N. H. 196, the evidence showed that the farm in question was owned by the wife in her own right, and that she lived thereon with her husband and family; the husband managed and controlled it, taking the crops, rents, and profits of the land, and disposed of the wood, timber, and other products as though he were the absolute owner. In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, the court held that the husband was presumed to have the rightful and beneficial possession of the farm as tenant of the wife under some satisfactory arrangement with her, and therefore entitled to maintain the action.

An oral agreement by which landowners gave another the exclusive right to enter on the land and remove ores therefrom for a certain rent payable in ores gives the lessee an interest in the land which will enable him to maintain an action of trespass. Ganter v. Atkinson, 35 Wis. 48, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 13.

A tenant at will may defend his possession against a mere intruder. Marden v. Jordan, 65 Me. 9; Brown v. Bates, Brayton (Vt.) 230; George v. Fisk, 32 N. H. 32; Bick v. Hill, 27 Mo. App. 554.

Thus, in Covert v. Morrison, 49 Mich. 133, 13 N. W. 390, the court held that a widow whom the heirs at law permitted to continue in possession of the land which her husband had occupied as a homestead may maintain an action of trespass against one intruding thereon.

A tenant holding under a parol lease for the term of a year may, although a tenant at will, maintain an action of trespass against one unlawfully entering upon the premises. Hillhouse v. Jennings, 60 S. C. 392, 38 S. E. 596.

An action for trespass for entering upon land in possession of a tenant at will, treading down the grass, and throwing down a fence erected by the tenant for his own convenience, must be brought by the tenant in possession. Little v. Palister, 3 Me. 6. A similar decision was rendered in Bartlett v. Perkins, 13 Me. 87.

In Catlin v. Hayden, 1 Vt. 375, the court held that one who entered as a tenant at will, since the lease, which was for more than a year, was created by parol, but who, by continuing in possession, became a tenant entitled to six months' notice to quit, may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit.

In Dickinson v. Goodspeed, 8 Cush. 119, the court said that a tenant at will, being entitled under the statute to notice to terminate his estate, is, until the expiration of such notice, entitled to the lawful and exclusive possession of the land, not only as against a stranger, but also against the lessor at will, and therefore may maintain an action of trespass against one who entered and carried off a pump.

action where the property is in possession of tenant at will, see supra.

—one in adverse possession.

One in adverse possession of land under claim of title may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against another having no superior right of possession. Moore v. Cummings (S. C.) 69 S. E. 154; Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Higgins, 69 Ill. App. 412; Bowley v. Walker, 8 Allen, 21; Percival v. Chase, 182 Mass. 371, 65 N. E. 800; Hart v. Doyle, 128 Mich. 257, 87 N. W. 219; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jones, 110 Ill. App. 626; Meacham v. Fay, 6 Vt. 208; Pennington v. Lewis, 4 Penn. (Del.) 447, 56 Atl. 378; Pollock v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. 103 Ky. 84, 44 S. W. 359; Shields v. Heard, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 992, 53 S. W. 820; Farmer v. Lyons, 87 Ky. 421, 9 S. W. 248; Magowan v. Branham, 95 Ky. 581, 26 S. W. 803; Woodward v. Robinson, 67 Me. 565; Dolloff v. Hardy, 26 Me. 545; Knowles v. Dow, 20 N. H. 135; McColman v. Wilkes, 3 Strobb. L. 465, 51 Am. Dec. 637.

Possession of land under a claim of ownership being prima facie evidence of title in the occupant, upon proof of such possession and without showing complete title, he may maintain against a wrongdoer an action for a trespass upon the property committed while such possession existed. Tolbert v. Rome, 134 Ga. 136, 67 S. E. 540.

Adverse possession of land for a period of fifteen years before the commission of any acts of trespass will entitle the adverse claimant to a right of action of trespass in entering upon such lands and plowing up the same. Coppage v. Griffith, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 459, 40 S. W. 908.

In North Carolina it is held that one in exclusive possession of a tract of land under color of title may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit against one wrongfully cutting timber, even before the maturity of the title by the expiration of the statutory period. Simmons v. Defiance Box Co. (N. C.) 69 S. E. 146.

One claiming title to land by adverse possession for a continuous term of fifteen years is held to be an "owner" within the meaning of Ky. Stat. § 2361, and entitled to maintain an action for trespass upon the land. Scroggins v. Nave, 133 Ky. 793, 119 S. W. 158.

So, one who has been in continuous adverse possession of land for a period of between twenty-five and thirty years may maintain an action of trespass against another who entered thereon and removed trees therefrom. Taylor v. Burt & B. Lumber Co. 33 Ky. L. Rep. 191, 109 S. W. 348.

But one who entered upon a tract of land which he claimed, but which is also occupied by others also claiming the same as their own, can acquire no title which will enable him to maintain an action of trespass in cutting and removing trees. Phillips v. Beattyville Mineral & Timber Co. 28 Ky. L. Rep. 12, 88 S. W. 1058.

An adverse claimant to land cannot maintain an action of trespass where continuity of possession is absent. Gordner v. Blades Lumber Co. 144 N. C. 110, 56 S. E. 695; Macauley v. Kamp, 60 Ill. App. 31. Thus, one who used a piece of land to pasture stock in the summer and for hogs in the fall and winter when there was feed for them, during the statutory period, was held in Ashcraft v. Courtney (Ky.) 121 S. W. 625, not to have maintained a continuous possession required to give title by adverse possession, and therefore could not maintain an action of trespass for cutting timber on the land.

One in actual possession of a part of a tract of land under a duly recorded deed covering the entire tract, which is insufficient to pass title and is good only as color of title, has not until after the expiration of the statutory period of seven years such possession of the residue of the tract as will authorize him to maintain an action of trespass against a person who wrongfully entered thereon and cut a quantity of growing timber. Ault v. Meager, 112 Ga. 148, 37 S. E. 185.

The occupation of a portion of a public highway for a long period of time will not give the occupant any rights which will enable him to maintain trespass against the highway commissioners for their act in removing obstructions he has constructed therein. Driggs v. Phillips, 103 N. Y. 77, 8 N. E. 514.

But in Restetsky v. Delmar Ave. & C. R. Co. 106 Mo. App. 382, 84 S. W. 665, it was held that one who had been in adverse possession of a parcel of land adjoining a street, under color and claim of title for the statutory period, may maintain an action against a wrongdoer in excavating in the street, where the title to the parcel claimed extends to the center of the street.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

CARL CARLSON, Resp.,

v.

WEYERHAEUSER TIMBER COMPANY,
Appt.

(50 Wash. 490, 97 Pac. 501.)

Master — unsafe device — human assistance.

1. The mere fact that a device for diverting sawed lumber from the live rolls, which bear it away from the saw to be ready for another machine, has become out of repair so that it may fail to operate, does not render the master liable for injury to the operator of the latter machine by the sticking of a plank and its being hit by a following one, if the master has stationed men in proper places to aid the device in handling the lumber and to prevent the planks from interfering with each other, the performance of whose duties would have prevented the accident.

Same — servant's negligence.

2. The mere fact that a device furnished by a master may be insufficient of itself to perform a certain service does not render him liable to a servant injured by its failure to do so, if he furnishes another servant to assist the device, and such assistance makes the device perfectly safe, so that the injury is caused by the failure of the fellow servant to perform his duty.

(October 3, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Snohomish County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cooley & Horan, for appellant:

Evidence which merely tends to show that the particular accident which caused the injury might not have happened if a particular precaution had been taken does not render the employer liable.

Northern C. R. Co. v. Husson, 101 Pa. 1, 47 Am. Rep. 690; Glover v. Meinrath, 133 Mo. 292, 34 S. W. 72; Friel v. Citizens' R.

Note. — Liability of master where machine which fails to perform the service for which it was designed is supplemented by the work of an employee.

The foregoing case suggests some extremely interesting questions. If a mechanical device attached to a machine for the performance of a part of the master's work, as it progresses becomes defective and fails to do the work which it was designed to accomplish, may the master supplement the machine by furnishing a human agency to accomplish the desired result? And if the master may so supplement the machine, is the employee so used a fellow servant of the employee who is operating the machine, so as to free the master from liability to the latter for injuries due to the former's negligence?

There are possibly other cases in which the facts would present similar questions, as, for example, where some part of the machine breaks and an employee is set at work temporarily perhaps to do the work formerly accomplished by the machine, and through his negligence another servant is injured. But it would appear that the decisions in such cases, if there are any, turn upon some other of the various questions of the law of master and servant, and consequently would not be authority upon the questions stated above.

And it is to be noted that these ques-

Co. 81 Iowa, 246, 47 N. W. 66; Wilder v. Stanley, 65 Vt. 145, 20 L.R.A. 479, 26 Atl. 189.

Rudkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant owns and operates a saw-mill at the city of Everett in this state, in which the plaintiff was employed as edgerman at the time of receiving the injuries complained of in this action. A system of live rolls was installed and maintained in the mill for the purpose of conveying the sawed material from the main saw to the opposite end of the mill. The edger at which the plaintiff was employed was situated about 80 or 100 feet back from the main saw, and about 10 feet to the right of the live rolls. Lumber was diverted from the live rolls to the edger deck in the following manner: An appliance known as a "bumper," raised by means of a lever, would arrest the forward movement of the lumber along the live rolls. The weight of the lumber pressing down on a sheet-iron cover would cause a system of live skids to rise automatically, and live chains operating over the skids through grooves would then convey the lumber from the live rolls to the edger deck. While the plaintiff was employed about the edger on the morning of August 17, 1905, a plank 2 inches thick, 12 inches wide, and about 40 feet long, was sent down over the live rolls by the off-bearer. The bumper was raised for the purpose of diverting the plank from the live rolls to the edger deck. The end of the plank next to the edgerman was carried over by the live skids, but the opposite end caught or dragged on the covering between the live rolls. While the plank was in this position, a heavy piece of timber, sent down by the off-bearer, struck it, and drove it against the plaintiff's leg, causing tions are not really determined in CARLSON v. WEYERHAEUSER TIMBER CO., or rather the facts as determined in that case render it unnecessary for the court to pass squarely upon the questions suggested as purely questions of law. In the first place, it is held that the master was under no obligation to furnish the appliance complained of, but might have furnished a machine without it, and have employed manual labor to accomplish the same result, so that negligence could not be predicated of the mere failure to furnish a sufficient appliance. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And, again, the court finds that the human agency supplied by the master was reasonably safe and sufficient to perform the work, so that negligence could not be predicated of the master's failure to furnish reasonably safe appliances or agencies. In short, under the circumstances, no ground is left upon which to base any negligence at all on the part of the master, so that the questions suggested, although before the court, were in reality eliminated by the court's rulings as to the facts.

W. M. G.

the injuries here complained of. The following is the allegation of negligence set forth in the complaint: "That at the time aforesaid the defendant operated, as a part of its said mill, live rollers to carry the lumber sawed away from the head saw in said mill; that in connection with said live rollers the defendant operated skids, on which said skids were live chains; that said skids and live chains were at said time, and for a long time prior thereto, designed and used to divert from the live rollers and carry to the edger deck all lumber to be run through said edger machine, and on said date the defendant negligently permitted said skids, live chains, and other machinery to be and remain in a defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition, in that said skids were too short and were situated too low with reference to said live rollers and said edger deck and the cover hereinafter mentioned, and were so worn and loose at the joints that, when said skids were operated for the purpose of diverting the lumber from said live rollers to said edger deck, as aforesaid, said skids failed to cause the lumber so to be diverted to leave the said live rollers and the cover of the gearing adjoining said live rollers and situated between the said live rollers and the said edger deck, but permitted the lumber, so to be diverted as aforesaid, to lie and remain in dangerous proximity to said live rollers." The answer denied the negligence charged in the complaint, and alleged contributory negligence, negligence of a fellow servant, and assumption of risk. The plaintiff had judgment below and the defendant appeals.

Error in denying a motion for nonsuit and motion for judgment at the close of all the testimony is the principal assignment upon which the appellant relies for a reversal. The testimony shows that the live skids to which we have referred were hinged on a shaft where they connected with the dead skids. Babbitting was placed around the shaft at these points for the purpose of taking the wear occasioned by the turning of the shaft. This babbitting would gradually wear away through the operations of the mill, and as it wore away, the live skids would naturally drop below the dead skids, to the extent of the wear. At the time of the accident complained of there was testimony tending to show that the two center skids (there being four in all) were almost an inch lower than the dead skids with which they were connected, although the testimony on the part of the appellant tended to show that the babbitting was only $\frac{1}{8}$ of an inch thick in the first instance, and that the drop in the skids could not exceed $\frac{1}{2}$ inch. The testimony further tended to show that this condition had existed for about a month prior to the injury to the respondent; that by reason thereof the live skids had failed to convey the lumber to the edger deck as effectually as they had prior to that time; that up to about a month prior to the accident the live skids had never failed to convey lumber from the live rolls to the edger deck, unless the lumber caught on a place of bark, a knot, or some other obstruction, so as to prevent the live skids from taking hold; and that there was no such obstruction under the plank which caused the injury to the respondent. If the bare fact that the live skids were too low, and that this particular accident would not have happened had the skids been properly adjusted, is sufficient to fix liability upon the appellant, we are not prepared to say that the verdict is unsupported by the testimony, but even this is problematic. The appellant contends, however, that the live skids in question were merely a labor-saving device; that an employee was placed in charge of the live rolls, whose duty it was to see that one piece of lumber was not run down upon another; that it had stationed another employee at the slasher saw, about 40 feet back from the edger, provided with a picaroon, whose duty it was to pull the lumber from the live rolls when for any reason the live skids failed to perform their functions; and that these different agencies rendered the working place of the respondent perfectly safe, so long as the off-bearer and slash sawyer performed the duties assigned them. This contention must be sustained. Conceding that the live skids were too low and out of repair, they were not inherently dangerous. The only effect that could result from their condition was that they might fail to convey the lumber from the live rolls. But so long as the appellant had made provision for such a contingency, and had placed a man in charge of the live skids and slasher saw to aid these mechanical devices in removing lumber from the live rolls, it made the working place safe. In Bajus v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 103 N. Y. 312, 57 Am. Rep. 723, 8 N. E. 529, it was contended that the accident was caused through the lessening of the power of a steam engine by a defect in the throttle valve. In answer to this contention the court said: "The defect in the throttle valve, therefore, had no relation whatever to this accident, and the plaintiff's sole reliance for the maintenance of his action must be upon the defective condition of the flues and of the main steam valve, the sole consequence of which was the diminished power of the engine. These defects may have diminished the power of the engine by several horse power, so that the engine, instead of being, for instance, 80-horse power, was only 70. It matters not that this diminished power came from these defects, nor how the engine came to be of only 70-horse power. The responsibility for the defects is no greater than it would have been if the defendant had furnished a new engine of precisely the same power." And so here, if the appellant had supplied a mechanical device to transfer one end of the lumber to the edger deck, and had stationed an employee at the other end to accomplish the same result by manual labor, it could not be said that it failed in any duty it owed to the respondent, provided, the two agencies furnished were sufficient to accomplish the object in view. The mere use of a defective appliance, not in itself dangerous, is not negligence, so long as other safe agencies are employed to supply its deficiencies. Nor was the negligence which caused the injury in this case the joint or combined negligence of the appellant and a fellow servant of the respondent. If the agencies supplied by the appellant for transferring lumber from the live rolls to the edger deck were reasonably safe and sufficient for that purpose, and an accident resulted through the failure of a fellow servant to perform the duty assigned him, the negligence of the fellow servant, and not the defective condition of the skids, was the proximate cause of the injury. Pease v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 61 Wis. 163, 20 N. W. 908; Sullivan v. Wamsutta Mills, 155 Mass. 200, 29 N. E. 516; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Brown, 91 Va. 668, 22 S. E. 496; Williams v. Central R. Co. 43 Iowa, 396; Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 73.

We are therefore of opinion that the working place provided by the appellant was reasonably safe, as a matter of law, and that the respondent was not injured by reason of any negligence charged in the complaint.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the action.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

ALFRED A. FOSNES, Appt.,
v.

DULUTH STREET RAILWAY COMPANY,
Respt.

(140 Wis. 455, 122 N. W. 1054.)

Street railway — leaving moving car — foreigner.

That one injured by attempting to alight from a street car moving at the rate of 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

6 miles an hour was a foreigner, recently arrived in this country, and that he did not understand English, and was inexperienced in street car travel, but had seen other passengers leave moving cars, does not relieve him from the charge of contributory negligence in making the attempt.

(October 26, 1909.)

Note. — Negligence of passenger in getting on or off moving street car.

This note supplements the note appended to Jagger v. People's Street R. Co. 38 L.R.A. 786, where the earlier cases are collected.

Negligence as matter of law.

Some courts seem to regard the attempt on the part of a passenger to board or alight from a moving street car as negligence per se; at least, except in rare cases. Neff v. Harrisburg Traction Co. 192 Pa. 501, 73 Am. St. Rep. 825, 43 Atl. 1020; Hunterson v. Union Traction Co. 205 Pa. 568, 55 Atl. 543; Boulfrois v. United Traction Co. 210 Pa. 263, 105 Am. St. Rep. 809, 59 Atl. 1007, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 938; Quinn v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. 224 Pa. 162, 73 Atl. 319; Richmond Traction Co. v. Williams, 102 Va. 253, 46 S. E. 292; Johnson v. St. Joseph R. Light, Heat & P. Co. 143 Mo. App. 376, 128 S. W. 243.

And though such conduct is not regarded as negligence per se, it may become negligence as a matter of law, because of the conditions under which the attempt is made, and it has been so held under the following circumstances:

— where plaintiff attempted to board an elevated car after the gate was closed and the car had started. Lauterer v. Manhattan R. Co. 63 C. C. A. 38, 128 Fed. 540;

— where plaintiff stepped off backward from a car going 5 or 6 miles per hour. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Glover, 142 Ala. 492, 38 So. 836;

— where a passenger was injured in stepping off a car as it was slowing down for a stop. Cosgrove v. Consolidated R. Co. 80 Conn. 717, 68 Atl. 249;

— where the car was moving rapidly. Chicago City R. Co. v. Sullivan, 76 Ill. App. 505;

— where a defect in the car, claimed to have been the cause of the injury, was dangerous only in view of the conduct of the plaintiff in alighting while it was moving. Werbowsky v. Ft. Wayne & E. R. Co. 86 Mich. 236, 24 Am. St. Rep. 120, 48 N. W. 1097;

— where a passenger attempted to alight after the car had started, though reasonable opportunity to alight had been afforded. Shareman v. St. Louis Transit Co. 103 Mo. App. 515, 78 S. W. 840;

— where the attempt to get off while the car was in rapid motion was voluntary. Van Horn v. St. Louis Transit Co. 198 Mo. 481, 95 S. W. 326;

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Victor Linley, for appellant:

The age, the sex, and the experience of the passenger are all to be taken into consideration in determining whether contributory negligence is to be imputed to one jumping from a moving train or street car.

Supp. 1102, however, where plaintiff boarded a car as it slowed down, but struck a barrier in the street before he had time to enter the car, because of a sudden acceleration of speed, the court held that the question of contributory negligence was for the jury.

Question for jury.

The overwhelming weight of authority, however, is to the effect that it is not negligence per se to board or alight from a street car while it is in motion, in the absence of circumstances making the attempt so obviously dangerous that it would not be made by a person of ordinary prudence, under the circumstances, or, as stated in Newport News & O. P. R. & Electric Co. v. McCormick, 106 Va. 517, 56 S. E. 281, "the criterion being that if, under all the circumstances, an ordinarily prudent person would have been warranted in attempting to alight from a moving car, negligence ought not to be imputed to a passenger who pursues that course." Puget Sound Electric R. Co. v. Felt, 181 Fed. 938; Brown v. Washington & G. R. Co. 11 App. D. C. 37; Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Lee, 153 Ala. 79, 45 So. 292; *Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. of action was stated therein. The plaintiff did not ask leave to amend, and judgment was granted dismissing the complaint. No error is assigned for failure to grant leave to amend.

It appeared by the complaint that the plaintiff, a passenger upon a street railway car, requested the conductor to let him off at a designated street, and the conductor knew the wish of the passenger to get off at that street, but carelessly, negligently, and wantonly failed and neglected to stop the car at that street, without explanation to the passenger, and the passenger then attempted to get off the car at this street while the car was moving at the rate of 6 miles an hour, and in so doing was accidentally thrown to the ground and injured. This presents a case of negligence on the part of the defendant and contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Six miles per hour must be considered a considerable speed, and, indeed, a high rate of speed, for the purpose of alighting from a moving street car. The ordinary inference of contributory negligence from such attempt, recognized in Champane v. La Crosse City R. Co. 121 Wis. 554, 99 N. W. 334, and Hardy v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 89 Wis. 183, 61 N. W. 771, is apparently sought to be overcome by the pleader by the following additional averments in the complaint: The passenger, recently arrived in the United States from Norway, did not speak the English language, was inexperienced in street railway travel, and had seen other passengers at other previous times alight from the cars of the defendant while such cars were in motion at street crossings, and concluded that he was required to get off the car while it

In accordance with this rule, the question of plaintiff's negligence was submitted to the jury under the following circumstances:

—where the car was moving slowly, even though the party stepped in an opposite direction from that in which it was going. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Dickerson, supra; —where the car was slowing up near a stop, and the passenger was encumbered with bundles. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Girod, supra; —where acts of defendant's employees led a passenger to believe that the car had stopped, though it was in fact moving slowly when she stepped off. Elwood v. Connecticut R. & Light Co. 77 Conn. 145, 58 Atl. 751, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 779;

—where plaintiff was encumbered with bundles and the car was going 3 miles per hour. Hammond, W. & E. C. Electric R. Co. v. Antonia, 41 Ind. App. 335, 83 N. E. 766;

—where the passenger lost his footing in boarding the car because of its starting suddenly, and held on and ran alongside it was in motion, and supposed it was perfectly safe for him to get off the car, although it was moving at the rate of 6 miles an hour. Assuming, in support of the complaint, that the conductor understood the language of plaintiff, that plaintiff knew he was approaching his intended place of alighting, that this was a proper and useful place at which to stop the car, and that the "other previous times" when he had seen passengers alighting while the cars were in motion were sufficiently recent and sufficiently numerous to induce him to believe this was the American way, but not sufficiently numerous to remove his inexperience in street railway travel, still we must assume that there was no urgency beyond the risk of his being carried a square or thereabouts past his destination. Notwithstanding he did not possess the felicity of having lived long in this country, or of speaking the English language, he must be considered a man of ordinary intelligence. Rahles v. J. Thompson & Sons Mfg. Co. 137 Wis. 506, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 296, 118 N. W. 350, 119 N. W. 289; Johanson v. Webster Mfg. Co. 139 Wis. 181, 120 N. W. 832. While it cannot be said as matter of law that, in all cases, alighting from a moving street car constitutes contributory negligence, yet this may justly be said in a case where the party alighting is a man of full age and ordinary intelligence, laboring under no fright or excitement, confronted with no exigency, and the car is, to his knowledge, moving at the rate of 6 miles an hour. It follows that the judgment of the superior court should be affirmed.

The judgment of the Superior Court is affirmed.

Distinction between street and steam railways.

While the rule above set forth is the one generally applied to steam railroads (see Hoylman v. Kanawha & M. R. Co. 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 741 and note), some cases recognize a distinction between railroad trains and street cars in this respect. Thus, in Lobsenz v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 72 App. Div. 181, 76 N. Y. Supp. 411, where the lower court instructed the jury that the "usual invitation to us to get aboard of a public conveyance is that it stops, and in all ordinary cases to get aboard of a moving public vehicle is imprudent," the word "imprudent" was construed by the appellate court to be used as a synonym for negligent, and the instruction held to be erroneous, as it applied a proposition applicable in case of steam roads, but not in case of street railways.

And in Conner v. Citizens' Street R. Co. supra, and Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Hockett, 159 Ind. 677, 66 N. E. 39, the court said that the rules as to steam cars were not applicable in all their rigor to street railways operated by horse power.

Failure or insufficiency of stop.

Attempting to board or alight from a moving car on its failure to make a stop for a passenger was held to be negligence precluding recovery in the following cases:

—West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Torpe, 187 Ill. 610, 58 N. E. 607, where the issue was as to whether the car was moving slowly or at full speed, the court holding that it was error to admit evidence that the defendant was accustomed to stop or slow down its cars at the place of the accident, for the purpose of taking on passengers;

—South Chicago Street R. Co. v. Dufresne, 200 Ill. 456, 65 N. E. 1075, affirming 102 Ill. App. 493, where the car failed to stop on signal by plaintiff, indicating his desire to board; —McDonald v. City Electric R. Co. 137 Mich. 392, 100 N. W. 592, in which the court held that failure to stop does not justify a passenger in jumping;

—Hogan v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 71 App. Div. 614, 75 N. Y. Supp. 845, where a strong preponderance of the evidence showed that the plaintiff attempted to alight while the car was moving, on its failure to stop at her street;

—Grabenstein v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 84 N. Y. Supp. 261, where, by a fair preponderance of the evidence, it appeared that plaintiff attempted to alight without signal or notice to the conductor;

—Howard v. Forty-second Street, M. & St. N. A. R. Co. 125 App. Div. 776, 110 N. Y. Supp. 125, where a car slowed down, but did not stop at a crossing where plaintiff signaled it, and he ran after it and caught hold and was running along in an effort to get on, and was injured by a sudden acceleration of speed; —and Foran v. Union Traction Co. 22 Pa. Super. Ct. 10, where a passenger attempted to step off a car on being unable to attract the conductor's attention when it reached her street.

However, in Fuller v. Denison & S. R. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Co. 32 Tex. Civ. App. 399, 74 S. W. 940, judgment for defendant was reversed where the evidence showed that plaintiff signaled for a stop, but the motorman, who had sole charge of the car, did not stop, and because of former harsh treatment of plaintiff, a boy, by the motorman, he had reason to apprehend he would be carried a considerable distance past his destination unless he got off while the car was moving.

In Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Lawn, 30 Ind. App. 515, 66 N. E. 508, the court said that if plaintiff was injured in an attempt to alight after an insufficient stop, it was for the jury to say if she exercised reasonable care, in continuing her attempt to alight.

In Shanahan v. St. Louis Transit Co. 109 Mo. App. 228, 83 S. W. 783, where plaintiff waited for a woman and child to board, and then attempted to get on after the car started, it was held that the question of his contributory negligence was for the jury.

In Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. James, 121 Ala. 120, 25 So. 847, it was held that plaintiff would not be negligent as matter of law if, when carried past his destination, he attempted to alight on the car slowing down as if in invitation for him to do so, if a man of ordinary care would have acted as he did.

In Lucas v. Marquette City & P. I. R. Co. 136 Mich. 142, 98 N. W. 980, where plaintiff claimed the car started while he was on the step, in the act of alighting, the fact that he fell 75 feet from the stopping place was held not to be conclusive that he jumped from the car while it was in motion.

In San Antonio Traction Co. v. Warren (Tex. Civ. App.) 85 S. W. 26, recovery was permitted where the evidence showed that the car started suddenly when plaintiff was in the act of boarding it, after it had nearly stopped.

In Kruger v. Omaha & C. B. Street R. Co. 80 Neb. 490, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 101, 127 Am. St. Rep. 780, 114 N. W. 571, where a girl under fourteen years of age, unaccustomed to riding on street cars, became frightened on being negligently carried past her destination, and the conductor, by due care and diligence, could have known she was about to leave the car, and could have prevented her from doing so, it was held that the company would be liable for injuries received by her in making the attempt.

And in Schmidt v. North Jersey Street R. Co. (N. J. L.) 58 Atl. 72, where, after slowing down in response to plaintiff's signal, the car started suddenly, the court held plaintiff not guilty of contributory negligence, and said: "Although a person attempting to board a moving car takes the risk of injury resulting from its ordinary motion, he does not assume the risk of injury from sudden and negligent increase of the motion of the car."

Speed of car.

Whether or not it is negligence to attempt to get on or off a car while it is in motion will depend largely upon the speed of the car. Cody v. Duluth Street R. Co. 94 Minn. 74, 102 N. W. 201, reversing 94 Minn. 77, 102 N. W. 397.

And the speed of the car was held not to be so great as to make the attempt contributory negligence as matter of law, under the following circumstances:

—where the car was slowed down for a crossing to about 3 miles per hour, at a place where plaintiff had notified the conductor to stop. Watkins v. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. 120 Ala. 152, 43 L. R. A. 297, 24 So. 392;

—where the car was moving at from 2 to 5 miles per hour, and deceased was encumbered with bundles. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Brannon, 132 Ala. 431, 31 So. 523;

—where the car was moving 3 miles per hour, the court considering this to be "moving slowly." Dawson v. St. Louis Transit Co. 102 Mo. App. 277, 76 S. W. 689;

—where a man thirty-eight years of age, and ordinarily active, attempted to board a car moving 4 or 5 miles per hour, on a curve. Eikenberry v. St. Louis Transit Co. 103 Mo. App. 442, 80 S. W. 360;

—where a car was moving slower than a man could walk. Kimber v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 69 App. Div. 353, 74 N. Y. Supp. 966; —where a car was moving as fast as a man could go at a fast walk. Spencer v. St. Louis Transit Co. 111 Mo. App. 653, 86 S. W. 593;

—where there was some evidence that the car was running quite slowly, not more than 6 miles per hour. Dallas Rapid Transit Co. v. Payne, 98 Tex. 211, 82 S. W. 649, reversing (Tex. Civ. App.) 78 S. W. 1085.

In Ohio v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 125 Mo. App. 710, 103 S. W. 142, the court said that moving slowly is a relative term, and that what amounts to such in case of a street car is a question for the jury.

And in Coleman v. St. Louis Transit Co. 117 Mo. App. 123, 93 S. W. 920, where there was a conflict in the evidence as to whether the car started suddenly after slowing to about 3 miles per hour, in response to the plaintiff's signal, or whether plaintiff attempted to board while the car was going 10 or 12 miles per hour, the court held that it was properly submitted to the jury.

However, in Jagger v. People's Street R. Co. 180 Pa. 436, 38 L.R.A. 786, 36 Atl. 867, it was held to be contributory negligence for a passenger to attempt to alight while a car was moving 4 or 5 miles per hour, between stops, though he was in the habit of getting off there, and those in charge of the car customarily slowed down for him on signal, the court saying that to justify a person in alighting from a moving car "the motion must be so inconsiderable that a person of reasonable prudence, exercising ordinary care, would not hesitate about the safety of the attempt to alight."

held to be guilty of contributory negligence in alighting from a car moving at from 4 to 6 miles per hour, at night, when he was encumbered with bundles.

And in Quinn v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. 224 Pa. 162, 73 Atl. 319, it was held to be negligence per se to alight from a car which was going faster than a man could walk.

To avoid impending danger.

That it does not constitute negligence per se to jump from a car while it is moving, to avoid real or reasonably apparent danger, is held in the following cases:

—Right v. Metropolitan R. Co. 21 App. D. C. 494 and Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Newmiller, 215 Ill. 383, 74 N. E. 410, affirming 116 Ill. App. 625, where, following an explosion of a fuse, there was a stampede, and a passenger was injured in jumping or being pushed from the car;

—Louisville & S. I. Traction Co. v. Worrell, 44 Ind. App. 480, 86 N. E. 78, and Lord v. Manchester Street R. Co. 74 N. H. 295, 67 Atl. 639, where a passenger jumped from a moving car under the impulse of fear, caused by an explosion of the controller; —Washington & G. R. Co. v. Hickey, 5 App. D. C. 436, affirmed in 166 U. S. 521, 41 L. ed. 1101, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 661, where plaintiff jumped off a car during the commotion resulting from an impending collision;

—Selma Street & Suburban R. Co. v. Owen, 132 Ala. 420, 31 So. 598, where there was an apparent, though not actual, danger of collision with a locomotive;

—Terre Haute Traction & Light Co. v. Payne (Ind. App.) 89 N. E. 413, in which it was held that when a passenger is put in imminent jeopardy by servants of the railroad company, and is injured in attempting to escape, he is not necessarily precluded from recovery because he misjudged the danger, and whether he acts rashly in leaping from the car is for the jury to determine;

—Eaton v. Wilmington City R. Co. (Del.) 75 Atl. 369, holding that plaintiff could recover for injury in jumping from a car running rapidly down grade, beyond control of the motorman, if his act was that of a person of ordinary prudence and discretion under similar circumstances;

—Georgia R. & Electric Co. v. Gilleland, 133 Ga. 621, 66 S. E. 944, though plaintiff may have misjudged the danger; —Howell v. Lansing City Electric R. Co. 136 Mich. 432, 99 N. W. 406, where danger of a collision was imminent;

—McManus v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 116 Mo. App. 110, 92 S. W. 176, where a gripman failed to stop as soon as he might have done on approaching a wreck, which was partly concealed by fog, though it was in fact on another track, and did not actually endanger the car;

—Williamson v. St. Louis Transit Co. 202 Mo. 345, 100 S. W. 1072, where plaintiff, a woman, was riding on the front platform of a crowded car, and jumped when the controller exploded, the motorman having jumped first, the court saying: "It is just as culpable to negligently frighten a passenger and thereby cause him to jump from the car and injure himself as it is to injure him directly; and this is true although no injury would have resulted had no attempt to escape been made;"

—Poulsen v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 30 App. Div. 246, 51 N. Y. Supp. 933, where plaintiff leaped when an explosion occurred in the controller, and flames leaped out and enveloped the motorman, though others who remained on the car were uninjured;

—Robson v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 80 App. Div. 301, 80 N. Y. Supp. 693, where plaintiff jumped under fear of collision with an approaching railroad train, though no collision in fact occurred;

—Paine v. Geneva, W. S. F. & C. L. Traction Co. 115 App. Div. 729, 101 N. Y. Supp. 204, where a boy twelve years of age jumped upon the explosion and flaming of the controller, though passengers remaining on the car were uninjured;

—Willis v. Second Ave. Traction Co. 189 Pa. 430, 42 Atl. 1, when the car started forward, and was about to collide with a passing train;

—Palmer v. Warren Street R. Co. 206 Pa. 574, 63 L.R.A. 507, 56 Atl. 49, where the passenger acted under the impulse of a well-grounded fear of collision with a car which was approaching on the same track;

—Lehner v. Pittsburg R. Co. 223 Pa. 203, 132 Am. St. Rep. 729, 78 Atl. 525, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 83, where the car started backward down a grade, and got beyond control of the crew;

—Wade v. Columbia Electric Street R. Light & P. Co. 51 S. C. 296, 64 Am. St. Rep. 676, 29 S. E. 233, where plaintiff jumped from a moving car under apprehension of danger from a collision, even though the conductor warned him not to jump, and that there was no danger, if a person of ordinary and reasonable sense and prudence would have jumped notwithstanding such warning;

—Wanzer v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. 108 Wis. 319, 84 N. W. 423, where an explosion occurred from the sudden reversing of the current, and at the same time contact of the car with a wagon caused the glass of the car to break, though those remaining on the car were uninjured.

However, in Chretien v. New Orleans R. Co. 113 La. 761, 104 Am. St. Rep. 519, 37 So. 716, where there was a fall of a wire, and an explosion, and none on the car were injured or frightened but deceased, who jumped off while the car was going at high speed, a verdict for defendant was sustained, the court holding that, to permit recovery, deceased must have acted under a reasonable apprehension of injury, and in determining if he did so it was proper to consider the conduct of the other passengers and the speed of the car, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Against warning.

If a passenger persists in his attempt to board or alight from a moving car after being warned by the conductor not to do so, he will be precluded from recovery, either because of his contributory negligence, or want of negligence on the part of the carrier. Koues v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 86 App. Div. 611, 83 N. Y. Supp. 380; Graefe v. St. Louis Transit Co. 224 Mo. 232, 123 S. W. 835; Gallagher v. West End Street R. Co. 156 Mass. 157, 30 N. E. 480; Campbell v. Los Angeles R. Co. 135 Cal. 137, 67 Pac. 50.

But if he acts against the warning of the conductor under fear of impending danger, he may not be guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law. See Wade v. Columbia Electric Street R. Light & P. Co. supra.

In Little Rock Traction & Electric Co. v. Kimbro, 75 Ark. 211, 87 S. W. 121, 644, it was held that the conductor was not bound to take steps to prevent an injury to a passenger whom he saw about to alight from a moving car, if he had no reason to believe injury would result.

But in McHugh v. St. Louis Transit Co. 190 Mo. 85, 88 S. W. 853, an instruction requiring the conductor to exercise reasonable care to prevent plaintiff, a woman, from alighting from a moving car, was held not to be erroneous, as this was his duty under the common law as well as under a local ordinance.

Conflict as to whether car was moving or stationary.

Frequently the evidence is conflicting as to whether plaintiff attempted to board or alight from a stationary car, and was injured because of its being started prematurely, or whether the car was in motion when the attempt was made; and ordinarily this question, with that of plaintiff's contributory negligence, will be left for the jury to determine. Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Cabbage, 58 Fla. 287, 51 So. 139; Farrell v. Citizens' Light & R. Co. 137 Iowa, 309, 114 N. W. 1063; Paducah Street R. Co. v. Walsh, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 532, 58 S. W. 431; Lexington R. Co. v. Herring, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 794, 96 S. W. 558, rehearing denied in 30 Ky. L. Rep. 269, 97 S. W. 1127; South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Core, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 836, 96 S. W. 562; Scamell v. St. Louis Transit Co. 103 Mo. App. 504, 77 S. W. 1021; Barnett v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 138 Mo. App. 192, 120 S. W. 730; Pohle v. Second Ave. R. Co. 161 N. Y. 666, 57 N. E. 1122, affirming without opinion 13 App. Div. 393, 42 N. Y. Supp. 1092; Willis v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 63 App. Div. 333, 71 N. Y. Supp. 554; Slean v. Schuylkill Valley Traction Co. 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 558; Moran v. Versailles Traction Co. 188 Pa. 557, 41 Atl. 652; Thompson v. Norfolk & P. Traction Co. 109 Va. 733, 64 S. E. 953; Morien v. Norfolk & A. Terminal Co. 102 Va. 622, 46 S. E. 907; Champagne v. La Crosse City R. Co. 121 Wis. 554, 99 N. W. 334.

But in the following cases, where it was shown by a strong preponderance of the evidence that the car was in motion when the attempt to board or alight was made, it was held that the judgment should be for defendant; Joyce v. Los Angeles R. Co. 147 Cal. 274, 82 Pac. 204; Wyatt v. Pacific Electric R. Co. 156 Cal. 170, 103 Pac. 892; Wolf v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 82 App. Div. 629, 81 N. Y. Supp. 257; Maloney v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 95 App. Div. 393, 88 N. Y. Supp. 638; Koester v. Interurban Street R. Co. 90 N. Y. Supp. 375; Adams v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 99 App. Div. 621, 90 N. Y. Supp. 937; Hanau v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 103 App. Div. 402, 92 N. Y. Supp. 1086.

In this connection there is an important line of cases holding that where plaintiff alleges as the sole act of negligence on the part of the carrier that the car was started suddenly from a stationary position, as he was about to board or alight, and the evidence is directed entirely to this issue, and it is shown by defendant that the car was in motion at the time, it is error to allow plaintiff to recover on the latter theory, by giving instructions for plaintiff or refusing instructions on behalf of defendant, so that the jury is allowed to consider that phase of the case. See on this question: Alabama City, G. & A. R. Co. v. Bullard, 157 Ala. 618, 47 So. 578; Chicago City R. Co. v. Gates, 135 Ill. App. 180; Peck v. St. Louis Transit Co. 178 Mo. 617, 77 S. W. 736; Peterson v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 211 Mo. 498, 111 S. W. 37; Graefe v. St. Louis Transit Co. supra; Patterson v. Westchester Electric R. Co. 26 App. Div. 336, 49 N. Y. Supp. 796, affirmed without opinion in 44 App. Div. 629, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1144; Kelly v. Third Ave. R. Co. 25 App. Div. 603, 50 N. Y. Supp. 426; Savage v. Third Ave. R. Co. 29 App. Div. 556, 51 N. Y. Supp. 1066; Kuhlman v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 30 Misc. 417, 62 N. Y. Supp. 466; Cunningham v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 31 Misc. 471, 64 N. Y. Supp. 350; Clancy v. Yonkers R. Co. 88 App. Div. 612, 84 N. Y. Supp. 789, affirmed without opinion in 112 App. Div. 887, 97 N. Y. Supp. 1131; Murphy v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 71 N. J. L. 5, 58 Atl. 1018; El Paso Electric R. Co. v. Ruckman, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 25, 107 S. W. 1158; El Paso Electric R. Co. v. Boer (Tex. Civ. App.) 108, S. W. 199; Haralson v. San Antonio Traction Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 115 S. W. 876.

And this, apparently, is the ground for the decision in Kuhlman v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 30 Misc. 417, 62 N. Y. Supp. 526, reversing 29 Misc. 773, 60 N. Y. Supp. 989.

In Anderson v. Third Ave. R. Co. 36 App. Div. 309, 55 N. Y. Supp. 290, however, Judge Cullen points out that this rule would not be universally applicable, but 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

only in cases where the testimony presented two irreconcilable theories as to the manner in which the accident occurred.

Instructions.

The following cases turn particularly upon instructions given or refused by the court. Thus, in Birmingham R. & Electric Co. v. Brannon, 132 Ala. 431, 31 So. 523, an instruction was held to be erroneous which in effect declared, as matter of law, that it was not negligence for a passenger to attempt to board a street car in slow motion.

In Sweet v. Birmingham R. & Electric Co. 145 Ala. 667, 39 So. 767, an instruction that an attempt to alight while a car was moving is contributory negligence if a reasonably prudent person, so situated, would not have attempted it, was approved.

In Orth v. Saginaw Valley Traction Co. (Mich.) 127 N. W. 330, the court approved an instruction to the effect that a passenger assumes the risk attending the boarding of a moving car, but not of the negligence of the company in suddenly accelerating the speed of the car, when they know the passenger is in the act of boarding it.

In Maisels v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. Street R. Co. 16 App. Div. 391, 45 N. Y. Supp. 4, an instruction that "the omission of the driver to stop the car on the request of the plaintiff would not justify or excuse the act of the plaintiff in attempting to alight from the front platform of the car while the car was in motion and the horses on a trot, if you find from the evidence that was the fact," was held to be correct, and not open to the objection that it in effect instructed that if plaintiff got off while the car was in motion, he was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

In Monroe v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 79 App. Div. 587, 80 N. Y. Supp. 177, where the negligence claimed was in starting a car suddenly, as plaintiff was in the act of boarding it, when it had nearly stopped, it was held to be error to refuse to charge that the "slowing up of the car as it approached the street crossing was not an invitation to the plaintiff to board it before it stopped," as the motorman could not be charged with notice that plaintiff would attempt to board the car before it came to a full stop, and hence would not be negligent in starting it suddenly before it had done so, unless he actually saw plaintiff attempting to board.

In Coles v. Interurban Street R. Co. 49 Misc. 246, 97 N. Y. Supp. 289, the court says that while an instruction that "if this plaintiff attempted to board that car, and if the conductor, under all the circumstances thereof, knew, or had reason to know, that she intended to board, he should have given her reasonable opportunity to do so, and his failure so to do would have been a negligent act on his part, which would bind this defendant corporation," might be erroneous if standing alone, because of its failure to direct attention to possible contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, it was cured by a further instruction that "if, however, after that car had started, no matter how slow it was going, the plaintiff attempted to board it, and then met with this accident, she cannot recover in this case."

In San Antonio Traction Co. v. Parks (Tex. Civ. App.) 93 S. W. 130, where there was a conflict of evidence as to whether plaintiff was injured by a sudden starting of the car, or in jumping from the car while it was in motion, an instruction that, "you are further instructed that if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff was guilty of negligence in alighting from the car at the time or manner or under the circumstances that you find from the evidence that plaintiff did alight from the car, and that such negligence, if any, proximately caused or contributed to plaintiff's injuries, if any, you are then instructed to return a verdict for the defendant," was held to be erroneous, because, if plaintiff was negligent in alighting, such negligence was ipso facto the proximate cause of the injury. But, on appeal, in 100 Tex. 222, 94 S. W. 331, this objection was held invalid, inasmuch as the instruction complained of did not expressly authorize a verdict in favor of plaintiff, though the jury should find that he was guilty of negligence in his manner of alighting. Reports of this case on other points are found in (Tex. Civ. App.) 97 S. W. 510, and 100 Tex. 227, 98 S. W. 1100.

In Dallas Consol. Electric Street R. Co. v. Lasch (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 729, where the evidence was conflicting as to whether plaintiff was injured while alighting while the car was moving, or whether the car was started suddenly when he was in the act of alighting, the court said that defendant was entitled to have its theory presented affirmatively to the jury by an instruction that if they found that plaintiff got off the car while in motion, and that a person of ordinary care would not have so acted under the same or similar circumstances, they should find for defendant, in addition to a general charge on contributory negligence.

And in Dallas Consol. Electric Street R. Co. v. Barnes (Tex. Civ. App.) 119 S. W. 122, where there was some evidence that plaintiff stepped off facing the rear, and the pleading raised this issue, it was held to be error to refuse a special charge that, "if you should find and believe from the evidence that plaintiff herein attempted to alight from one of the defendant's cars while the same was moving, and that in alighting therefrom she did not follow the motion of the car, but stepped therefrom in a negligent manner, and that a person of ordinary care would not have so acted under the same or similar circumstances, then this would constitute contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and you will return your verdict for the defendant."

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

T. C. NEECE, Appt.,

LEWIS JOSEPH, Exr., etc., of A. W.
Shirey, Deceased.

Contract — to procure evidence — validity.

A contract to secure evidence of a given state of facts, which will permit the winning of a lawsuit, is void as against public policy.

(June 6, 1910:)

Note. — Validity of contracts to procure testimony.

This note is supplemental to the note to Goodrich v. Tenney, 19 L.R.A. 371. Cases have been excluded which relate primarily to contracts to withhold evidence, ordinary rewards, competency of witnesses by reason of interest, and the matter of "turning state's evidence;" also cases holding simply that contracts to pay a witness extra compensation are without consideration. For the general subject of compensation to expert witnesses, see notes to Flinn v. Prairie County, 27 L.R.A. 669, and to Phillier v. Waukesha County, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1040.

Speaking generally it may be said that while an agreement to disclose information is not necessarily invalid, contracts to furnish evidence to a particular effect are, as a rule, condemned by the courts.

Contracts for evidence to a particular effect.

A contract to furnish a person with evidence that will win a suit, or place him in such a position that he can force a favorable settlement, is void. Hughes v. Mullins, 36 Mont. 267, 92 Pac. 758, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 209.

And a contract to furnish evidence to establish the claim of a party in a litigation to be commenced is void as against public policy. Lyons v. Hussey, 82 Hun, 15, 31 N. Y. Supp. 281.

So, an agreement to furnish testimony favorable to a party to a suit, for a consideration dependent upon the result, is void (Bowling v. Blum [Tex. Civ. App.] 52 S. W. 97), where the court seemed to consider the contract invalid apart from the character of the compensation.

An agreement that if a person will secure and furnish evidence by means of which his employers can obtain judgment in a case to be brought against them by a third party, they will, contingent on the result, give him one fourth of the judgment, partakes of maintenance, and is void on account of its corrupt tendency, and because as inconsistent with public policy. Getchell v. Welday, 4 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 65, 113.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lawrence County entered upon a directed verdict for defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a contract for personal services. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Smith & Blackford, W. E. Beloate, and R. B. Maxey, for appellant:

Where a contract is subject to two constructions, one of which is legal, and the other illegal, it is presumed to be legal until the contrary is shown.

15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 933, 934-1016.

And is construed against the party who prepares it.

McFarlane v. York, 90 Ark. 88, 117 S. W.

112, where a contract which included an undertaking to obtain evidence was declared void as champertous; see also, to similar effect, Rees v. De Bernardy [1896] 2 Ch. 437, where the contract involved the recovery of property by procuring evidence or similar means; and Phelps v. Manecke, 119 Mo. App. 139, 96 S. W. 221, where part of the services agreed upon was to "get up" the evidence.

In Quirk v. Muller, 14 Mont. 407, 25 L.R.A. 87, 43 Am. St. Rep. 647, 36 Pac. 1077, where one was employed not only to make search and inquiry for witnesses, and to ascertain the names of persons acquainted with the facts and circumstances, but also to procure such other testimony as would entitle the employer to recover the possession of certain property, the compensation to be a percentage of the recovery, it was held that the contract was void as an agreement to procure testimony that would win a lawsuit. The court said: "We do not hold the contract void because it was an agreement to procure perjury, or because it did procure perjury, but the contract had the tendency, and opened the very strong temptation, to the procurement of perjury." And later in the opinion it is said: "We think that nothing here said can be interpreted as forbidding the offering of rewards for the detection of crime, or the employing of persons to search for material witnesses or important papers or documents or exhibits which have been lost."

But an agreement by a third person with one party to a litigation to procure from the other party a contract of such a character that it would itself constitute the evidence desired by the former, that the latter was selling machines upon terms which violated a contract, is not invalid. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Fisher (Iowa) 122 N. W. 575.

Agreements for disclosure of information.

Agreements for the disclosure of information have been upheld in some cases. Thus, in Wood v. Casserleigh, 30 Colo. 287, 97 Am. St. Rep. 138, 71 Pac. 360 (affirming 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Yet in Casserleigh v. Wood, 56 C. C. A. 212, 119 Fed. 308, it was held that a similar contract would not be enforced in equity on account of its champertous character, although there was no statute against champerty in the state of the forum.

And a contract for the purchase of documentary evidence, which includes a purchase of the silence of the owner in regard to the matters to which the documents relate, is void. Young v. Thomson, 14 Colo. App. 294, 59 Pac. 1030.

Agreements for ascertaining facts.

Where part of the consideration for the assignment of a check was that the assignee should make a trip to another state for the purpose of securing witnesses for the assignor in a pending divorce suit against his wife, it was held that, in the absence of other evidence, it could not be concluded that the assignee was to secure false and suborned testimony, or do any other act that was corrupt and against the policy of the law. Singer Mfg. Co. v. City Nat. Bank, 145 N. C. 319, 59 S. E. 72.

In Plating Co. v. Farquharson, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 49, it appeared that the defendants after judgment against them of infringement of the plaintiff's patent, and pending an appeal therefrom, inserted in a newspaper this advertisement: "Nickel plating—£100 reward to anyone who can produce documentary evidence that nickel plating was done previous to 1860." An application to commit the printers of the newspaper for contempt of court was denied, the court of appeal being of the opinion that neither the printers nor the de-

Muller, 14 Mont. 467, 25 L.R.A. 87, 43 Am. St. Rep. 647, 36 Pac. 1077.

Hart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

T. C. Neece brought this suit in the circuit court against A. W. Shirey to recover an amount alleged to be due him under the following contract:

Minturn, Arkansas, Feb. 27, 1906.

This is an agreement an a contract made bye Dr. T. C. Neece and John Bennett, bye the consent and bye the request of A. W. Shirey, of the town of Minturn, wherein the sed T. C. Neece do agree to go with John Bennett, and to find and furnish all the proofs that can be established bye the doctors, wherein that the sed Bell Shirey, the wyfe of the sed A. W. Shirey, did give birth to one child, an oup on sed proofs furnished by the sed T. C. Neece, that Bell Shirey did live the state of Arkansas, and giv birth to sed child then an thare, his fees and truble for such would be $500, wherein the sed John Bennett as A. W. Shirey agent, by consent of A. W. Shirey, do agree to pay the sed T. C. Neace the five 500 hundred dollars as fees time a truble and expenses.

Written and sind by John Bennett, agt. an employd by A. W. Shirey.

The plaintiff testified in his own behalf, and also introduced as a witness John Ben-fendants had been guilty of any contempt. Jessel, M. R., said: "Advertisements of a similar nature are very common. You advertise for a lost deed or a lost will, or you advertise for a certificate of marriage or of baptism, to prove heirship or kinship. That is done as a matter of course. Generally, no doubt, the amount of the offer is not quite so large as £100, but sometimes it is; and I never heard it suggested that those advertisements were illegal, or were not a proper mode of obtaining evidence." And the court severely criticized the case of Pool v. Sacheverel, 1 P. Wms. 675.

In Pool v. Sacheverel, supra, it seems that a certain register entry of a marriage had been held to evidence the marriage of certain parties under assumed names, and, after judgment sustaining such marriage, a relative of the party defeated in the action inserted in a newspaper an advertisement offering £100 reward for discovery and legal proof that such register entry evidenced the marriage of parties whose names were correctly stated therein, wherefor he was committed for contempt of court, Parker, L. C., saying, inter alia: "This tends to the suborning of witnesses, is very dangerous, and not only greatly criminal, but is a contempt of the court," for he pointed out that a new trial might be granted upon affidavits secured by the advertisement.

Agreements to pay witnesses extra compensation.

"Where a witness who is not interested in the result of the controversy resides within this state, and is amenable to process therein, an agreement to compensate him in an amount in excess of the legal fees, for attending as a witness and testifying only as to facts within his knowledge, is contrary to public policy and void." Clifford v. Hughes, 124 N. Y. Supp. 478; see also, to the same effect, Ramschael's Estate, 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 262.

Thus, an agreement to pay a witness who knows a fact material to the issue, for his loss of time, a greater sum than the legal fees, is without consideration, against public policy. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

lic policy, and void. Wright v. Somers, 125 Ill. App. 256.

And an agreement that a person should receive pay for giving evidence in an action which it is agreed shall be brought "is repugnant to every instinct of propriety and justice." Cowles v. Rochester Folding Box Co. 81 App. Div. 414, 80 N. Y. Supp. 811, affirmed in 179 N. Y. 87, 71 N. E. 468.

In Dodge v. Stiles, 26 Conn. 463, the court, in holding that an agreement to pay a witness the ordinary value of his time besides his legal fees was without consideration, said, inter alia: "Were it otherwise, and witnesses might be allowed to make terms for testifying, there would be room for oppressive conduct and for corruption."

There may be a further consideration, in which case an executory promise for extra compensation will be upheld; as if the witness was about going abroad at the time he may be wanted to attend court, and agrees that he will remain and give up his journey, and is summoned; or living at a distance from the place of the court, more than 20 miles, so that his deposition could be taken, agrees that he will attend in person. In these and the like cases, the promise is one for indemnity."

Where a part of the consideration for a reward to a person for the production of evidence as to an embezzlement was that he should testify as a witness in an action pending or to be brought by the rewarder against the alleged embezzler, it was held that the contract was void as against public policy. Boelmer v. Foval, 55 Ill. App. 71.

Where the defendant in a criminal case after conviction placed certain notes in the hands of a third party, to be delivered to the prosecuting witness in case he was pardoned, or, if his conviction was reversed, in case of his final discharge, it was held that no honesty of intention would justify the adoption of "a rule which would allow persons charged with crime to practically buy up the witnesses for the state." Haines v. Lewis, 54 Iowa, 301, 37 Am. Rep. 202, 6 N. W. 495.

But an agreement for extra compensation to a witness does not necessarily avoid an nett, who signed the instrument copied above. No evidence was offered by the defendant. The testimony of these witnesses is very voluminous, but its effect is to show that plaintiff knew that there was a divorce suit pending between defendant and his wife when the contract was made; that one of the contentions of defendant in that suit was that his wife had given birth to a child at some place unknown to him, and that he was not the father of it; that the testimony to be procured under the agreement was for use in that suit, and was so used.

The circuit court held that the agreement was contrary to public policy and void; and directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, which was accordingly done. From the judgment rendered, the otherwise valid contract of which it is a part. Thus, while an agreement by a creditor of the estate to give such true evidence as may be necessary to enable heirs to recover the estate, standing alone, may not be a sufficient consideration to support an executory contract, it is not immoral or illegal, and will not avoid a contract otherwise legal and binding, in which it is incorporated. Smith v. Hartsell, 150 N. C. 71, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 203, 63 S. E. 172.

It is to be observed at this point that the note does not purport to cover the question whether agreements contemplating the intermeddling with litigation by a third person, apart from an agreement to procure evidence, is bad for champerty or maintenance.

An agreement between the defendant and the plaintiff, a lawyer, that the latter would attend as a witness in the surrogate's court upon the trial of a proceeding for the probate of the will of the defendant's father, and that he would confer with defendant's attorneys relative to the testimony which he should give upon such proceeding, in consideration of which the defendant was to pay him a sum equal to that which an attorney at law would reasonably charge for his services, while it will not enable the plaintiff to recover more than the legal fees for his attendance as a witness and testifying, will, it seems, enable him to recover for his conferences with the defendant's attorneys. See Clifford v. Hughes, supra.

Few of the cases in relation to the compensation of expert witnesses have arisen under express contracts to pay them extra compensation. Where the employment involves special work in preparation for the trial, there would seem to be nothing illegal in such contracts.

Where a suit is pending in St. Louis against the officers and agents of a mining company, for sending through the mails fraudulent statements as to the value of its properties in Colorado, it is not against public policy for the company to employ, plaintiff has prosecuted an appeal to this court.

The defendant Shirey died testate during the pendency of the appeal, and the case has been duly revived in the name of the executor of his will.

The circuit court was right in holding that the contract was against public policy and void. The vice of the contract does not consist in the fact that the defendant employed the plaintiff to obtain evidence in his divorce suit; but the contract is, on its face, illegal because of the improper provision that the evidence to be procured should be of a given state of facts, of a tendency to enable defendant to win his suit. It will be observed that the contract did not provide for the payment of his services in pro-at an agreed price, residents of Colorado to examine the properties, have assays made, and prepare themselves to testify as to what in truth was their value, and to go to St. Louis and testify as to such value; there is nothing in an objection that such an agreement tends to pervert or obstruct public justice, in the absence of evidence suggesting that the witnesses were employed to pervert the truth, or to obstruct the cause of justice. Lincoln Mountain Gold Min. Co. v. Williams, 37 Colo. 193, 85 Pac. 844.

An agreement to pay a certain sum to an expert for his services in a proceeding to condemn real estate belonging to the promisor, such services to consist, among other things, in investigation of values of the part of the land taken, and the effect of such taking upon what remained, consulting with counsel for appellant, examining plats, etc., as well as testifying in the case, will be presumed to be legal till the contrary appears; such services are not necessarily illegal or tending to corrupt practices. Johnson v. Pietsch, 94 Ill. App. 459.

Where an agreement to testify as an expert rests upon a sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay a reasonable compensation in addition to the statutory fees, and the jury find such promise or a mutual understanding to that effect upon sufficient evidence, a judgment for the amount of such compensation will not be disturbed. Barrus v. Phaneuf, 166 Mass. 123, 32 L.R.A. 619, 44 N. E. 141.

The validity of a contract for the extra compensation of an expert employed in a criminal case by the district attorney, involving special work by the expert in preparation for the trial, has been upheld in New York in the case of People v. Montgomery, 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. 207; and such contracts have been recognized as valid in People ex rel. Tripp v. Cayuga County, 22 Misc. 616, 50 N. Y. Supp. 16; People ex rel. Bliss v. Cortland County, 39 N. Y. S. R. 313, 15 N. Y. Supp. 748; People ex rel. Hamilton v. Jefferson County, 35 App. Div. 239, 54 N. Y. Supp. 782.

The attorney general of a state, desiring curing for use such testimony as actually existed, but it contemplated the procurement of evidence tending to establish a given state of facts, regardless of any other consideration. With reference to such contracts, the supreme court of Montana held: "A contract is void as against public policy if by it one of the parties agrees to secure such testimony as will enable the other to win an existing or contemplated suit. It is not necessary that the contract should contemplate the production of perjured testimony. It is void because its tendency is to promote unlawful acts." Quirk v. Muller, 14 Mont. 467, 25 L.R.A. 87, 43 Am. St. Rep. 647, 36 Pac. 1077.

to show that the estimate of value of the property of a certain corporation given by its expert in his testimony was materially too high, engaged an expert for that purpose, who stated that his terms would be a retainer of $1,000 and $50 a day while thus engaged; some days later such expert stated that he had examined the testimony of the corporation expert, and could make a materially lower appraisal, but his appraisal when made not being materially lower, he was not called as a witness; and it was held that he was entitled to the retainer, but not to any per diem compensation. Hough v. State, 68 Misc. 26, 124 N. Y. Supp. 878.

In Philler v. Waukesha County, 130 Wis. 211, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1040, 131 Am. St. Rep. 1055, 120 N. W. 829, 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 712, the court was of the opinion that a contract to pay an expert for work done in preparation and qualification to enable him to testify would be valid.

But an agreement to pay an expert witness for his services a percentage of the amount that may be recovered or realized is illegal. Laffin v. Billington, 14 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 360, 86 N. Y. Supp. 267. See also Johnson v. Pietsch, supra, for a dictum to the same effect.

It has been held that a contract with an expert to pay him extra compensation where the subject of his testimony involved no special preparation was invalid.

Thus, in Burnett v. Freeman, 125 Mo. App. 683, 103 S. W. 121, s. c. subsequent appeal 134 Mo. App. 709, 115 S. W. 88, it was held that a contract to pay an expert for being a witness as to matters of fact or professional knowledge not acquired by him with a view to the particular case would be invalid as without consideration and against public policy.

In Walker v. Cook, 33 Ill. App. 561, it was held that a physician under subpoena could not recover on a promise to pay him as well for his attendance in court as if he was to attend to his patients, the matter on which he was to testify being as to the reasonable value of professional services rendered. While the court quoted and apparently followed the case of Dodge v. Stiles, supra, it is stated in the opinion that a different question would have been 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the opinion of the court in that case is contained a quotation from the supreme court of Illinois in the case of Gillett v. Logan County, 67 Ill. 256, which is so clear a statement of the reasons for the rule, that we repeat it here. The facts were that the county supervisors desired to overthrow the result of an election in regard to whether the county should subscribe for certain railroad bonds. They made a contract with a person to procure evidence to show that certain votes cast at such election were illegal, and the contract had a scale of prices varying according to the number of votes that were proved to be illegal. The court said: "The evidence disproved the actual use presented had the witness attended without service of a subpoena.

Miscellaneous.

A contract with a deputy sheriff to pay him a certain sum, in consideration of which he is to furnish evidence sufficient to convict the murderers of a relative of the contractors, is void as a contract to pay a public officer for doing a duty which the law requires him to do without such payment. Kennedy v. Hodges, 97 Ga. 753, 25 S. E. 493.

In Langdon v. Conlin, 67 Neb. 243, 60 L.R.A. 429, 108 Am. St. Rep. 643, 93 N. W. 389, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 834, the decision holding void a contract between an attorney and a layman whereby the latter for a percentage was to procure the employment of the former by third persons for the prosecution of suits in courts of record, and also to assist "in looking after and securing proper and legitimate witnesses whose testimony was to be used in such cases,"—was mainly upon the ground that it was a cover to enable one not a member of bar to practise in the courts; but the provision quoted as to procuring witnesses was also apparently regarded as objectionable in itself. See also, to similar effect, Holland v. Sheehan, 108 Minn. 362, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 510, 122 N. W. 1, 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 687.

Where two persons entered into a fraudulent conspiracy to defraud the government with respect to certain land, and the evidence of such conspiracy, necessary to prove the claims of the rightful claimant, is in the sole possession and control of one of such conspirators, whose testimony cannot be secured by process, an agreement between such conspirator and such claimant, by which the former, for a valuable consideration, is to testify, and permit the use of the evidence showing such conspiracy, is void, and no recovery can be had upon it by such conspirator, as he cannot be permitted to profit by the information possessed by reason of his unlawful conspiracy. Hagan v. Wellington, 7 Kan. App. 74, 52 Pac. 909.

See also as illustrating an attempt to sell information of one's own rascality, Young v. Thomson, 14 Colo. App. 294, 59 Pac. 1030, which, however, was decided on another ground.

by the committee of any corrupt means or any corrupt design, on their part, in the use of the money. But the contracts themselves are pernicious in their nature. They created a powerful, pecuniary inducement on the part of the agents so employed that the testimony should be given of certain facts, and that a particular result of the suit should be had. A strong temptation was held out to them to make use of improper means to procure the needful testimony, and to secure the desired result of the suit. The nature of the agreement was such as to encourage attempts to suborn witnesses, to tamper with jurors, and to make use of other 'base appliances' in order to secure the necessary results which were to bring to these agents their stipulated compensation. The tendency of such arrangement must be to taint with corruption the atmosphere of courts, and to pervert the course of justice. A pure administration of justice is of vital public concern. It tends to evil consequences that any such venal agency as is constituted by these contracts should have a part in the conduct of judicial proceedings, where the attainment of right and justice is the end. Should such contracts of this character receive countenance, we might, among the multiplying forms of agency of the time, have to witness the scandalous spectacle of a class of agents holding themselves out to the public as professional procurers of desired testimony for litigants in court, for pay contingent upon the success of their suits. In Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 16 How. 314, 14 L. ed. 953, it was held that a contract or a contingent compensation for obtaining legislation was void by the policy of the law. With much greater reason, we think, should the contracts under consideration be held vicious. We cannot sanction them. On account of their corrupting tendency, we must hold them to be void, as inconsistent with public policy." See also Patterson v. Donner, 48 Cal. 379; Lyon v. Hussey, 82 Hun. 15, 31 N. Y. Supp. 281.

We agree with the reasoning of the court in the above-cited cases, that contracts like the one under consideration are void as against public policy, and as tending to impede the administration of justice. "Where the ground of a promise on one part, or the thing promised to be done on the other part, is unlawful, the courts will not enforce the contract for either party." Mendel v. Davies, 46 Ark. 420. See also Tatum v. Kelley, 25 Ark. 209, 94 Am. Dec. 717; Ruddell v. Landers, 25 Ark. 238, 94 Am. Dec. 719; Hencke v. Standiford, 66 Ark. 535, 52 S. W. 1.

The judgment will be affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

GREGORY PERKINS, Jr., Trustee, etc., of Golden Gate Laundry, Incorporated, Bankrupt, Appt.,

v.

J. E. COWLES et al., Respts.

(157 Cal. 625, 108 Pac. 711.)

Corporation — transfer of stock — insolvency — liability of transferee.

1. One who purchases stock of a corporation which is not fully paid, from original subscribers, including the president, may be held liable to creditors for the unpaid balance, although the sellers represented that the stock was fully paid, and he had no actual knowledge to the contrary, where by law the transfer effects a substitution of the transferee for the original subscriber upon the subscription contract.

Bankruptcy — corporation — unpaid subscriptions — assets.

2. Unpaid subscriptions to the stock of a corporation constitute assets in the hands of its trustee in bankruptcy, even though the stock has been transferred from the possession of the original subscribers.

(April 18, 1910.)

Note. — Liability of transferee of corporate stock on unpaid subscription.

This note does not cover the question of the liability upon unpaid subscriptions of persons holding stock in the capacity of trustees or agents, or those holding stock as collateral security. The latter question is dealt with in the note to Andrews v. National Foundry & Pipe Works, 36 L.R.A. 139, and the supplemental note appended to the case of Marshall Field & Co. v. Evans, J. S. Co. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249. The liability of transferees under statutes imposing double or added liability upon stockholders is also, of course, beyond the scope of this note.

In some cases transferees of stock have been held liable upon the ground of privity between the corporation and the transferee, without express reference to notice being made. Bend v. Susquehanna Bridge & Bank Co. 6 Harr. & J. 128, 14 Am. Dec. 261; Hall v. United States Ins. Co. 5 Gill, 484; Brinkley v. Hambleton, 67 Md. 169, 8 Atl. 904; Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65, 23 L. ed. 384.

The court in Brinkley v. Hambleton, supra, said: "According to the ordinary well-settled rule upon the subject, the law implies a promise or duty by every holder of stock in a joint stock company, to pay the full par value of the stock as it may be called for; and it follows, as a matter of course, that an assignee of the stock, by coming into privity with the company, by having the stock transferred to him on its books, is equally liable as the former holder was before the transfer. The assignee takes the shares with all their rights APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover the balances alleged to be due on certain stock subscriptions. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Lloyd W. Moultrie, for respondents:

If any presumption of fact arises from the face of a stock certificate in customary form, it is that the stock is fully paid for.

If a certificate of stock is silent on its face as to whether it is fully paid or not, a bona fide purchaser is protected in considering it fully paid stock.

Lorigan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was submitted to the trial court and liabilities, so that if a liability to a loss has been incurred by the company before he purchased the stock, he may be called upon to contribute thereto as soon as he has accepted a transfer of the shares and become a shareholder in the concern. The liability to pay the calls made upon the stock after the transfer is shifted from the outgoing to the incoming shareholder; the transfer of stock working a complete novation of the contract of membership, the transferee being substituted to the place of the transferor, with all the rights and liabilities incident to the holding of the shares."

While in the Maryland cases just cited, the effect of notice or lack of notice to the transferee is not expressly treated, in Brant v. Ehlen, 59 Md. 1, where the stock transferred appeared on its face to be fully paid, and a bona fide transferee was held not liable for unpaid subscriptions, the court said that in all of the cases relied upon as sustaining a different holding, it would be found that the certificates on their face showed that they were not fully paid, or the facts were such as to put the purchaser on inquiry.

In Merrimac Min. Co. v. Levy, 54 Pa. 227, 93 Am. Dec. 697, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 467, a transferee of the original purchaser was held liable to the corporation for an unpaid balance on the stock, where he was accepted as a transferee by the corporation.

So, in Basting v. Northern Trust Co. 61 Minn. 307, 63 N. W. 721, a purchaser of stock on execution sale was held liable for a call for unpaid subscriptions, where he was recognized by the corporation as a stockholder, and a transfer was made on the books as soon as the transferor had paid a call previously made.

And it was held in Gordon v. Parker, 10 La. 56, that a purchaser of stock at auction, where there was no deception, was liable 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

according to the charter for unpaid subscriptions.

Other cases without express reference to notice, have held transferees liable on the principle that they take subject to all immunities and liabilities, since stock is not in the nature of negotiable paper. Re People's Live Stock Ins. Co. 56 Minn. 180, 57 N. W. 468; Upton v. Hansbrough, 3 Biss. 417, Fed. Cas. No. 16,801; Wilbur v. Stockholders of Corporation, 13 Phila. 479, Fed. Cas. No. 17,636; Close v. Sherwood, 5 Misc. 550, 25 N. Y. Supp. 980.

And in Brown v. Hitchcock, 36 Ohio St. 667, under a statute providing that dues should be secured by individual liability, and that each stockholder should be liable for any amount unpaid, and also imposing a further liability, an assignee is held to stand in the shoes of his assignor, on the principle that such liability arises out of the nature of the property and the relations of the parties to it and to creditors, in connection with the equitable principle that he who derives the advantage ought to bear the burdens.

So, in Bonewitz v. Van Wert County Bank, 41 Ohio St. 78, it was held that if the stock in question had been sold by the corporation before the debt sought to be satisfied accrued, the subsequent transferees thereof would be liable for the statutory liability. What the statutory liability was does not appear.

Transferees with notice.

Whether or not the foregoing cases intend to go to the extent of holding transferees absolutely liable in all cases, regardless of notice, they are undoubtedly liable if they had notice that the stock was unpaid. People's Home Sav. Bank v. Sadler, 1 Cal. App. 189, 81 Pac. 1029; People's Home Sav. Bank v. Rauer, 2 Cal. App. 415, 84 Pac.

on an agreed statement of facts. It appears therefrom that the Golden Gate Laundry, Incorporated, was organized under the laws of this state in January, 1902, with a capital stock of $33,000, represented by 330 shares of the par value of $100 each. All the stock was subscribed for by the six original incorporators. Certain of these, being the owners of a business plant known as the Golden Gate Laundry, transferred it to the Golden Gate Laundry, Incorporated, at a valuation of $5,500. It was accepted by the latter corporation at that figure, and 165 shares of the capital stock of the corporation subscribed for by said parties was credited thereby with a payment of 33½ cents on each dollar per share of the capital stock subscribed for by them. Subsequently the subscribers to the remaining 165 shares of the capital stock paid into the treasury of the corporation 33½ cents on the dollar per share of the stock subscribed for by them. Thereupon all the stock of the corporation was issued to the original subscribers, the certificates being in the usual and ordinary form, reciting that the person named therein was the owner of a given number of shares of $100 each of the capital stock of the corporation, transferable on its books on surrender of the certificate. Some months thereafter, these defendants purchased certain shares under the following circumstances: Three of the original subscribers,—Rogers, McCoy, and Hedderly,—being desirous of securing patronage for the business of the corporation and extending its influence, arranged with the defendants and others to purchase part of the shares held by them for 40 cents on the dollar per share. Hedderly was one of the original subscribers and president of the corporation. He and the others stated to the defendants, when soliciting a purchase of the stock by them, that the stock was fully paid up at its face or par value, and that there were no unpaid subscriptions thereon. And in Boulton Carbon Co. v. Mills, 78 Iowa, 460, 5 L.R.A. 649, 43 N. W. 200, an original incorporator was held liable for the unpaid amount of subscription on stock purchased by him as fully paid after its issuance.

And in Gillett v. Chicago Title & T. Co. 230 Ill. 373, 82 N. E. 891, where it was sought to hold transferees liable, and it appeared that the original holder subscribed practically the entire stock of the corporation in consideration of rights in a play to be written by him, and certain unperfected inventions which could not have been transferred for anything of value, the court said: "The certificates for MacKaye's stock recited that the shares were 'fully paid and nonassessable'; and the law is, that where stock is so issued, and the holder thereafter sells or assigns the same, and the assignee acquires it in good faith, and without notice that it has not been fully paid, he cannot be made liable if, in fact, the stock is not fully paid. . . . Appellants insist that, even if this stock was wholly unpaid, they acquired it in good faith, without notice of that fact, and are therefore not liable. 'Notice,' in this connection, must be given the ordinary signification of that term, and means knowledge that the stock was unpaid, or knowledge of such facts as would have put an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry, when the inquiry might reasonably be expected to have led him to knowledge that the stock was unpaid. . . . Many of the appellants knew precisely how MacKaye had paid for his stock, and all of the appellants acquired their stock, as they knew, within a few months after the organization of this corporation. They obtained it without giving any valuable consideration therefor, except in a few instances, where it is claimed that a small percentage of the face value of the stock was paid therefor by services rendered or by other methods, not including cash actually paid at the time of the transfer of the stock. The fact that the corporastatement Hedderly acted in good faith, believing that the stock was fully paid up by the transfer of the property to the corporation from the Golden Gate Laundry. The defendants had no notice to the contrary, believed the representations as made, and stated to Hedderly and those from whom they purchased that they would not buy the stock unless it was fully paid up. Under the assurances given, the defendants then purchased a large number of the shares of the stock, which were transferred to them by the original subscribers, and such transfers entered upon the books of the corporation. The defendants ever since said transfers have been, and now are, the owners and holders of said stock. In 1904, on an involuntary petition in bankruptcy filed in the United States district court for the southern district of California, the corporation was adjudged a bankrupt and plaintiff was elected and duly qualified as its trustee. The bankrupt corporation, being without sufficient property to pay the debts of the corporation in full, on petition of plaintiff, as such trustee, the said United States district court, in September, 1904, ordered that a call be made of 50 per cent of all unpaid subscriptions or balance due on the capital stock. In January, 1906, a second call for a like amount of the balance of unpaid subscriptions was made, and the defendants having failed to make payment to the trustee of either of said calls, the plaintiff brought this action against them. The corporation itself never made any calls tion had just been organized, and that its stock was being transferred without, or practically without, any valuable consideration, was, we think, sufficient to put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry, and that inquiry would, in our judgment, have led to knowledge of the fact that the stock was wholly unpaid."

Bona fide purchasers without notice.

Where one purchases stock bona fide, and without notice that it is not fully paid, it has been held that he cannot be rendered liable for the amount remaining unpaid. Brant v. Ehlen, 59 Md. 1; Young v. Erie Iron Co. 65 Mich. 111, 31 N. W. 814; Keystone Bridge Co. v. McCluney, 8 Mo. App. 496; Erskine v. Lowenstein, 11 Mo. App. 595; Easton Nat. Bank v. Co. 27 Fed. 250; Re British Farmers' Pure Linseed Cake Co. L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 533; McCracken v. McIntyre, 1 Can. S. C. 479.

And purchasers in the open market of stock purporting to be fully paid, who have no notice that such stock is in fact not fully paid, are not liable for the unpaid amount. Rood v. Whorton, 67 Fed. 434; Hess v. Trumbo, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 320, 84 S. W. 1153.

So, where stock marked fully paid is purchased in the open market by one who is informed by the corporation's manager that the stock is fully paid, the purchaser is not, upon the bankruptcy of the corporation, liable for the unpaid subscription. Re Remington Automobile & Motor Co. 82 C. C. 421, 153 Fed. 345.

And an assignee of nonassessable shares is not liable to a creditor, although the par value has not been paid to the corporation. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Berry v. Rood, 168 Mo. 316, 67 S. W. 644, bona fide purchasers without notice that stock was not fully paid up were held not liable, although they purchased for less than the par value, stock being liable to fluctuation.

And transferees who have no knowledge that the stock was issued in consideration of overvalued property are not liable for the balance. Sprague v. National Bank, 172 Ill. 149, 42 L.R.A. 606, 64 Am. St. Rep. 17, 50 N. E. 19; Foreman v. Bigelow, 4 Cliff. 508, Fed. Cas. No. 4,934; DuPont v. Tilden, 42 Fed. 87.

And it was so held in Paterson v. Arnold, 45 Pa. 410, where stock was issued for property, in violation of a statute.

So, where stock has been paid for by the original subscriber by a transfer of property, according to agreement, and no fraud is alleged, his transferee, who purchased in good faith, is not liable to a subsequent creditor for the amount alleged to be unpaid. Phelan v. Hazard, 5 Dill. 45, Fed. Cas. No. 11,068, 12 Mor. Min. Rep. 41.

And where shares were issued to contractors of a railroad for construction work as fully paid, and the transaction was never questioned by other stockholders, transferees of the stock, who purchased in the public market, without notice, are not liable thereon as for unpaid stock. Steady v. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. 5 Dill. 348, Fed. Cas. No. 13,329.

In Mallinckrodt Chemical Works v. Belleville Glass Co. 34 Ill. App. 405, transferees without notice, who paid the par value for stock, were held not liable, although the contracts assigned by the original holders did not equal the par value, the overvaluation appearing to have been made through a mistake, and not in bad faith.

So, in Bruner v. Brown, 139 Ind. 600, 38 N. E. 318, it was held that a transferee of stock was not liable for an amount alleged to be unpaid, where he received it as fully paid, and no fraud was proved in original-on account of any unpaid subscriptions to its capital stock. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of defendants, adopting the agreed statement of facts as the findings of the court, and this appeal is taken by plaintiff from the judgment.

It will be readily observed under the agreed statement of facts that the main question presented on this appeal is whether a stockholder who has purchased the stock of a corporation in good faith and for a valuable consideration, from an original subscriber, who has not paid the full subscription price thereof, can be held liable for the unpaid subscription, of which non-payment he has no actual notice or knowledge; it in fact being represented to him by the president of the corporation, as well as the other sellers of the stock, at the time of his purchase, that the stock was fully paid for, although, from the books of the corporation, it appears that the stock had not been fully paid. The trial court held that, under these circumstances, the defendants, as transferees of the stock, were not liable. But we cannot agree with that conclusion. As far as the question is affected by the representations of the president of the corporation that the stock was fully paid, that is a false quantity. We are not referred to any authority where it has been held that even a corporation itself, let alone its creditors, would be bound by any such statement of the president of the corporation. As a matter of fact, the stock had not been fully paid, and when the president ly issuing the stock in consideration of the construction of a waterworks plant for the corporation.

In Johnson v. Lullman, 15 Mo. App. 55, affirmed in 88 Mo. 567, the rule that a bona fide purchaser is not liable for an unpaid balance on stock was approved; but the decision there was rested on the fact that the purchaser had surrendered his stock to the corporation prior to the contracting of the indebtedness sought to be satisfied.

In Myers v. Seeley, Fed. Cas. No. 9,094, however, it was held that although an assignee had relied upon the statements of the assignor and officers of the company, that it was fully paid, he would nevertheless be liable to creditors. The court said: "The assignee of shares can be in no better condition than the assignor. The transfer is not, so far as the right to make calls is concerned, dependent upon the good faith of assignor and assignee in their dealings between themselves. The question is simply whether the stock has been really paid in full to the corporation. The assignee may have paid for it to the assignor, and may have relied on the representations of the latter, and of officers of the company, that the shares bought were fully paid; yet creditors are not bound thereby, and if the stock was not fully paid, the holder is liable to creditors for the amount remaining unpaid." The case of PERKINS v. COWLES seems to be in accord with this case in holding a transferee liable regardless of notice.

And this position also seems to be supported by the broad ground upon which the liability of the transferees was predicated in the cases first cited in the note; but as notice to the transferees in those cases was not expressly negated, they are perhaps not to be taken as full authority for the position that the transferee is liable even though without notice.

Express statutory regulations.

The liability of transferees for unpaid stock is expressly regulated by statute in some cases.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Under the Virginia statute providing that the assignee and the assignor shall each be liable for any instalments which may have accrued, or which may thereafter accrue, a lien is created which is not discharged in the hands of the assignee, but the company may sell the shares for arrearages. Petersburg Sav. & Ins. Co. v. Lumsden, 75 Va. 327.

And under this statute a transferee of stock was held liable in Lewis v. Berryville Land & Improv. Co. 90 Va. 693, 19 S. E. 781, for an assessment on stock, and it was also held that he could not set up as a defense fraudulent representations made to the original holder.

So, under this statute, an assignee who in turn has assigned unpaid stock is liable after the assignment. Hamilton v. Glenn, 85 Va. 901, 9 S. E. 129.

And in Alling v. Wenzel, 133 Ill. 264, 24 N. E. 551, where the defendants were held to be original holders, and therefore liable, it appeared that there was a statute which made the assignor and assignee jointly liable for unpaid subscriptions.

So, a creditor of a corporation who receives stock, issued originally to a person acting as a mere dummy, in payment of his claim, is liable for unpaid subscriptions, where his claim was only one tenth the value of the stock, and a statute made stockholders and assignees liable to the extent of the unpaid subscriptions. Moore v. United States One Stave Barrel Co. 238 Ill. 544, 125 Am. St. Rep. 153, 87 N. E. 536.

And in Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Clarke, 20 Pa. 146, where an action was brought against an assignor for unpaid subscriptions, a provision making an assignee liable "in the same manner as the original subscriber would have been" was held to fix the assignee's liability, and not to limit the assignor's.

And in Morris v. Dunbar, 100 C. C. A. 621, 177 Fed. 159, where the statute provided that an assignee of stock should take it subject to all payments due and to become due, and be subject to the same obligations as his assignor, it was held that the as-stated that it was, he was not representing the corporation, and did not pretend to. Himself a stockholder by virtue of his original subscription, he was simply acting with Rogers and McCoy in an endeavor to make a sale of a portion of their stock to the defendants, in order to extend the influence and increase the patronage of the corporation by having the stock of the company distributed among a large number of stockholders. He was acting in his own behalf in an effort, with the others, to dispose of a portion of his and their stock. While it is true that he made the representations in good faith, and doubtless the others did also, it is equally true that he had no authority from the corporation to do so. At least, it does not appear that he had any. He was not acting in behalf of the corporation in the sale of any stock belonging to it, but simply in the personal interest of himself and the others. His conduct could not have estopped the corporation in its right to require, if necessary, and while a going concern, the full payment of the subscription price, and certainly could not estop the receiver in bankruptcy, acting in behalf of the creditors, after the corporation had become insolvent, from making a call for such payment of it, if otherwise the transferees of the original subscribers were liable therefor. Neither is it of any moment that representations that the stock was fully paid (independent of those made by the president) were made by the other original subscribers when selling the stock to designee, and not the assignor, was liable for unpaid subscriptions.

And in Reid v. DeJarnette, 123 Ga. 787, 51 S. E. 770, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1117, it was held that a special act of incorporation providing that each "stockholder" in said corporation should be individually liable for the debts of the corporation to the amount of the unpaid subscription, etc., did not include transferees of the original stockholders, where it appeared such was not the legislature's intention.

So, a transferee of stock issued to the original holder in payment of a claim, with no expectation that it should be further paid for, is not liable, notwithstanding a constitutional provision that the original subscriber should be liable for unpaid stock, and that the liability therefor should follow the stock. Seaboard Nat. Bank v. Slater, 105 Fed. 179.

No consent to transfer.

Where stock not fully paid up is transferred to one who does not consent to the transfer, he is not liable.

Thus, legatees and distributees who do not accept stock to which they are entitled are not liable for unpaid subscriptions thereon. De Camp v. Levoy, 10 Ohio C. D. 509 (legatee who had not accepted stock bequeathed); Simmons v. Ellis, 17 Mo. App. 470 (distributee of estate of deceased stockholder, where it was not distributed, and as representative he refused to inventory the stock, on the ground that it might become a liability); People's Home Sav. Bank v. Stadtmuller, 150 Cal. 106, 88 Pac. 280 (distributee of stock of an insolvent corporation, where no attempt to have the stock transferred on the books of the corporation was made, and no entry was in fact made).

And in Simmons v. Hill, 96 Mo. 679, 2 L.R.A. 476, 10 S. W. 61, a judgment creditor of one who had transferred stock to pledgees was held not liable for unpaid subscriptions, where the pledgees, knowing of the insolvency of the corporation issuing the stock, transferred it on the books to his name, without his consent.

gives another broker an order for stock, and the latter causes the stock to be transferred in the former's name, without authority, no liability for unpaid subscriptions results, no ratification of the transfer having been made. Glenn v. Garth, 133 N. Y. 18, 30 N. E. 649, 31 N. E. 344.

In Keyser v. Hitz, 133 U. S. 138, 33 L. ed. 531, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 290, it was held that if the transferee had no knowledge of the transfer, he was not liable; but that, if he accepted dividends and ratified the transfer, he would be liable to the receiver for unpaid assessments.

And it was held in Sigua Iron Co. v. Greene, 31 C. C. A. 477, 59 U. S. App. 535, 88 Fed. 207, that if there is no ratification of an unauthorized entry of one's name on the books as a subscriber, he will not be liable for unpaid subscriptions; but that if the facts are such as to warrant the jury in finding a ratification, he will be liable.

Miscellaneous.

In Palmer v. Ridge Min. Co. 34 Pa. 288, and Franks Oil Co. v. McCleary, 63 Pa. 317, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 477, it was held that a purchaser of stock is not liable to the corporation for future calls for unpaid subscriptions, where there is no provision in the corporation act, imposing such liability.

In Fraser River Min. & Dredging Co. v. Gallagher, 5 B. C. 82, where shares marked fully paid were issued to one in consideration of his securing a loan from another, the latter was held not liable for the unpaid subscription on a part of the shares which were transferred to him in consideration of the loan.

And persons who acquire unpaid stock through others, who hold it as collateral security in such a way as not to be liable, are not liable for the unpaid amount. Sturtevant v. National Foundry & Pipe Works, 32 C. C. A. 57, 60 U. S. App. 235, 88 Fed. 613.

For a note on the effect of transfer of shares of stock upon the liability of transferrers for unpaid subscriptions, see Rochester & K. F. Land Co. v. Raymond, 47 L.R.A. 246, J. T. W., defendants. There can be no question but that the original subscribers were liable to the corporation for the full subscription price, and, under the law of this state, when they transferred their stock to the defendants, and the latter caused the transfer to be entered on the books of the corporation, the former were released from liability for such payment, and the defendants in law, as transferees, assumed it, as far as any action by the corporation to compel its payment is concerned. No express promise on their part to assume or pay the balance of the subscription price was necessary. The corporation could, after the transfer of the stock to defendants, and entry thereof on its books, look only to the defendants as its recorded stockholders to compel payment of either calls for the original subscription to its stock or for assessments thereon. Visalia & T. R. Co. v. Hyde, 110 Cal. 632, 52 Am. St. Rep. 136, 43 Pac. 10; People's Home Sav. Bank v. Rickard, 139 Cal. 285, 73 Pac. 858; People's Home Sav. Bank v. Stadtmuller, 150 Cal. 106, 88 Pac. 280; O'Dea v. Hollywood Cemetery Asso. 154 Cal. 53, 97 Pac. 1. In view of this exclusive legal liability to the corporation for the payment of the subscription price which the transferees of stock assume by having themselves entered on the corporate books as stockholders, it would seem to be but a waste of time to give serious consideration to the proposition that a representation by a stockholder, who is an original subscriber of corporate stock, when selling his stock, that it is fully paid, would absolve both of them—the original subscriber by transfer and the transferee by the representation—from all liability to the corporation or its creditors for payment of such subscription price. A mere statement of the proposition negatives its soundness. The only right which the defendants had, arising from the misrepresentation of the fact of payment, was a right of action against the parties making it, personally, for damages and for rescission of the sale of the stock.

So that the matter of representation, either by the president of the corporation, or by him and the other stockholders, being eliminated as obviously unimportant factors in the present controversy, we are brought to the broad proposition, and the one for which, in the end, respondents really contend; namely, that a purchaser of certificates of stock in the open market, in good faith and for value, without anything on the face of the certificates indicating that the stock has not been fully paid, takes them free from any liability for calls for unpaid subscription, either at the instance of the corporation or its creditors, although the shares are in fact not fully paid for. Whatever may be the rule in sister jurisdictions, and we are referred to cases therefrom so holding, this is not the rule obtaining in this state. In O'Dea v. Hollywood Cemetery Asso. 154 Cal. 71, 97 Pac. 8, this same proposition was urged, and in answer to it this court said: "But, independent of this claim of representation, the broad proposition of appellants is that, because they purchased their certificates of stock in good faith and without notice, in the open market, such stock is to be deemed fully paid up, and they are protected as bona fide purchasers, even though upon the face of the certificates there was nothing to indicate that the stock had been fully paid. In effect, their claim is that certificates of stock are negotiable securities and subject to the same rules governing the transfer of such instruments. But this position, under the law of this state, is untenable. Whatever the rule may be in other jurisdictions (and some authorities therefrom are cited by appellants in support of their claim), it is well established in this state that certificates of stock are not negotiable instruments, either in the commercial sense or within the definition of the Civil Code; and that the stock represented by them is subject to assessment for subscription calls, no matter to whom it may be transferred. The rule in this state is that certificates of stock in a corporation are but mere evidences of the holder's right to a given share in the franchises and property of the corporation, and are not negotiable instruments." Barstow v. Savage Min. Co. 64 Cal. 388, 49 Am. Rep. 705, 1 Pac. 349; Graves v. Mono Lake Hydraulic Min. Co. 81 Cal. 304, 22 Pac. 665; Craig v. Hesperia Land & Water Co. 113 Cal. 7, 35 L.R.A. 306, 54 Am. St. Rep. 316, 45 Pac. 10. Such certificates of shares not being negotiable instruments, the rule analogous to other non-negotiable instruments applies, and a purchaser takes them subject to all equities in favor of the corporation. The transfer relieves him from no liability to the corporation which his transferor was under, so that, when one purchases stock and causes the transfer to be entered upon the books of the corporation, he thereafter holds his shares on the same conditions as did the stockholder from whom he purchased; he acquires under them all his rights, and is subject to all his liabilities and obligations respecting them. Visalia & T. R. Co. v. Hyde; Craig v. Hesperia Land & Water Co.; and People's Home Sav. Bank v. Rickard,—supra. Many authorities from other states might be cited to the same effect, but these from our own state declare the rule here." In that case we had occasion to examine the authorities relied on as establishing the rule for which respondents contend. 1 Cook, Corp. § 50; Clark & M. Priv. Corp. p. 1741; Helliwell, Stock & Stockholders, p. 911. It will be noted, however, when these authorities are looked to and the cases they cite examined, that (with a few exceptions in the latter) the rule promulgated or declared proceeded upon the theory that certificates of stock are negotiable or quasi negotiable instruments, or at least should be so treated. In this state, however, as certificates of stock are not negotiable instruments, and the purchaser of stock is no more protected than the purchaser of any other non-negotiable instrument, the rule of the authorities cited, based on the negotiability or quasi negotiability of stock certificates, has no force here. In fact, in those jurisdictions, where the rule of non-negotiability of certificates of stock obtains, the rule as to the liability of transferees of stock is the same as in this state. Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45, 23 L. ed. 203; Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65, 23 L. ed. 384; Merrimac Min. Co. v. Levy, 54 Pa. 227, 93 Am. Dec. 697, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 467. See note to Thompson v. Reno Sav. Bank, 3 Am. St. Rep. 829.

As far as it is insisted that the issuance of the certificates of stock without any statement that the stock had not been fully paid for was equivalent to a representation that it had been so paid, this point is fully discussed and decided adversely to the respondent in O'Dea v. Hollywood Cemetery Asso. heretofore quoted from. The certificates here involved, like the certificates involved in that case, were issued long before § 323 of the Civil Code was amended so as to require certificates issued prior to the payment of the full amount due to state the amount actually paid.

Some question is raised by respondents as to whether the unpaid subscription of the stock owned by defendants constitutes assets in bankruptcy. We think there can be no doubt about it. In Burke v. Maze, 10 Cal. App. 206, 101 Pac. 438, 440, the rule is correctly laid down as to the liability of the original subscribers. It is there said: "The amount due from the stockholders for the subscribed stock of the corporation is a trust fund for the creditors of the corporation, and such unpaid subscriptions to its stock are a part of its assets, and may be collected for its creditors. Vermont Marble Co. v. Deelez Granite Co. 135 Cal. 579, 56 L.R.A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143, 67 Pac. 1057; Walter v. Merced Academy Asso. 126 Cal. 583, 59 Pac. 136; Visalia & T. R. Co. v. Hyde, 110 Cal. 632, 52 Am. St. Rep. 136, 43 Pac. 10. Such liability arises by virtue of the stockholders' contract of membership in the corporation, evidenced by the certificates of shares. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 128; Union Sav. Bank v. Willard, 4 Cal. App. 690, 88 Pac. 1098." But the same liability attaches to transferees on becoming stockholders of record on the books of the corporation as bound the transferrers as original subscribers. By purchasing from the original subscribers the transferees assumed, as a matter of law, all the liabilities that the transferrers of the stock to them were under, and took it subject to all their obligations. Visalia & T. R. Co. v. Hyde and O'Dea v. Hollywood Cemetery Asso. supra. Hence the defendants were liable to a call for payment of the unpaid subscriptions in the bankruptcy proceedings, and the trustee had the right to maintain this action to recover on the calls.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff against each of the defendants for the amount due on the unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation held by him when this action was commenced. The agreed statement of facts which has been adopted by the court as its finding in the case furnishes the data upon which the computation may be made and the judgment rendered.

We concur. Angellotti, J.; Sloss, J.; Henshaw, J.; Melvin, J.

Shaw, J., concurring:

I concur because the previous decisions of this court settle the question that in this state the issuance of a certificate of corporate stock which, upon its face, does not show that it is not full-paid stock, is not a representation by the corporation that it has received the par value of the stock. If it were a new proposition, I would hold the contrary.

DELAWARE SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF DELAWARE EX REL. HOR-ACE T. BRUMLEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

JESSUP & MOORE PAPER COMPANY.

(— Del. —, 77 Atl. 16.)

Evidence — production of corporate books — located outside state.

1. A corporation may be compelled to produce its books for inspection in a suit against it in the courts of the state where it was organized, although they are in possession of its officers in another state.

Corporation — by-law — inspection of books — validity.

2. A by-law of a corporation making the right of a stockholder to inspect its books absolutely dependent upon the discretion of its directors, and denying all right to make extracts from them, is unreasonable and void.

Same — right of stockholder to inspect books.

3. A holder of corporate stock which has no market value, which he was forced to acquire for self-protection, and which he desires to sell, is entitled to inspect the books of the corporation for the purpose of ascertaining its value.

Mandamus — partial defense — quashing.

4. The court may quash part of the return to an alternative writ of mandamus, and permit the rest to stand, where it contains allegations which are a defense to part of the relief demanded, but not to all. Same — demand for excessive relief — effect.

5. The issuance of a peremptory writ of mandamus is not prevented by the fact that relator demanded excessive relief.

(June 22, 1910.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for New Castle County to review an order refusing to quash the return to a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the defendant to permit relator to inspect its corporate books. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Right of stockholder to inspect books of the corporation.

This question is covered in the notes to Weihenmayer v. Bitner, 45 L.R.A. 446, and Kuhback v. Irving Cut Glass Co. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 185, and the present note only covers the subsequent cases. In the Kuhback Case the court reasoned that the stockholders of a corporation are the owners of its franchise and its assets, and hence have a right to be informed of its financial condition. Therefore, when a stockholder furnishes sufficient data to warrant a conclusion that there is a mismanagement, and that the affairs of the company are not conducted in a proper manner and in the interests of the stockholders, he is entitled to examine the books, records, and accounts of the corporation, so that he may protect his interests; and if denied this right, he is entitled, upon proper application, to a mandamus to enforce it. The mere fact that he is a stockholder in a competing company is of itself not sufficient justification for refusing his inspection of the books.

A stockholder of a corporation which has ceased actively to do business, it having leased its property to another corporation, is entitled to enforce by mandamus his common-law right to inspect the books of the company to ascertain its condition and the value of its stock. Eldred v. Elliott, 161 Mich. 262, 126 N. W. 219.

A stockholder has the right to examine the books of the corporation in order to ascertain who the stockholders are, at least where it does not affirmatively appear that his motive is an improper one. State ex rel. Brandl v. Silver King Consol. Min. Co. (Utah) 106 Pac. 520.

That a stockholder seeking by mandamus to compel a corporation to permit him to inspect the books intends to use the evidence so obtained in an action by him against the corporation is no ground for denying a mandamus to enforce his right to inspection. State ex rel. Humphrey v. Monida & Y. Stage Co. 110 Minn. 193, 124 N. W. 971, rehearing denied in 110 Minn. 203, 125 N. W. 676.

An order of a court of equity in a proceeding by a stockholder of a corporation to appoint a receiver thereof, permitting him to examine the books of the company for evidence to be used in such proceeding, is not violative of the Federal constitutional guaranty against unreasonable searches. McGeary v. Brown, 23 S. W. 573, 122 N. W. 605.

The right of a stockholder to examine the books of a corporation is not affected by the number of shares of stock he may have. "A stockholder owning but a few of the shares of the corporation's capital stock is no more to be shut out by its officers from knowledge and information relating to the conduct of its business, than is one holding a majority of its stock." Richmond v. Hill, 148 Ill. App. 179.

But to entitle a stockholder of a corporation to examine the books of the corporation, he must be a bona fide stockholder; it is not sufficient that he is a nominal owner of stock, holding same for a company which cannot lawfully purchase and hold the stock in their own name. Ibid.

Although a temporary administrator of an estate owning stock in a corporation is not entitled to inspect the books of the corporation, an executor and sole legatee whose testator was a stockholder in the corporation is so entitled, and may enforce such right by mandamus. Re Hastings, 128 App. Div. 516, 112 N. Y. Supp. 800, affirmed without opinion in 194 N. Y. 546, 87 N. E. 1120.

Since a pledgee of stock retains the general ownership thereof, and the right to vote upon it, thus participating in the control of the corporation, he is entitled to the information which the law provides that the stockholders may demand through an inspection of the books of the corporation, and for the refusal to comply with his demand for an inspection of the books, the corporation becomes liable to him for the statutory penalty. Booth v. Consolidated Fruit Jar Co. 62 Misc. 252, 114 N. Y. Supp. 1000.

A statutory provision requiring that all the books and records of the corporation

Mr. Robert H. Richards, for plaintiff in error:

A corporation existing under the laws of this state is necessarily always within the jurisdiction of the courts of this state, and the corporation, as an entity, having the power to produce its books for inspection, or to permit inspection of its books, wherever the actual books may be in fact located, is necessarily bound to obey the command of the court directing such inspection.

Street R. Co. 201 Pa. 603, 51 Atl. 311; Bailey v. Williamsport & N. B. R. Co. 174 Pa. 114, 34 Atl. 556.

A private corporation has not the power to enact a valid by-law which is in itself shall at all times be open to the inspection of every stockholder has reference to corporations organized solely for profit, and does not include other corporations. Ohio Humane Soc. v. Biles, 11 Ohio C. C. N. S. 833.

Before bringing an action to recover a statutory penalty for the refusal by a corporation to permit an examination of the books by a stockholder, he must give the officers of the corporation a reasonable time to permit the examination or furnish the information he seeks to obtain thereby. Fuller v. O'Connor, 61 Misc. 279, 113 N. Y. Supp. 684.

The statutory right of a stockholder to inspect the books of a corporation is not an absolute one, and may be refused where the information is not sought in good faith. However, a petition for a writ of mandamus to require a corporation to permit a stockholder to examine the books of the corporation, which shows that he is a stockholder, and is unable to secure information as to the financial standing of the company and the method of conducting its business, is sufficient to make a prima facie case of good faith. State ex rel. Humphrey v. Monida & Y. Stage Co. supra, (citing notes in 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 185, 45 L.R.A. 446).

In general, where a stockholder is given the right by statute to inspect the books of the corporation, the court will enforce the right by mandamus for a proper and legitimate purpose. Where, however, the answer of a corporation to a stockholder's petition for a mandamus to enforce his right to inspect the books of the corporation alleges that he seeks such information for an improper purpose, and to obtain information which will personally benefit him in other business, and which will injure the company, and the stockholders demur to the 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) unreasonable, or which is contrary to the common law of the state, the statutes of the state, or the charter of the corporation.

It is the common-law right of a stockholder to inspect the books of a corporation at any proper time and for any proper purpose, which right is enforceable by mandamus.

answer, thereby admitting its truth, it is error for the court to sustain the demurrer, and grant a writ of mandamus to enforce an inspection of the books. Wight v. Heublein, 111 Md. 649, 75 Atl. 507.

In Venner v. Chicago City R. Co. 246 Ill. 170, 92 N. E. 643, a distinction is made between the common-law right of a stockholder to inspect the books of the corporation, and a right given by statute in unlimited terms. As to the common-law right the question of motive is said to be material, while motive is said to be immaterial as affecting the right under a statute. On this point the court said: "There is a well-recognized distinction between the right of a stockholder to inspect the books and papers of a corporation under the common law, and an unlimited right given by statute. Under the former, the examination can only be compelled where the stockholder asks it in good faith and for reasons connected with his rights as a stockholder. . . . Where the right is conferred by statute in absolute terms, the purpose or motive of the stockholder in making the demand for an inspection is not material, and he cannot be required to state his reasons therefor. . . . The weight of American authority is to the effect that, where the right is statutory, the stockholder need not aver or show the object of his inspection, and it is no defense under a statute granting the absolute right to inspection, to allege improper purposes, or that the petitioner desires the information for the purpose of injuring the business of the corporation. A clear legal right given by a statute cannot be defeated by showing an improper motive. If this were so, the stockholder would be driven from a certain definite right given him by the statute, to the realm of uncertainty and speculation." A. G. S.

Hastings, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 1st day of July, A. D. 1908, the state of Delaware, upon the relation of Horace T. Brumley, the plaintiff below and also the plaintiff in error, filed a petition in the superior court of the state of Delaware in and for New Castle county, praying for a writ of peremptory mandamus directed to the Jessup & Moore Paper Company, the defendant. On the same day a rule was issued directed to said defendant to show cause why the prayer of the petitioner should not be granted. A motion was subsequently made by the defendant to quash said rule and dismiss said petition, and, this being refused by the court, on motion of the counsel for the plaintiff, a writ of alternative mandamus was issued. On the 16th day of January, A. D. 1909, a return to said alternative writ was filed by the defendant, and later a motion was made by the plaintiff to quash said return on the ground that it was uncertain, argumentative, ambiguous, evasive, inconsistent, immaterial, and insufficient in law. On the 4th day of June A. D. 1909, it was ordered by the court that this motion be refused.

The only assignment of error is the refusal of the court below to grant the motion to quash the said return.

The petitioner, Brumley, alleges in his petition that the defendant is a corporation of the state of Delaware, having an outstanding preferred stock of $350,000, par value, and an outstanding common stock of $1,000,000, par value; that he is the owner of common stock having a par value of $68,000; that he was forced to acquire said stock for his own protection, he having been an accommodation indorser of a note, to secure which said stock was pledged, and which he as indorser was compelled to pay; that there is no market for said stock, and he is unable to ascertain from the said corporation sufficient facts necessary to enable him to determine its value; that he desires to sell it, and could sell it if he could give any assurance of its value; that he has received no dividend or income therefrom; that the certificate representing said shares of stock contains a false statement upon its face, in that it states the amount of preferred stock to be $100,000 less than that actually issued and outstanding at the time said certificate was issued; that he believed at the time he indorsed the note that the said statement on said certificate was correct; that the additional $100,000 was unlawfully issued for less than par, but was issued as fully paid, and that the holders thereof received dividends on the par value thereof; that the said corporation is conducting its business under unlawful contracts in restraint of trade and contrary to the interests of stockholders; that he has requested and demanded of the said corporation such statements concerning its financial condition, and the right to inspect and take extracts from such of its books as might be necessary to enable him to determine the value of his stock, but this information and privilege has been refused him; that he has the right to examine the books as prayed for, and without such examination he cannot ascertain the accurate information he desires; that he desires to make the examination for the following purposes:

To obtain evidence as to the actual value of his stock.

To ascertain whether the said $100,000 of preferred stock was unlawfully issued at less than par.

To determine under what unlawful contracts the said corporation is conducting its business.

To determine what are the assets and liabilities and earning powers of said corporation.

The petitioner further states that he does not desire to inspect the books of the corporation for mere idle curiosity, nor for speculative purposes, nor for any improper purpose, and asks for permission to inspect and make copies of:

"(a) The minute book or books containing the proceeding or proceedings of the directors of the said company from January 1, 1903, to the present time.

"(b) The books of account of said corporation which show the amount or amounts received from the sale of the preferred stock from January 1, 1903, to the present time, and the books of account of said corporation showing the disposition of funds received from the sale of preferred stock during the period last aforesaid.

"(c) The stockbook showing the dates when, the persons to whom, and the number of shares issued to each person respectively of the preferred stock of the said company.

"(d) The stockbook showing the dates when, the persons to whom, the number of shares issued to each person respectively of the common stock of the said company.

"(e) The ledgers and other books showing the amount of business done by the company from the 1st day of August, 1906, up to the present time.

"(f) The statements submitted to the directors showing the business done by the company, its profits and losses, and assets and liabilities, during each period of six months from the said 1st day of August, A. D. 1905, until this time."

This petition is incorporated in the alternative writ, and it is important to note to what extent the allegations mentioned therein are denied by the return filed by the defendant, as it is upon material allegations not denied that the court must act.

The return denies that the $100,000 of preferred stock was improperly and illegally issued, and states affirmatively that the failure to change the statement on the stock certificate of the amount of preferred stock outstanding was due to a mistake or oversight. It denies that the defendant has entered into unlawful contracts, and also denies that the petitioner is entitled to the information and inspection of books as prayed for, with the exception of the stock ledgers, which are tendered for examination. There are other denials in the return, relative to the request made by the petitioner for information, based upon the failure of the petitioner to comply with a certain by-law of the defendant company. The other allegations of the petition the defendant either specifically admits to be true, or alleges that it does not know whether they are true or false.

In addition to the denials and admissions contained in the petition, the return alleges a partial compliance with the alternative orders of the writ, and gives certain reasons for not fully complying therewith. The partial compliance, as contended by the defendant, consisted in giving an opportunity to the petitioner to inspect all of its books that relate to or concern the issuing of the last $100,000 of the preferred stock of the defendant company; and as evidence of such compliance, there is attached to the return, and marked "Exhibit A," a copy of a letter which the defendant caused to be written and addressed to the petitioner and his counsel. Said letter is dated January 14, 1909, two days before said return was filed.

The reasons for not fully complying are stated to be that all the books, accounts, papers, etc., which are desired to be inspected by the petitioner, except the stock ledgers, are within the state of Pennsylvania, in the custody of the defendant's officers, who are residents of said state, and are not within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state of Delaware, and, further, that the following by-law was, on the 20th day of March, 1908, duly adopted by the defendant company:

"Article VI. The books and accounts of the company shall be examined each year by an expert to be named by the president, and a report of the same made to the board.

"No information in regard to the business or operations of the company, and no copy of nor extract from any of the books or records of the company, shall be furnished to any person by any officer of the company, except by direction of the board.

"Stockholders shall have the right to inspect the books or records of the company only with the permission of the board.

"Stockholders desiring information in regard to the business or operations of the company, or desiring to make inspection of the books or records, shall make application in writing to a regular meeting of the board of directors, stating the specific purpose of the application, the particular information desired, and, if inspection is requested, the books and records required for that purpose.

"Such stockholder shall give assurance satisfactory to the board that he does not desire the information requested or to be obtained by such inspection, for the purpose of communicating the same to others not stockholders, and further that he will not directly or indirectly disclose the company's business or affairs to any person or persons whomsoever.

"Such examination, when permitted by the board, shall be made by the stockholder in person only, and no extract from the books or records of the company shall be made by any stockholder permitted to inspect the same.

"The decision of the board on such application shall be final."

The return alleges that the petitioner, prior to the filing of the petition, was advised of the existence of this by-law, but never gave such assurance to the board of directors, as therein required, as would entitle him to the information sought.

Allegations in the writ which are not denied must be taken as true. This is a well-settled principle of law. Bay State Gas Co. v. State, 4 Penn. (Del.) 251, 56 Atl. 1114.

Woolley on Delaware Practice, at § 1662, says: "The return to the alternative writ, if it does not show a compliance with the mandate of the writ, must set forth either a positive denial of the truth of the allegations contained in the writ, or state other facts sufficient in law to defeat the relator's right. . . . In the state of Delaware the common-law rule prevails that the return of the alternative writ is conclusive, and is to be taken as true for the purpose of the case."

Bearing in mind these well-known principles of law, and the facts in this case as above set forth, it is necessary for us to determine the following questions:

(1) Whether the court below could compel the production of books of the defendant company that were in the possession of its officers in the state of Pennsylvania.

(2) Whether the by-law above quoted is unreasonable, and therefore illegal.

(3) Whether there remain such undenied averments in the alternative writ as will entitle the plaintiff to the relief prayed for.

It is not necessary for us to pass upon the sufficiency of what the defendant contends was a partial compliance with the orders of the alternative writ, inasmuch as that refers only to the issue of the last $100,000 of preferred stock. The plaintiff alleges this issue was unlawful, but this allegation the defendant positively denies, and as the return is conclusive, and must be taken as true for the purpose of this case, such denial on the part of the defendant is a sufficient excuse or reason for not complying with that part of the mandate of the alternative writ.

First. Can the court compel the production of the books of the defendant which are in the possession of its officers outside the state?

Upon this point the court below said: "The averment of the respondent that certain books and papers, the inspection of which is asked for, are now in Philadelphia, would not avail. If their inspection was necessary, the court would order their production." This conclusion is undoubtedly correct. It has often been decided that the officer of the corporation having the actual possession of the books desired to be inspected was a proper party defendant; but it does not follow that he is the only proper defendant, or that he must necessarily be made a defendant. A corporation existing under the laws of this state is within the jurisdiction of its courts, and if there is a legal duty resting upon it to do a certain thing, it cannot escape liability by showing that that duty is primarily upon certain officers who reside outside the state. In the case of State ex rel. de Julvecourt v. Pan American Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 391, 61 Atl. 398, where objection was made to the writ issuing against a resident director who had been made a defendant with the corporation, the court said: "He has not expressly denied his power to perform the duty prayed for, and it does not seem impossible that, if the peremptory writ should be issued, he would then be able to comply with its requirements." So, in this case, there is no denial that because the books and papers are in possession of the officers of the defendant in the city of Philadelphia, the defendant could not have complied with the mandate of the alternative writ. But, as counsel for the defendant frankly admit, the case of Bay State Gas Co. v. State, 4 Penn. (Del.) 497, 56 Atl. 1120, decided in this court, is an authority sustaining the decision of the court below upon this point, and is controlling in this case.

Second. We will next consider whether the by-law quoted above was illegal and void.

The court below said upon this point: "The by-law set up as a defense, which absolutely vests in the discretion of the directors the right of a stockholder to inspect or examine the books of the company, and which makes the decision of the directors final is both unreasonable and unlawful, and would be so regarded by this court."

The charter of the company gives the directors power to make by-laws for its government and the regulation and management of its business and concerns, and also power to repeal, modify, and amend such by-laws at pleasure. It is not contended by counsel for the defendant that this provision of the charter permits the directors to make a by-law that is unreasonable or contrary to law; but it is insisted that this by-law is reasonable, and not unlawful. It may be well to here notice certain of its provisions. One is that a stockholder, before he can examine the books of the company, must "give assurance satisfactory to the board," etc. Another is that "such examination, when permitted by the board, shall be made by the stockholder in person only, and no extract from the books or records of the company shall be made by any stockholder permitted to inspect the same;" and, lastly, that "the decision of the board on such application shall be final."

The principle of law has long been established in this state that a stockholder of a corporation has a right to inspect and make extracts from the books of the corporation at a proper time and for proper purposes. In the case of Swift v. State, 7 Houst. (Del.) 338, 40 Am. St. Rep. 127, 32 Atl. 143, the court said the authorities are uniform upon the point that "a corporator may have a mandamus to compel the custos of corporate documents to allow him an inspection and copies of them, at proper times and on proper occasions; he showing clearly a right on his part to such inspection and copies, and refusal on the part of the custos to allow it." To the same effect is the case of State ex rel. de Julvecourt v. Pan American Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 391, 61 Atl. 398, 63 Atl. 1118.

It was also said in the case of Swift v. State, above referred to, that "the right to make copies, and to make abstracts and memoranda of documents, books, and papers, by a stockholder in an incorporated company, is as full and complete as the right of inspection thereof." Upon these authorities it must be admitted that under certain circumstances a stockholder has a right to inspect and make extracts from the books of the corporation. This by-law undertakes to take from the stockholder the right to have the court pass upon the question whether he is entitled to the inspection. It forces him to make his first and final appeal to the board of directors. In other words, the stockholders' legal right is delegated to the discretion of the board. This applies to the inspection only. With respect to the right to make extracts, that is taken away entirely by the following words: "No extract from the books or records of the company shall be made by any stockholder permitted to inspect the same."

There may be other provisions of this by-law which are objectionable, such as that portion which provides that no inspection shall be made except by the stockholder in person; but it is not necessary for us to consider this question further. No authority is cited, and we can find none, which would sustain this by-law. Our conclusion is that the court below was correct when it said this by-law was unreasonable and unlawful, and should be so regarded by the court.

Third. We now come to the last, the most important, and the most difficult, question in this case, namely, whether there remain such undenied averments in the alternative writ as will entitle the plaintiff to the relief sought.

From the facts which we have heretofore stated, it will be observed that there remain in the alternative writ undenied allegations to the effect that the defendant is a corporation of Delaware, with capital stock outstanding of $1,350,000; that the plaintiff is the owner of stock, the par value of which is $68,000, which he was forced to acquire, which he desires to sell, and could sell if he could give any assurance of its value; that he is unable to ascertain from the defendant sufficient facts to enable him to determine its value; that he has requested that he be given such facts, and has demanded the right to inspect the books and take extracts therefrom for such purpose,—all of which has been refused him; that he does not desire to inspect the books and make extracts for mere idle curiosity, nor for speculative purposes, nor for any improper purpose. The question then before us, briefly stated, is whether the owner of about one twentieth of the outstanding capital stock of a corporation, which has no market value, and which the owner was forced to acquire for his own protection, and which he desires to sell, is entitled to inspect and make extracts of the books of the corporation for the purpose of ascertaining its value, the corporation having refused to give him the information or permit him to examine the books.

That the stockholder has the right to inspect the books of the corporation at a proper time, for proper purposes, is not disputed; and, as we have heretofore stated in this opinion, it is a principle of law long ago recognized in this state. In some states this right is governed by statutes; in others, such as our own, it is recognized as a common-law right. Whether this application is for a "proper purpose," within the legal and proper contemplation of that term, is the new and heretofore undecided question in the courts of this state. The nearest case decided in our courts to the one we are now considering is that of State ex rel. de Julvecourt v. Pan American Co. 5 Penn. (Del.) 395, 61 Atl. 400, in which the court said: "It seemed to us that upon the face of the record the relator had made out a case that entitled him to the issuance of the peremptory writ; his declared purpose being, among other things, to ascertain the value of the stock of the company of which he was such a large holder, to learn whether the defendant company in fact owned or controlled the valuable asphalt properties it claimed to own, whether the stock issued had ever actually been paid for or not, and whether the various representations made to the petitioner by the president of the company, and by reason of which the relator was induced to part with his property, were true or false."

One of the declared purposes in that case was "to ascertain the value of the stock of the company of which he was such a large holder." It is true there were other "purposes" alleged in that case, and how much influence they had on the court we do not know; but it is certain that the most important, if not the controlling, purpose alleged, was to ascertain the value of his stock.

In the case of Neubert v. Armstrong Water Co. 211 Pa. 592, 61 Atl. 123, decided by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1905, the court said: "In the opinion of the learned court below, refusing a new trial, it is stated: 'The testimony on the trial, shows, inter alia, that James D. Stocker, Charles H. Welles, and William Walker, in 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

June, 1902, bought about six sevenths of the stock of the Armstrong Water Company, and that the remaining one seventh of said stock was held and owned by the plaintiffs; that Stocker, Welles, and Walker were endeavoring to purchase the plaintiffs' stock, and had made them an offer of $70 per share for the same; that the plaintiffs declined to sell until they were afforded an opportunity to examine the books and papers of the company for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the value of their stock; that there had been no statements issued by the defendant company regarding its financial condition, or other information furnished the plaintiffs, whereby they could determine the value of their stock; and that an inspection of the books and papers of the company was necessary for this purpose.' Certainly, under these facts, which we must accept as established, the plaintiffs have shown a definite and proper purpose which justified a demand for an inspection of the books and papers of the corporation, which, when refused, can be compelled by mandamus."

In the case of Garcin v. Trenton Rubber Mfg. Co. 60 Atl. 1098, decided by the supreme court of New Jersey in 1905, where the relator could not get from the company any definite information as to the assets and liabilities of the corporation, the court said: "In September, 1904, the relator applied to the president in writing for permission to examine the books of the company, and this was refused. The relator states that he desires to dispose of his stock, and has offered to sell it to the present holders of the stock of the company, but without success, and he seeks the information which he now desires, to ascertain its value in order to enable him to offer it for sale. This application appears to be made in good faith, and for the purpose of obtaining information to which the relator seems to be entitled."

The court then cited the case of Bruning v. Hoboken Printing & Pub. Co. 67 N. J. L. 119, 50 Atl. 906.

One of the latest cases on this point is that of Varney v. Baker, 194 Mass. 239, 80 N. E. 524, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 989, decided in 1907. The court in its opinion said: "The single justice who heard the case found that the petitioner honestly believes that the company is being mismanaged, and desires in good faith, for the protection of his interest in the corporation, to examine the books and records of the company for the purpose of ascertaining its condition and the value of its stock, and of determining what to do with his stock, and whether there has been mismanagement of the corporation, and if so, what effect it has had upon the assets and business of the corporation, in order that he may be enabled to bring a bill in equity for the appointment of a receiver, or to take other proper proceedings for the benefit of the corporation and of his interest therein. . . . It was not proved to the satisfaction of the justice that there was any mismanagement in fact, or any incapacity on the part of the managing officers. . . .

"The stockholders of a corporation are the equitable owners of its assets, and the officers act in a fiduciary relation as agents of the corporation and of the stockholders. They should be ready to account to the stockholders for their doings at all reasonable times, and the stockholders have a right to inspect their records and accounts, and to ascertain whether they are faithful, honest, and intelligent in the performance of their duties. There is no good reason why the stockholders, acting in good faith for the purpose of advancing the interest of the corporation and protecting their rights as owners, should not be permitted to examine the corporate property, including the books and accounts. . . .

"According to the general rule in this country, it is not necessary that there should be any particular dispute to entitle the stockholder to exercise this right. Nothing more is required than that, acting in good faith for the protection of the interests of the corporation and his own interests, he desires to ascertain the condition of the company's business. . . .

"Of course, the right at common law is not absolute, so that it can be exercised for mere curiosity, or for merely speculative purposes, or vexatiously. . . . There is nothing in our statutes which enlarges or diminishes this right as it exists at common law."

A question very similar to the one we are now considering has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. It was the case of Guthrie v. Harkness, 199 U. S. 148, 50 L. ed. 130, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 4, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 433, being on error to the supreme court of the state of Utah, in which Mr. Justice Day, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "There can be no question that the decisive weight of American authority recognizes the common-law right of the shareholder, for proper purposes and under reasonable regulations as to place and time, to inspect the books of the corporation of which he is a member. . . . In many of the states this right has been recognized in statutes which are generally held to be merely in affirmance of the common law. . . .

"It is suggested in argument that if the shareholder has this right, it may be abused, in that he may make an improper use of the knowledge thus gained. There is nothing in this record, however, to suggest, by way of argument or testimony, that the shareholder desired the information which the books would give for other than a lawful purpose. On the other hand, there is a distinct finding that the inspection was desired for the purpose of ascertaining the true financial condition of the bank, and for the purpose of enabling the complainant to find out the value of his stock, and whether its business was being conducted according to law. There is no suggestion that the complainant was acting in bad faith or from improper motives, or that he was seeking in any way to misuse the information which the books would afford him. We need not hold that there may not be circumstances which would justify the courts in withholding relief to a stockholder seeking an examination of the books and accounts of the bank. In the case before use no reason is shown for denying to the stockholder the right to know how his agents are conducting the affairs of a concern of which he is part owner. Many legal rights may be the subjects of abuse, but cannot be denied for that reason. A director, who has the right to an examination of the books, may abuse the confidence reposed in him. Certainly this possibility will not be held to justify a denial of legal right, if such right exists in the shareholder."

The justice in his opinion quotes from the case of Huyler v. Cragin Cattle Co. 40 N. J. Eq. 392, 2 Atl. 274, as follows: "Stockholders are entitled to inspect the books of the company for proper purposes at proper times. . . . And they are entitled to such inspection, though their only object is to ascertain whether their affairs have been properly conducted by the directors or managers. Such a right is necessary to their protection. To say they have the right, but that it can be enforced only when they have ascertained in some way, without the books, that their affairs have been mismanaged, or that their interests are in danger, is practically to deny the right in the majority of cases. Oftentimes frauds are discoverable only by examination of the books by an expert accountant. The books are not the private property of the directors or managers, but are the records of their transactions as trustees for the stockholders."

We have quoted very fully from these opinions in well-considered and recently decided cases. Many more could be cited on the general proposition, but we have only referred to those that we consider throw some light upon the particular question before use. No authorities are cited upon this point by the defendant, except the case of Bevier v. United States Wood Preserving Co. (N. J. L.) 69 Atl. 1008, in which the following language was used by the court: "An examination of their testimony leads us to believe that the applicant does not desire the examination of the books of account, papers, and documents of the defendant corporation in good faith, but rather for the purpose of aiding a competitor." Of course, in any case where the court comes to such a conclusion as this, the plaintiff is not entitled to examine the books of the corporation.

In the case before us, counsel for the defendant in their brief filed based their contention largely upon the fact, as they contend, that the plaintiff is not acting in good faith. This is a suggestion of counsel, however, and not a part of the record. This plaintiff alleges that he does not want to examine the books for speculative purposes, out of idle curiosity, or for any improper purpose. Not a single one of these allegations is denied by the defendant. The only suggestion made by the defendant that even intimates that the purpose is an improper one is that the plaintiff is a brother-in-law of a person engaged in a like business, but even this is not made a part of the return, and therefore is no part of the record. The defendant in its return does use this language: "That the concerted action of several stockholders of this company, applying at practically the same time to obtain information regarding its affairs, convinces the management of the defendant company that it is most desirable to prevent any information concerning its internal management, financial or other affairs, and business, from being obtained by persons who may communicate it to others whose hostility to the defendant company might cause them to take advantage of such information to injure this company and bring loss upon it."

But this language is too uncertain and argumentative to have any value in pleading, and we cannot assume that it denies, or intends to deny, any of the material allegations in the alternative writ. The plaintiff is the owner of stock, the par value of which is $68,000, which was not acquired by him for speculative purposes; indeed, it is stock which he did not buy at all, but which he was compelled to take for his own protection. There is no market for the stock, and he has requested the directors to give him such information concerning its financial condition as would enable him to tell its value. They have refused to do this, or permit him to examine the books for that purpose. It would seem upon principle, as well as authority, that the plaintiff is entitled to such information. We cannot assume that he wants it for an improper purpose, when everything in the record shows the contrary; nor can the right be denied him because he might use it in a way that would injure the defendant. The business of the defendant is a part of his business, and it is not to be assumed that he would do a thing which would be an injury to his own affairs.

We might say that we have announced no new doctrine in this opinion. That a stockholder is not entitled to inspect the books of a corporation for speculative purposes, idle curiosity, or any improper purpose, is a principle in nowise affected by what we have here said.

In the case of Bruning v. Hoboken Printing & Pub. Co. 67 N. J. L. 119, 50 Atl. 906, the court said: "The rule of the common law as to the right of inspection by stockholders of the book of a trading company exists here, and such right may be enforced by this court by mandamus. . . .

"The right is not to be given to gratify curiosity or for speculative purposes, but only when its exercise is sought in good faith and for a specific purpose. Such purpose must appear by the proofs on the application, or the writ will be denied. . . .

"The allowance of the writ is within the discretion of the court, upon the facts presented in each particular case.

"In the application now before the court, there is no evidence indicating the purpose of the relator in seeking the right to inspect the cashbook and other books of the company, and in that condition of the proof the writ must be denied."

As was said in that case, the allowance of the writ is within the discretion of the court, upon the facts presented in each particular case. But from the facts presented to us in this particular case, we are satisfied that the plaintiff's purpose is a proper one, and that he is entitled to at least certain of the information which he seeks.

It follows, therefore, that the return of the defendant is insufficient, in that it fails to show either a compliance with all the mandates of the alternative writ, or a legal excuse for not complying therewith. The return is good, however, and, until proven false, is an absolute bar to some of the demands made by the plaintiff. Is there any good reason, therefore, for quashing the whole of a return in mandamus, when part of it is good, and makes a complete answer to a part of the alternative writ, for the only reason that it is not a sufficient answer in all respects? This question was not argued before us, and we have not been able to find much help in the text-books or the reported decisions. There is a decision in our own state, however, in which it was said it was within the discretion of the court to quash a part of a return, and to allow the rest to remain. It is the case of McCoy v. State, decided in the court of errors and appeals in 1897, and reported in 2 Marv. (Del.) 543, 36 Atl. 81. In that case the court reviews the general principles and rules of pleading and practice prevailing in cases of mandamus, and stated inter alia that "it is generally competent for the respondent to set forth in his return several distinct and separate defenses, at his option, and if he prevails in either of them, the peremptory writ will be refused. But if they be inconsistent or repugnant, the court may quash the entire return; yet it is within the discretion of the court to quash such portion of the return as it may deem insufficient, and to allow the rest to remain."

This same principle is laid down in High's Extraordinary Legal Remedies at § 463. In the case of R. v. Cambridge, 2 T. R. 456, the court said: "The court may undoubtedly quash the whole return if they choose; then it follows that we may quash a part of it if we think it right."

In jurisdictions such as our own, where the ancient practice prevails of ascertaining the facts from the petition and return, this rule would seem to be the safe and better one. In this case the plaintiff seeks to inspect the books of the defendant for the purpose of ascertaining whether a certain amount of stock was properly and legally issued, whether unlawful contracts had been entered into, and, lastly, to ascertain the value of his stock. The defendant in its return denies that the stock was improperly or unlawfully issued, and also denies that it has entered into unlawful contracts. These denials form a complete and sufficient answer to this much of the alternative writ. But according to our view, the defendant's return is not sufficient as to the other point, namely, the plaintiff's right to examine the books to ascertain the value of his stock. Is there any good reason, therefore, why the court should not hold the return sufficient as to the first two purposes mentioned, and insufficient as to the last one? We think not. If, as an illustration, the defendant had submitted certain books for examination, as commanded in the alternative writ, but refused to submit others on the ground that the plaintiff had no legal right to see them, and, upon motion to quash the return, the court concluded that the defendant was bound to submit those which he had refused to submit, it would seem absurd to say that a peremptory writ should not be confined to those things which the defendant had refused to do.

This brings us to the consideration of the practice relative to the peremptory writ. It has been decided in some jurisdictions that the peremptory writ must follow in exact terms the alternative writ. This in many instances is in obedience to a statute. But practically all the text-writers agree, and the great weight of the modern decisions is, that a demand on the part of the relator for excessive relief does not preclude the granting of the relief to which the relator is entitled under the facts stated. We think it hardly necessary to cite authorities, or discuss this point. See, however, People ex rel. Central P. R. Co. v. San Francisco, 27 Cal. 655; Highway Comrs. v. Jackson, 165 Ill. 17, 45 N. E. 1000; Satterwhite v. State, 142 Ind. 1, 40 N. E. 654, 1087.

We are of opinion that the court below erred in finding the defendant's return wholly sufficient, and in refusing to quash that portion of it which disclosed on the defendant's part a noncompliance with the mandate of the alternative writ to suffer and permit the relator to inspect its books for the purpose of ascertaining the value of his stock, and which, in the alternative, presented no sufficient reason or excuse for failing so to do. Therefore, in this respect and to this extent we reverse the action of the court below, and hold that, in invoking the right to inspect and make copies of the books, papers, accounts, etc., of the corporation of which he is a stockholder, the relator has shown that he seeks the information that would thereby be disclosed to him for a proper purpose, and is therefore entitled to the peremptory writ of mandamus of the court to which this case is remanded, to be issued by that court under such reasonable regulations as to time and place as it may direct, commanding the defendant to suffer and permit the relator, or his duly constituted attorney, to inspect and make copies of such of the books, papers, accounts, and writings of the defendant mentioned in his petition, and only of such of them that, under the direction of the said court, are found essential and sufficient to furnish the information whereby the relator may determine the value of the stock.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

CLYDE L. WILLIAMSON, Appt.,
v.

MABEL WILLIAMSON.

(34 App. D. C. 536.)

Marriage — annulment — misrepresentation of disposition.

Misrepresentation by one of the parties as to disposition is not such fraud as will justify an annulment of a marriage contract.

(March 1, 1910.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Supreme Court dismissing a bill filed to annul a marriage on the ground of fraud. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Clayton E. Emlg, for appellant:

A fraudulent concealment or misrepresen-

Note. — Misrepresentation as to disposition or general character as ground for annulment of marriage.

It was said in 2 Kent, Com. 77, that it was well understood that error and even disingenuous representations in respect to the qualities of one of the contracting parties, as his condition, rank, fortune, manners, and character, are insufficient to destroy a marriage, and render the contract void.

So, in Schouler, on Domestic Relations, § 23, it was said: "As to fraud, in order to vitiate a marriage, it should go to the very essence of the contract. . . . Fraudulent misrepresentations of one party as to birth, social position, fortune, good health, and temperament cannot, therefore, vitiate the contract. Caveat emptor is the harsh, but necessary, maxim of the law."

As was said in 1 Bishop on Marriage & Divorce, 5th ed. § 167: "In that contract of marriage which forms the gateway to the status of marriage, the parties take each other for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, to cherish each other in sickness and in health; consequently, a mistake, whether resulting from accident, or, indeed, generally from fraudulent practices in respect to the character, fortune, health, or the like, does not render void what is done. To this conclusion the authorities all conduct us, but different modes of stating the reason for it have been adopted. Thus, the qualities just mentioned are sometimes said to be accidental, not going to the essentials of the relation; and Lord Stowell, after remarking that error about the family or fortune of an individual, though produced by disingenuous representations, does not affect the validity of the marriage, adds: 'A man who means to act upon such representations should verify them by his own inquiries. The law presumes that he uses due caution in a matter in which his happiness for life is so materially involved, that it makes no provision for the relief of a blind credulity, however it may have been produced.'"

Keyes v. Keyes, 6 Misc. 355, 26 N. Y. Supp. 910; Bishop, Marr. & Div. § 404; Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 102; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 3 Allen, 605; Morris v. Morris, Wright (Ohio) 630; Ritter v. Ritter, 5 Blackf. 81; Carris v. Carris, 24 N. J. Eq. 516; Sissung v. Sissung, 65 Mich. 172, 31 N. W. 770; Wharton v. Lewis, 1 Car. & P. 529; Stewart, Marr. & Div. p. 28, § 38; Bierer's Appeal, 92 Pa. 265; 20 Cyc. Law. & Proc. p. 34; Picard v. McCormick, 11 Mich. 68.

Fraud or falsehood going to the essentials or fundamentals of the marriage relation will deprive the contract of that intelligent consent necessary to its validity, and hence will render the marriage voidable at the instance of the injured party.

Orchardson v. Cofield, 171 Ill. 14, 40 L.R.A. 256, 63 Am. St. Rep. 211, 49 N. E. 197; Keyes v. Keyes, 22 N. H. 553; Keyes v.

ness for life is so materially involved, that it makes no provision for the relief of a blind credulity, however it may have been produced."

A case very similar to WILLIAMSON v. WILLIAMSON is Beckley v. Beckley, 115 Ill. App. 27, where it was held that misrepresentations by a woman to one who had gotten her name through a matrimonial bureau, that she was of good character, a lady, belonging to the Methodist church, and a teacher and worker in the Sunday school, were insufficient to avoid the marriage induced thereby.

That concealment or deception by one of the parties in respect to traits or defects of character, habits, temper, and the like, is not sufficient ground for avoiding the marriage, is also recognized in Lewis v. Lewis, 44 Minn. 124, 9 L.R.A. 505, 20 Am. St. Rep. 559, 46 N. W. 323; Klein v. Wolfsohn, 1 Abb. N. C. 134; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1184

And see Reynolds v. Reynolds, 3 Allen, 605, sufficiently set out in the WILLIAMSON CASE.

In Wier v. Still, 31 Iowa, 107, it was held that representations by a man to a widow that he was of good character and good standing in society, and that he had many respectable relations and connections, when in fact it was found afterwards that he was a convict of the penitentiary, and had served several terms, did not constitute such fraud as to avoid a marriage induced thereby.

However, in Keyes v. Keyes, 6 Misc. 355, 26 N. Y. Supp. 910, it was held that, under a statute providing that a marriage may be annulled when the consent of one of the parties was obtained by force, duress, or fraud, misrepresentations by one that he was an honest and industrious man, when in fact he was a professional thief whose picture was in the rogue's gallery, af-

Keyes, 6 Misc. 355, 26 N. Y. Supp. 910; Tomppert v. Tomppert, 13 Bush, 326, 26 Am. Rep. 197; Smith v. Smith, 171 Mass. 404, 41 L.R.A. 800, 68 Am. St. Rep. 440, 50 N. E. 933; Harrison v. Harrison, 94 Mich. 559, 34 Am. St. Rep. 364, 54 N. W. 275.

Mr. Charles A. Barnard, for appellee:

Persons who act on representations or belief in regard to character, health, fortune, or temper should bear the consequences which flow from contracts into which they have voluntarily entered, since after they have been executed, the law affords no relief for the results of a blind credulity, however it may have been produced.

Ewing v. Wheatley, 2 Hagg. Consist. Rep. 183; Wakefield v. Mackay, 1 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 137, note; 1 Fraser, Dom. Rel. 230; Bishop, Marr. & Div. §§ 100, 101.

Fraud which vitiates the marriage contract is cause for its annulment. But the fraud or falsehood must be one which goes to the very fundamentals or essentials of the marital relation,—deceit, concealment, or misrepresentation concerning the party's health, character, wealth, social position, previous history or habits, is not sufficient for this purpose.

Van Orsdel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by appellant, Clyde L. Williamson, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against his wife, Mabel Williamson, for the annulment of the marriage contract on the ground of fraud. It appears that appellant became acquainted with appellee through a correspondence started by appellant's answering an advertisement in a paper issued by a matrimonial bureau, wherein it was represented that appellee desired the acquaintance of a young man matrimonially inclined. The correspondence from the start appears to have been conducted with remarkable ardor and activity, since, according to the record, about one hundred letters passed between April and November, 1906. As a sequel to this romantic adventure, an engagement followed, and appellant urged appellee to come to Washington to marry him, accompanying the request with the sum of $21. Appellee failed to appear at the appointed time, but wrote to appellant explaining her delay. It is alleged she gave as an excuse "that she had used part of forfeited sufficient ground to enable his wife, who had been induced thereby to marry him, to obtain a decree of annulment, especially where it appeared that since the marriage he was again under state surveillance in its penitentiary. In this case it was especially recognized that if the misrepresentations had been as to the defendant's social position, rank, fortune, manners, or the like, they would have furnished no ground for declaring the marriage void. The court continued: "Fabrications and exaggerations of this kind, while not commendable, are so common as to be tolerated by the law on grounds of public policy. Persons intending to act upon such representations must verify them at their peril, for, though they enter into the inducements to marriage, they are not considered as going to the essentials of the relations, on the theory that the parties take each other for better or worse. Indeed, in some cases, marriage likens itself to the veritable mouse trap, which is 'easier to get in than out.'"

So, in King v. Brewer, 8 Misc. 587, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1114, under the same statute as in the Keyes Case, a young wife was granted a decree of annulment of the marriage because her husband had concealed from her that, previous to the marriage, he had run a pool room, which was an offense punishable both by imprisonment and fine. In this case it appeared that since the marriage the husband had been arrested for 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) obtaining money under false pretenses, and had been into trouble for running a Pontiac bank. The court also took cognizance of the fact that, as in the Keyes Case, there would be no children to suffer by reason of the annulment of the marriage.

A case of interest in this note, although not strictly in point, is Kraus v. Kraus, 6 Ohio N. P. 248, where it was held that the concealment by a woman before marriage of the fact that she wore a glass eye is not such a fraud as will annul the marriage. The court said: "If a glass eye purposely concealed before marriage be fraudulent representation and a ground for divorce, why are not false teeth, false hair, or any other false article peculiar to the fair sex also a ground for divorce?"

For cases on antenuptial pregnancy or unchastity as a ground of divorce or annulment of marriage, see note to Franke v. Franke, 18 L.R.A. 375.

The cases dealing with misrepresentations or concealment as to one's physical or mental condition as ground for annulment of marriage are gathered in a note to Lyon v. Lyon, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 996.

A note to Sims v. Sims, 40 L.R.A. 737, discusses the general question of marriage of persons when insane, and, of course, contains a discussion of annulment of marriage for antenuptial insanity when concealed by misrepresentations or fraud from the innocent spouse.

said fund to assist her sister in a runaway from her father's house." Appellant, doubtless regarded this incident as conclusive proof of appellee's qualifications to become a loving and affectionate wife, and especially suited to preside over a peaceable and happy home, forwarded the further sum of $20, accompanying it with an urgent appeal for haste. This time she came. On the day of her arrival they were married. This was the first meeting of the parties. Appellee insisted that the ceremony be deferred until they could have an opportunity of becoming better acquainted, but appellant, regarding the suggestion as a most unreasonable one, was insistent upon an immediate union, and in two hours from the arrival of appellee, the parson in the meantime having been engaged, the ceremony was performed. Notwithstanding these precautions, appellant claims that he soon discovered his mistake, and he is now seeking the aid of the courts to relieve him from what he seems to regard as a bad bargain. His sole complaint is based upon what he denominates the "unbearable disposition" of appellee. It appears from his story that she does not possess that mild temper and amiable disposition which he expected to find in a helpmate selected from the bargain counter of a matrimonial bureau. He even goes so far as to claim that in some of her letters she falsely and fraudulently represented that she was possessed of a most amiable and lovable disposition, stating in his petition "that the defendant represented herself, among other things, to possess a most congenial and loving disposition, desiring the society of a loving husband, and to preside over a happy home; that her disposition was of a loving nature, her aim to make her companion for life a loving, useful helpmate." In this unbiased expression of opinion upon a subject with which it cannot be assumed that appellee was wholly unfamiliar, appellant insists she was mistaken, and herein consists the fraud upon which this court is asked to declare a marriage contract void. Other minor details, such as the illness of appellee shortly after their marriage, and the customary misunderstanding with her mother-in-law, are incidentally referred to, but the contract is assailed chiefly upon the above ground of fraud.

It is well settled that mere misrepresentations as to social position, rank, fortune, manners, and disposition furnished no ground for declaring a marriage contract void. Misrepresentations of this kind are tolerated on the ground of public policy. The rule which has been adopted generally by the courts and text writers was well stated by Chief Justice Bigelow in Reynolds 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Reynolds, 3 Allen, 605, as follows: "In the absence of force or duress, and where there is no mistake as to the identity of the person, any error or misapprehension as to personal traits or attributes, or concerning the position or circumstances in life of a party, is deemed wholly immaterial, and furnishes no good cause for divorce. Therefore, no misconception as to the character, fortune, health, or temper, however brought about, will support an allegation of fraud on which a dissolution of a marriage contract, when once executed, can be obtained in a court of justice. These are accidental qualities which do not constitute the essential and material elements on which the marriage relation rests. . . . The law therefore wisely requires that persons who act on representations or belief in regard to such matters should bear the consequences which flow from contracts into which they have voluntarily entered, after they have been executed, and affords no relief for the results of 'a blind credulity, however it may have been produced.'"

In the present case there is no claim of the concealment of any material fact that would, in law, vitiate a marriage contract. In fact, the evidence tends strongly to disprove the specific allegation upon which the charge of fraud is based. We find no reason for an abrupt termination of this romantic venture.

The decree of the court below dismissing the bill is affirmed, with costs, and it is so ordered.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ELIZABETH GRAVES et al., Pliffs. in Error,

v.

JAMES ROSE et al.

(246 Ill. 76, 92 N. E. 601.)

Evidence — explaining will — supplying description.

1. Parol evidence is admissible to supply the township, county, range, and state in case a devise of lands is described merely as parts of certain sections.

Same — transferring description.

2. Proof that testator did not own the land described in his will as certain subdivisions of a section will not make admissible parol evidence to transfer the description to the land he did own, by changing the letters used to indicate such subdivisions.

(Dunn, Carter, and Cooke, JJ., dissent.)

Note. — See note to Lomax v. Lomax, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 942, on correction of misdescription of land in will.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Will County to review a decree in defendants' favor in a suit to partition certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. M. Fahey for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Barr, Barr, & Barr, for defendants in error James Rose et al.:

A mistake in the description of the realty devised will never render the devise void, if the description used in the will, as applied to the facts and circumstances existing at the time of making the will, will identify the land devised. The law allows a court interpreting a will the same light which the testator enjoyed.

Woman's Union Missionary Soc. v. Mead, 131 Ill. 338, 23 N. E. 603; Wigram, Wills, p. 56.

The omission of township, county, and state from the description will not invalidate the devise, as it is but an incomplete description, and extrinsic evidence will be received to complete it.

Flynn v. Holman, 119 Iowa, 731, 94 N. W. 447.

Whenever it appears that the description of the land devised is incomplete or in part false, extrinsic evidence will be heard for the purpose of showing exactly what real estate the testator owned, and if he owned any land, the description of which corresponds in part to the description in the will, the court will reject the incorrect part of the description, and will pass the realty by its correct description.

Collins v. Capps, 235 Ill. 560, 126 Am. St. Rep. 232, 85 N. E. 934.

However many errors there may be in a description, either of a devisee or the subject of a devise, the devise will not be avoided if enough remains, after rejecting the errors, to show with certainty what was intended, when considered from the position of the testator.

Gano v. Gano, 239 Ill. 539, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 450, 88 N. E. 146.

Mr. C. W. Brown for defendant in error Harriet S. Kriegh.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error, Elizabeth Graves and William H. Rose, with Harriet S. Kriegh, three of the heirs at law of Joseph Rose, deceased, filed their bill in the circuit court of Will county for partition of the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 9 and the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 12, in township 33 N., range 11 E. of the third principal meridian, in said county, against the defendants in error, James Rose, Charles Rose, Mary J. MacKender, and Robert Henry Rose (who was called Robert Rose Holmes), the other heirs 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) at law of said Joseph Rose, deceased, alleging that said Joseph Rose died intestate as to said lands, and that the same had descended to his heirs at law. The administrator with the will annexed was also made a defendant to the bill. The defendants James Rose, Charles Rose, and Mary J. MacKender by their answers admitted that said Joseph Rose was the owner of the lands sought to be partitioned at the time of his death, but alleged: That he intended to devise the same to them by his last will and testament, but in said last will and testament misdescribed the same. That the said will contained the following devises: "I give, devise, and bequeath to my son Charles Rose all of west $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 12, and to my daughter Mary J. MacKender east $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ section twelve and to my son James Rose all of the east half of the northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ of section nine (9)." That the testator did not own the lands described in the will, and intended to devise the lands which he actually owned. That the letter "W" in "N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ " in the devises to Charles Rose and Mary J. MacKender was used by mistake instead of the letter "E," and the word "north" in the description "northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ " in the devise to James Rose was used by mistake instead of the word "south." The answers alleged that the defendants were severally in possession of the tracts of land intended to be devised to them, respectively, under promises of the testator to convey the same to them, and each defendant prayed for a specific performance of the promise alleged by the said defendant. They also filed cross bills, alleging the same facts, and praying for specific performance of the alleged promises. The chancellor sustained exceptions to the prayers of the answers for relief, and sustained demurrers to the cross bills, but granted leave to amend the cross bills. The defendants did not avail themselves of the leave so given, and no amendment was made. The cause was heard upon the original bill, answers, and replications, and evidence, oral and documentary, heard by the chancellor, and it was proved that the testator did not own the lands described in the will, but did own the lands sought to be partitioned. A decree was entered finding that both of the letters "N" and "W" contained in the devises to Charles Rose and Mary J. MacKender should be stricken out as surplusage, and that the word "northwest" contained in the devise to James Rose should also be stricken out, and that said letters and words were incorrect and false. It was ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the will devised in fee simple to Charles Rose the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 12, township 33 N., range 11 E.

of the third principal meridian; to Mary J. MacKender the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 12; and to James Rose the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 9, in said township 33, in Will county, and partition of the premises was denied. The record has been brought into this court as a return to a writ of error.

Our statute requires all last wills and testaments to be in writing and properly witnessed, and extrinsic evidence is never admissible to alter, detract from, or add to the terms of a will. While the object of construction is to ascertain the intention of the testator, it must be an intention expressed in the will, and it must be determined from the language used. A will cannot be reformed to conform to any intention of the testator not expressed in it, no matter how clearly a different intention may be proved by evidence of extrinsic facts. If that were not so, all wills would be subject to proof of mistake and of a different intention from that expressed, so that, in fact, property would pass without a will in writing which the law declares shall not pass except by a written will. In Starkweather v. American Bible Soc. 72 Ill. 50, 22 Am. Rep. 133, it was said: "The courts are so strict that they will not permit the terms of a will to be altered even when the deviser has by mistake misdescribed land in a devise, by substituting that which could be clearly proved to have been intended;" and in Bishop v. Morgan, 82 Ill. 351, 25 Am. Rep. 327, it was held that a mistake in description could not be corrected by extrinsic evidence, and that reference to the number of acres could not control the plain words of a will. The rule has been clearly stated in numerous decisions. Kurtz v. Hibner, 55 Ill. 514, 8 Am. Rep. 665; Bingel v. Volz, 142 Ill. 214, 16 L.R.A. 321, 34 Am. St. Rep. 64, 31 N. E. 13; Williams v. Williams, 189 Ill. 500, 59 N. E. 966; Vestal v. Garrett, 197 Ill. 398, 64 N. E. 345.

The testator described the lands devised as certain parts of sections 9 and 12, without township, county, range, or state, and the chancellor permitted these matters of description to be supplied by extrinsic evidence. There was no error in this, for the reason that parol evidence is admissible in explanation of a latent ambiguity, which is an ambiguity that arises where the writing upon its face appears clear and unambiguous, but the meaning is rendered uncertain by extrinsic evidence, and where the uncertainty is created by such evidence, it may be removed in like manner. This is not regarded as a violation of the rule that a writing shall not be contradicted or explained by oral evidence. A common instance of a latent ambiguity is such as appears in this case, where there are descriptions which are not ambiguous, but which may be applied to two different subjects. Illustrations have been given of a devise of the testator's manor of Dale, and at his death it is found that he has two manors of that name,—South Dale and North Dale; and upon proof of that fact it may be shown which one is intended; or where a deed purports to convey Black acre, and it is shown that there are two tracts of land bearing that name. 3 Phillips, Ev. 750. A latent ambiguity raised in that way can be explained by any evidence which shows the actual subject of the devise or conveyance. That principle was stated in Dougherty v. Purdy, 18 Ill. 206, where there was a conveyance of an undivided half of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 1, in township 1 N., in range 1 W., in the state of Illinois, and the deed did not show whether the land was east or west of the fourth or any other meridian. The court, by merely looking at the deed, could not say that it did not describe the premises accurately, but by looking outside of the deed, at the acts of Congress and the public surveys, it was found that there were meridians in such surveys, and more than one lot of land to which the description would apply. It was decided that the latent ambiguity raised by such knowledge could be explained by evidence. One familiar with government surveys might naturally say that a description of land without township, county, range, or state would be void as describing nothing, but as a rule of law it is immaterial whether the extrinsic facts are such as must be proved by testimony, or are so generally known that the court will take judicial notice of them, which is only a question of the method of ascertaining the facts. The same doctrine was applied in Clark v. Powers, 45 Ill. 283, where a deed described a tract as the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 14, in Liberty township, 1 west of the fourth principal meridian, in the county of Mercer. There was no township called Liberty in Mercer county, and there were three sections No. 14 in range 1 west. The ambiguity was shown by the evidence of these facts, and it was held susceptible of explanation by showing which one of the several pieces the grantor claimed. In Billings v. Kankakee Coal Co. 67 Ill. 489, a tax deed did not show in what county, state, or east of what meridian, the lands lay. It was held that the deed was not void for uncertainty, there being several meridians to which the description could equally apply, and that the ambiguity, being latent, could be explained by evidence of facts and circumstances. In Halli- day v. Hess, 147 Ill. 588, 35 N. E. 380, a deed described land as being in section 8, but did not give any township. There were several sections numbered 8 in the county to which the description might apply, and it was considered proper to explain the latent ambiguity by parol. Here it was proved that Joseph Rose, the testator, owned lands in sections 9 and 12, in township 33 N., range 11 E. of the third principal meridian, in Will county, which was a proper explanation of the ambiguity concerning the location of those sections. That rule, by which a latent ambiguity raised by extrinsic evidence may be removed by the same kind of evidence, has no application, in principle or by authority, to a description which is free from ambiguity, and can only apply to one certain and definite thing, and therefore it does not apply to the definite and certain descriptions contained in the will in this case. There is neither doubt, uncertainty, insufficiency, or ambiguity in the descriptions of the subdivisions of sections 12 and 9, contained in the will, and neither of them could be applied to more than one subject of a devise.

There is another condition which has frequently arisen in the construction of wills where the description of the property intended to be devised is true in part, but not true in every particular, and it is not a violation of the rule that a will cannot be reformed or a mistake in description corrected to reject that part of the description which is shown to be false. When that is done, the devise will be held valid if enough remains to identify the subject of the devise in accordance with facts and circumstances existing when the will was made, but the rule that nothing can be added to the description is inflexible, and forbids the insertion of anything else in place of that stricken out. In all of the decisions it has been emphatically declared that no word or words can be supplied. In Kurtz v. Hibner, supra, the testator devised two tracts of land in Will county,—one in section 32 and the other in section 31. It was held that the words of description being unambiguous and the thing devised certain and specific, no extrinsic evidence was admissible to show that the testator intended to devise different lands, and that to make the change insisted upon would be to make a new and different will. In Bingel v. Volz, supra, the testator devised to his daughter, 70 acres off of the south side of the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 16, which he did not own, but he did own the S. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the same section. It was insisted that the intention was to devise the south 70 acres of the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$

$\frac{1}{4}$, and such was the fact; but the court said that, if a portion of the description were rejected, what was left would not correctly describe the land intended, and that the change involved more than construction and required reformation. In Williams v. Williams, supra, there was a devise of "40 acres of land, the same being the northeast 40 of section 22." The testator did not own any land in the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 22, nor any tract of 40 acres which could be located by striking out a part of the description, but he did own three tracts aggregating about 41 acres, one of which was situated in the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the other two in the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of that section. If the word "northeast" should be stricken out, there was no 40-acre tract owned by the testator, and it would be necessary to put three descriptions together to give effect to the intent of the testator, which it was held could not be done. The court said to permit evidence the effect of which would be to take from the will plain and unambiguous language, and insert other language in lieu thereof, would violate the established rule of law. In Lomax v. Lomax, 218 Ill. 629, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 942, 75 N. E. 1076, the testator owned land in section 14, but did not own the southwest fractional quarter of section 24, which he devised. It was held that parol evidence could not be admitted to show a mistake in the section; that the language described a tract of land capable of being readily identified; and that, if the word and figures "section 24" or the figures "24" were rejected, nothing would remain to indicate in what section the land was located, and it would be necessary to import something into the will by substituting the figures "14."

There is another class of cases where the court has given effect to the intention of the testator by striking out words of false description, where it was not considered necessary to substitute anything or to add to the language of the will. In the case of Decker v. Decker, 121 Ill. 341, 12 N. E. 750, there was a devise of 20 acres off the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33. The testator never owned the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, but did own the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$. The court struck out the words "of the northeast quarter" where they occurred the first time, as being false, leaving the description "20 acres of the northeast quarter." The land was then described by quantity and its location as being in the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, and the evidence showed that the testator owned only 20 acres in that quarter, which was identified as the land devised. The court said there was nothing added to the terms of the will; that courts are without the power of substituting for the written words of the testator other and different words not used by him; and that the only effect of the decision was to make the devise effective of the 20 acres which the testator owned.

Where the subject of a devise is described by quantity, it may be identified by extrinsic proof, and there have been several other cases of that kind where the property could not otherwise have been identified without adding to the will. In Whitcomb v. Rodman, 156 Ill. 116, 28 L.R.A. 149, 47 Am. St. Rep. 181, 40 N. E. 553, the devise was of 100 acres of land to the testator's son Joseph—60 acres off of the west side of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 22, and 40 acres being the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section. The testator did not own the 40 acres as described, but did own a 40-acre tract known as the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the same section. The court said that, while words could not be added to a will, so much as was false in the description might be stricken out if enough remained to identify the land. The court therefore struck out the words "northwest" and "southeast," which left 40 acres, it being a quarter of a quarter of section 22, and the testator owned two 40-acre tracts in the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$. He also devised to his son Edward 40 acres, in which there was a like false description, and it was treated in the same way. The circuit court had held that the two 40-acre tracts were devised severally to the sons, but this court said that the two sons took the two tracts undivided, since the separate 40's could not be identified without adding to the will, but the error did not affect the plaintiffs in error. The court was enabled to do that on account of the designation of the lands by quantity. In Huffman v. Young, 170 Ill. 290, 49 N. E. 570, there was a devise, by quantity, of 62 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres off of the east side of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 20. The testator owned 62 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres in the quarter section, but not off of the east side. A devise of 62 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres in a certain government subdivision is sufficient by identifying the portion intended, and the court struck out the words "off of the east side." As the quantity of land was mentioned, the remaining description was sufficiently definite without any addition. In Felkel v. O'Brien, 231 Ill. 329, 83 N. E. 170, the testator devised to his widow a life estate in the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 27, containing 80 acres, more or less. He did not own the whole of the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, but did own the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the quarter section. The court said that the purpose of the testator being to devise land "containing 80 acres," the devise would be given effect by striking out the word "north." In Collins v. Capps, 235 Ill. 560, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

126 Am. St. Rep. 232, 85 N. E. 934, the devise was of the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 10, containing about 76 acres. The court held that by striking out the word "west," which was false, there remained a devise of the half of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, and, as the testator only owned in the quarter section 76 acres and the description applied to it, the devise was valid. In Gano v. Gano, 239 Ill. 539, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 450, 88 N. E. 146, certain words were stricken out of the devise, and it was thought that sufficient then remained to identify the property intended to be devised, and the decision was in accordance with that conclusion.

In some cases there has been a designation of the subject of the devise which was sufficient in itself, but followed by a misdescription which could be rejected and leave a valid devise. Emmert v. Hays, 89 Ill. 11, is an example, where the property devised was described as "being what is known as the Hays farm," but misdescribed as to the section. The added description was rejected as surplusage and the correct description allowed to stand. Also in Morrall v. Morrall, 236 Ill. 640, 86 N. E. 578, there was a devise of "the homestead," followed by an imperfect description, which was rejected. Inasmuch as the devise of the homestead would have been good, it was considered proper to determine the correct description of it. Whatever difference of opinion may have existed in any of these cases related to the application of the rule forbidding reformation of a will, and not to the rule itself, which the court always asserted.

In this case the devisees, who were defendants, by their answers alleged mistakes of the testator, and proposed that the letter "W" after the letter "N." in the first two devises, and the word "north" before the word "west" in the third devise should be stricken out. If that had been done and nothing substituted, there would have remained no description of the lands which they alleged the testator intended to devise to them, respectively. Evidence that the testator did not own the lands devised did not tend to show a latent ambiguity or affect the accuracy of the certain and definite description of the will, which described lands in existence. It only tended to show mistakes of the testator in making the will, and a mistake is not a latent ambiguity. The mistakes, inaccuracies, or deficiencies of a will cannot be corrected by extrinsic evidence, and parol evidence cannot be adduced either to add to, contradict, or explain the contents of a will. "No principle connected with the law of wills is more firmly established or more familiar in its application than this." 1 Jarman, Wills, 6th ed. 412. The chancellor by the decree struck out the letters "N. W." in the first two devises, and the word "northwest" in the third devise, and, when that had been done, there was no remaining description of any tract of land, by number of acres or otherwise. To complete either description so as to definitely describe lands owned by the testator and which it was alleged he intended to devise, it became necessary not only to strike out letters and words, but to insert others in their places, and this the chancellor did. Not only were the letters "N. W." in the first two devises struck out, but the letters "N. E." were inserted in their place, and, when the word "northwest" was struck out in the third devise, the word "southwest" was inserted in lieu thereof, which were the same changes, in effect, as were proposed by the answers. This was nothing but reformation for the purpose of correcting mistakes of the testator, and making the will correspond with his intention, based on the fact that he did not own the lands devised. That such a change in a deed, contract, or instrument other than a will, to make it conform to the intention of the maker, would be a reformation, has never been questioned, and we do not see how it can be called anything different in case of a will. The changes made to correct mistakes of the testator in describing his lands had the effect to make lands pass to the devisees without a will in writing, which the law says can only pass by a will in writing, executed and witnessed in the manner prescribed by the statute.

The decree is reversed and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed,

Dunn, Carter, and Cooke, JJ., dissent:

The decree directed to be entered defeats the manifest intention of the testator, takes from his children whom he intended to benefit the provision intended for them, and awards the greater part of it to others.

The opinion ignores the application of rules of testamentary construction made in numerous decisions of this court in the most recent cases. It concedes what, of course, cannot be reasonably disputed—that the ambiguity arising from the description of the subjects of the devises by section numbers alone, without indicating the township, range, county, or state, may be explained by extrinsic evidence, and that it is explained by evidence that the testator owned the farm lands described in the bill, and no other. This conclusion is reached by the application of the presumption that the testator intended by his will to dispose of his own property, and that he did not attempt to dispose of property which he did not own. Though the only words descriptive of the location of the property were "section 12" and "section 9," and those words were entirely indefinite, because applicable to a very large number of tracts, yet by reason of the presumption just mentioned there was inherent in the description the idea of ownership by the testator. Since the tracts described in the bill were the only tracts possessing that attribute of ownership, the will necessarily referred to them. The devise includes two particulars of description, viz., ownership by the testator and section number. When the tract is ascertained to which, alone, these two particulars attach, the devise acts upon that tract.

The question of the location of the tracts within the section is somewhat different. The testator owned a quarter of section 12 and a half of a quarter of section 9. Had he devised "the east half of the quarter of section 12, the west half of the quarter of section 12, and the half quarter of section 9," probably no question could arise as to the sufficiency of the description, for the court, having ascertained, as the majority opinion does, what sections 12 and 9 were intended, by ascertaining in what sections 12 and 9 the testator owned land, could also ascertain what quarter of section 12 and what half quarter of section 9 were intended by ascertaining what quarter and half quarter of the respective sections the testator owned. Parol evidence is admissible of all the circumstances surrounding the testator, and the state and description of his property, for the purpose of applying the language used to the conditions existing, and a devise will not be avoided for any errors in the description of the devisee or the subject of the devise if enough remains, after rejecting the errors, to show with certainty what was intended when considered from the position of the testator. It is a recognized rule of construction of written instruments that a false particular in the description of the subject-matter shall not vitiate the instrument, and we have quoted and approved the rule laid down in Page on Wills (§ 819, p. 376), that, if the testator "owns any real estate which corresponds, in part, to the description in the will, the court will reject the incorrect part of the description, and will pass the realty conveyed by the correct description." Collins v. Capps, 235 Ill. 560, 126 Am. St. Rep. 232, 85 N. E. 934.

The principle has been applied in a great variety of cases. In Decker v. Decker, 121 Ill. 341, 12 N. E. 750, the will contained a devise of "20 acres off the west half of the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 33." The testator never owned the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the section, but did own the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$. There was no other evidence affecting this question, and the court construed the will by rejecting the words "of the northeast quarter" where they first occurred in the description as a false circumstance of the description, applied the description to the property actually owned by the testator, and held that the devise was of the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the testator's land in the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the section, which was situated in the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of that quarter section, instead of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, as stated in the will.

In Whitcomb v. Rodman, 156 Ill. 116, 28 L. R. A. 149, 47 Am. St. Rep. 181, 40 N. E. 553, there was a controversy over two devises, one of 40 acres, being the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 22, to the testator's son Joseph, the other of 40 acres, being the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the same section, to his son Edward. The testator owned no part of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and only the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, which tract was itself devised by another description. The testator owned the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 22, which was not described in the will, and no other 40-acre tract in section 22. The devises were construed by rejecting the words "northwest," "southwest," "northeast," and "southeast" as words of false description, and each devise was read as "40 acres, being the . . . quarter of the . . . quarter of section 22." The testator having two, and only two, tracts answering the description, it was held that he devised one of the tracts to each son, and that they took and held the tracts undivided. A like conclusion was arrived at in the very similar case of Moreland v. Brady, 8 Or. 303, 34 Am. Rep. 581, where two devises of lots 1 and 2 in block 187, which the testator did not own, were held to apply to lots 3 and 4 in block 187, which he did own; the numbers "1" and "2" being rejected as false description.

In Huffman v. Young, 170 Ill. 290, 49 N. E. 570, the devise was of 62 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres off of the east side of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 20. This was a definite and certain description of a particular tract of land, but the testator did not own it. He did, however, own 62 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres off the north end of the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 20, and no other lands in that quarter section. The words "off of the east side" were rejected as a false description, leaving "62 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres of the northeast quarter of section 20," which words alone described no land, but, in connection with the fact that the testator owned that precise quantity of land in the section, were held sufficiently definite to convey the land the testator owned.

In Vestal v. Garrett, 197 Ill. 398, 64 N. E. 345, a devise was made as follows: "Fifteen acres to David J. Garrett, 15 acres to Douglas Garrett, and 50 acres to Martha A. Vestal of the undivided southwest three fourths of the south half of the southwest quarter and the west half of the southeast quarter of section 33," etc. This description, in itself, is meaningless, and no lands can be located from it. The testator, however, owned the undivided one third of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and of the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33. The false words of description, "southwest three fourths of the," were rejected, and the devises held to convey 80 acres of the undivided S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33, being the quantity of land which the testator owned in said tracts.

In Douglas v. Bolinger, 228 Ill. 23, 119 Am. St. Rep. 409, 81 N. E. 787, the devise was of the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 12, one half of which the testator did not own, and it was held to pass the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ which he did own, and which was the only part of the quarter section he did own. In Felkel v. O'Brien, 231 Ill. 329, 83 N. E. 170, a devise of the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 27, which the testator did not own, was held to pass the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, which he did own. In Collins v. Capps, 235 Ill. 560, 126 Am. St. Rep. 232, 85 N. E. 934, a devise of the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the section was held to pass the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$. In Gano v. Gano, 239 Ill. 539, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 450, 88 N. E. 146, the devise was of "the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter and the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 14," etc. The words "quarter of the northeast quarter" being stricken out, there remained "the southeast and the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 14," which tracts the testator owned, and which were held to pass by the devise. So in Iowa a devise of the S. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ was held in Stewart v. Stewart, 96 Iowa, 620, 65 N. W. 976, to convey the S. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, and a devise of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ was held to pass the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ in Eckford v. Eckford, 91 Iowa, 54, 26 L.R.A. 370, 58 N. W. 1093. In Ohio the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ was held to convey the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ in Merrick v. Merrick, 37 Ohio St. 126, 41 Am. Rep. 493. In Pate v. Bushong, 161 Ind. 533, 63 L.R.A. 593, 100 Am. St. Rep. 287, 69 N. E. 291, a devise of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 29 was held to convey the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 28, and a devise of the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ to convey the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$.

In Vestal v. Garrett it is stated that, "if the words of the testator as to the donee and subject of the gift are unambiguous, such words cannot be varied by evidence of extraneous facts, however clearly a different intention may appear;" and Kurtz v. Hibner, 55 Ill. 514, 8 Am. Rep. 665; Bishop v. Morgan, 82 Ill. 351, 25 Am. Rep. 327, Bingel v. Volz, 142 Ill. 214, 16 L.R.A. 321, 34 Am. St. Rep. 64, 31 N. E. 13, and Williams v. Williams, 189 Ill. 500, 59 N. E. 966, are cited in support of that proposition. In those cases, as well as in Lomax v. Lomax, 218 Ill. 629, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 942, 75 N. E. 1076, this rule was applied, but in each of the cases cited supra (Decker v. Decker, Whitcomb v. Rodman, Huffman v. Young, Douglas v. Bolinger, Felkel v. O'Brien, Collins v. Capps, and Gano v. Gano), as well as in the cases cited from other states, the words of the testator as to the subject of the devise were unambiguous, yet evidence of the state and description of the testator's property was received in each case for the purpose of identifying the subject of the devise by enabling the court to read the language of the will from the position of the testator. The cases in which the rule contained in the language quoted from Vestal v. Garrett, supra, has been disregarded by this court are more numerous than those in which it has been followed, and in that case the cases of Decker v. Decker; Whitcomb v. Rodman; and Huffman v. Young,—supra, in which that rule was disregarded, are cited and not disapproved. It is stated in Vestal v. Garrett that when "there is a latent ambiguity in the description of the object or subject of the gift, and such ambiguity can be removed by rejecting false words, leaving a complete, intelligible description, it is the duty of courts to do so, as where there are two descriptions, one good and the other bad; the authorities are uniform to the effect that the latter may be rejected." It is only by an application of the presumption that the testator intended to dispose of property which he owned that the court was enabled to apply the unambiguous words descriptive of the subject-matter of the respective devises contained in the seven cases above cited from the decisions of this court, and in numerous cases in other courts, to the property actually intended to be disposed of. It is by the application of that presumption that the court, in the majority opinion, ascertains the section intended by the ambiguous description in the will, not by adding to the terms of the will, but by placing itself in the situation of the testator. The presumption mentioned prevails, and is given effect in that opinion. It must prevail in every case of construction of a will. The existence of such legal presumption necessarily gives rise to a latent ambiguity in every case where the testator does not own the property described in the devise. In such case there are always at least two circumstances descriptive of the thing; viz., ownership by the testator and location or other descriptive fact mentioned in the devise. The fact that the two do not agree can only be made to appear by extrinsic evidence. The ambiguity is therefore latent, and may be removed by extrinsic evidence. "It is settled doctrine that as a latent ambiguity is only disclosed by extrinsic evidence, it may be removed by extrinsic evidence. Such an ambiguity may arise upon a will either when it names a person as the object of a gift or a thing as the subject of it and there are two persons or things that answer such name or description; or, secondly, it may arise when the will contains a misdescription of the object or subject, as where there is no such person or thing in existence, or, if in existence, the person is not the one intended, or the thing does not belong to the testator. The first kind of ambiguity, when there are two persons or things equally answering the description, may be removed by any evidence that will have that effect,—either circumstances, or declarations of the testator. 1 Jarman, Wills, 370; Hawkins, Wills, 9, 10. Where it consists of a misdescription, as before stated, if the misdescription can be struck out and enough remain in the will to identify the person or thing, the court will deal with it in that way; or, if it is an obvious mistake, will read it as if corrected." Patch v. White, 117 U. S. 210, 29 L. ed. 860, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617, 710.

The cases in which the rule has been applied by this court, not only in equity, but also at law, and not only in cases of wills, but also of deeds, that a false particular in the description of the subject-matter shall not vitiate the instrument, are of great frequency. Among them are Miller v. Beeler, 25 Ill. 163, Myers v. Ladd, 26 Ill. 415, Swift v. Lee, 65 Ill. 336, Emmert v. Hays, 89 Ill. 11, as well as cases cited in the principal opinion.

The devises are: To Charles, "all of west $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 12;" to Mary J. MacKender, "east $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 12;" to James, "all of the east half of the north-west $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 9." These devises must all be held to refer to property which the testator owned. If the letters "N. W.," which constitute the false description, are stricken out of the first two devises, and the word "northwest" out of the third, they will read, "all of the west half of $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 12," all of east half of $\frac{1}{4}$ of section "12," and "all of east half of $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 9." The testator owned " $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 12," and only one. He owned "east half of $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 9," and only one. When he devised property that he owned, using that language, no doubt can exist as to his intention or his expression of it. Effect should be given to the intention so expressed. If the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ is held to convey the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, as in Douglas v. Bolinger, supra, why should not the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ be held here, under precisely similar circumstances, to convey the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$? Why, under exactly the same conditions, should the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ be held in Felkel v. O'Brien, supra, to convey the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, but the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ be not held here to convey the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$? And if the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ is construed in Collins v. Capps, supra, as conveying the N. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, what is the reason that the same rule of construction does not apply here, and require the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ to be construed as conveying the E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$? There can be no certainty in the law unless the same rule is applied to the same facts, under the same circumstances.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN HENDRICKSON, Appt.,
v.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(137 Ky. 562, 126 S. W. 117.)

Master — act of servant — authority — employing minor.

1. The act of a conductor in employing a minor as brakeman on a train without the consent of his father is, as between the railroad company and the father, the act of the railroad company, although the train has a full complement of hands without the minor, so that his employment is not necessary, and no express authority has been given the conductor to make the contract.

Parent — injury to child — right to recover.

2. A father may recover damages for injury to his minor son because of his employment without his knowledge as brakeman by a railroad company which knows of his minority, and the fact that the son assumes the risk of his employment, so that 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) he could not recover for his own injury, is immaterial.

(March 11, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bell County dismissing an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to plaintiff's son alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. V. Riley, for appellant:

Knowingly permitting and directing the plaintiff's minor son to ride on the train as one of the crew, and to render hazardous service, was a wrongful interference with the right of the father to control his son.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Willis, 83 Ky. 58, 4 Am. St. Rep. 124; Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Carroll, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 374, 31 S. W. 132.

Mr. W. T. Davis also for appellant.

Messrs. Benjamin D. Warfield, Charles W. Metcalfe, and J. W. Alcorn for appellee.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John Hendrickson brought this suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railway

Note. — Right of parent to recover for injury to minor servant employed without his consent.

This note is confined to cases where a minor servant, while in the employment of the defendant without his parent's consent, is injured under such circumstances that the minor himself would have no cause of action against the defendant; as where the defendant was not negligent, or where, if he had been negligent, there would be a good defense thereto, such as the minor's contributory negligence or assumption of risk.

Where the action is brought under a statute giving an action for the death of a person in cases only where the deceased, if living, could have recovered for the injury, this question could not, of course, arise.

In many cases the absence of the parent's consent is mentioned where the right of recovery is predicated for reasons which are independent of this element. Cases of this kind have not been included in this note.

It is a general rule that an employer putting a minor servant, without his parent's consent, to do work by which the child is injured, commits an actionable wrong, which will authorize the parent to recover for whatever loss of services may result from the injury.

In such a case the employer is liable although there was no negligence upon his part.

Marbury Lumber Co. v. Westbrook, 121 Ala. 179, 25 So. 914; Woodward Iron Co. v.

Company. He alleged in his petition that he has a son, James E. Hendrickson, who is under twenty-one years of age; that the servants of the defendant in charge of one of its trains, knowing that his son was not of age, allowed and directed his son to render services on the train as a brakeman; that the service was hazardous, and that all this was done without his knowledge or consent; that while his son was acting in the capacity of a brakeman on the train, he was thrown from the train and injured; that by reason of his injury, his son had been confined to his bed, requiring constant care, nursing, and medical attention; that he had thus been put to great care and expense in taking care of his son, to the amount of $754, and had lost the services of his son, which were reasonably of the value of $250. The defendant filed an answer, the first paragraph of which was a traverse of the allegations of the petition. The second paragraph was in these words: "For further defense it alleges that there was a full complement of men in charge of the train, and there was no necessity for the employment or acceptance of the services or rendition of the service of the plaintiff's said son; that the conductor in charge of the train had no right or authority from this defendant to allow or suffer or permit or employ or accept the service of the plaintiff's said son, to get aboard said train or ride therein at the time or times mentioned in the petition, or at any time. Wherefore, defendant

Trimble, 8 Ind. App. 333, 35 N. E. 716; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Redeker, 67 Tex. 190, 60 Am. Rep. 20, 2 S. W. 527, second appeal, 75 Tex. 310, 16 Am. St. Rep. 887, 12 S. W. 855; Taylor v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 41 W. Va. 704, 24 S. E. 631.

So the doctrine of assumption of risk will not prevent a recovery.

Braswell v. Garfield Cotton Oil Mill Co. supra; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Willis, 83 Ky. 57, 4 Am. St. Rep. 124; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Brick, 83 Tex. 526, 29 Am. St. Rep. 675, 18 S. W. 947.

Nor is the minor servant's contributory negligence a defense to such an action.

And the fellow-servant doctrine is not applicable.

Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Showers, 71 Ind. 451; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Brick, supra; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hervey (Tex. Civ. App.) 89 S. W. 1095.

Thus in Marbury Lumber Co. v. Westbrook, supra, the court said: "The gravamen of the action obviously is the alleged wrong of the defendant in putting the plaintiff's minor son to work at a dangerous place or upon dangerous work without her consent. This is the charge; and it manifestly involves no issue of negligence."

So, if one knowingly hire a minor, and require him to perform dangerous service in opposition to the parent's will, he will be liable to the parent if injury befall such minor while engaged in such service. In such a case it is not a question of negligence that gives rise to the liability, but the wrong consists in opposing the will of the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

parent. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Trimble, supra.

And where the defendant's agent received and used a minor, knowing from his appearance that he was under age, it was an exercise of dominion and illegal control over him at war with the father's rights. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Willis, supra.

Even in a case where the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, would bar the minor himself from recovering, the defense under the maxim cannot be set up against the father, for the reason that his consent to the risk had not been given. Braswell v. Garfield Cotton Oil Mill Co. supra.

And as a contract of the employment with a minor was made without the consent of the father, and the latter is a stranger to it, he is not bound by it, so as to be held to take the risk directly incident to the employment, or that which may result from the negligence of the fellow servants. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Brick, supra.

A father is entitled to recover for any loss resulting from injuries to his minor servant employed without his consent, without reference to the question whether the son has contributed to such injury or not. Ibid.

And in Soldanels v. Missouri P. R. Co. 23 Mo. App. 516, the court said: "In such action I much question whether the want of due care and judgment on the part of the minor, such as would preclude him from recovering for the personal injury, should apply against the parent."

The contributory negligence of a slave is not a defense to an action by the master for injuries to him, against one who had set the slave at work without the master's consent. Louis v. McAfee, 32 Ga. 469.

Where the gist of the complaint is that a railroad company knowingly hired the minor son of the plaintiff against the latter's will, it is not error to deny the defendant a new trial merely because the defense may show that the injury to the minor resulted from the negligence of a fellow servant. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Showers, 71 Ind. 451.

prays to be hence dismissed with its costs." The plaintiff demurred to the second paragraph of the answer. His demurrer was overruled. The plaintiff stood by his demurrer, and, his petition having been dismissed, he appeals.

It is insisted for the defendant that the petition is insufficient, that the court should have carried the demurrer back to the petition, and that, therefore, the plaintiff cannot complain that the demurrer to the answer was overruled. It is said that the petition does not sufficiently charge that the conductor of the train knew that the son was not of age; but, if there was any defect in the petition on this subject, it was cured by the first paragraph of the defendant's answer. The averments of the petition are sufficient to show that the conductor had the son on the train acting as a brakeman. Whether or not the defendant is liable if the conductor had no authority to employ additional help when he had a full complement of men, and there was no emergency calling for the employment of others, is a question raised by the demurrer to the answer. These matters were set out in the answer, and, if they constituted a defense to the action, the demurrer to it was properly overruled. The defendant relies on the case of Clarke v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 33 Ky. L. Rep. 797, 111 S. W. 344. That was a suit by Clarke himself for his own injury, where he had been hurt on a train while assisting the train crew by their direction; and it was

In Pecos & N. T. R. Co. v. Blasengame, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 66, 93 S. W. 187, it was said that in an action of this character, the charge was subject to the criticism that it authorized a recovery irrespective of the child's contributory negligence, but there may be some question whether the court considered that it was dealing squarely with a situation in which the minor servant was employed without the consent of the parent, as the decision did not turn upon this point.

The only case which states the contrary view of the question is Williams v. Southern R. Co. 121 N. C. 512, 28 S. E. 367, in which the court held that, as the loss of the services caused by the injury of the child employed without the parent's consent was caused by an injury which was not the fault of the defendant, it could not be held liable for such loss. The opinion is very short, and there is no further discussion of the question.

Where the contrary is not averred, it will be presumed that the parent expressly or impliedly assented to the employment. Woodward Iron Co. v. Cook, 124 Ala. 349, 27 So. 455; Reaves v. Anniston Knitting Mills, 154 Ala. 565, 45 So. 702.

It is not necessary that the minor should have been employed for wages when the injury was received, in order that the father may recover; it is sufficient if he was then rendering service for the defendant by the request or direction of the defendant or its general agent. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Willis, supra.

In most of the cases there is no distinction made between an employment without the consent of the parent, and employment against the will of the parent. But in Tolledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Trimble, 8 Ind. App. 333, 35 N. E. 716, the court said: "There is a difference between the want of consent and active opposition to the parent's will. In the last instance, the injury proximately results from opposing the parent's will, while in the other instance the employment itself may not be wrongful, and if injury befall the minor, it cannot be said that the injury proximately results from the employment. . . . The want of consent may give rise to the presumption that the employment was against the will of the parent, but such presumption is not conclusive, nor is it an ultimate fact upon which the right of recovery rests. Something more must concur to make the employer liable."

Consent to employment at one kind of work, and minor placed at more dangerous work.

The consent of the parent that the minor be employed at one kind of work is not consent that he be placed at another and more dangerous work.

Thus, a consent to carry "stacker sticks" in a sawmill is not necessarily a consent to work on the log carrier. Marbury Lumber Co. v. Westbrook, 121 Ala. 179, 25 So. 914.

So, consent to employment in the work of shoveling sand in a pipe manufacturing plant is not consent to employment in the work of wheeling sand around the works. Dimmick Pipe Works v. Wood, 139 Ala. 282, 35 So. 885.

And consent to employment in sacking cotton seeds in a cotton oil mill is not consent to employment in oiling machinery. Braswell v. Garfield Cotton Oil Mill Co. 7 Ga. App. 167, 66 S. E. 539.

So, the fact that a parent was willing that her son should perform the duties of "doffer" boy did not authorize the defendant to change his employment, and put him to work without her consent at a more dangerous machine. Hillsboro Cotton Mills v. King (Tex. Civ. App.) 112 S. W. 132.

The case of one who engages from a parent a minor child for the purpose of a particular service is so similar in basal consideration to the case of one who hires a slave, a horse, a chattel, or any other thing of value from another for one purpose, and then employs it for another, as to make the general principle applicable in the familiar class of cases last mentioned, likewise applicable to the case of the father, when injury has resulted to him from the fact that the son's services were diverted from what the original intention of the contracting held that he had voluntarily assumed the service, and that he could not recover unless there was negligence on the part of the train crew. But this action is not brought by the son. It is brought by the father to recover for the injury done to him by the crippling of his son when his son was used as a brakeman on the train, without his knowledge or consent, and with the knowledge on the part of the conductor that he was under twenty-one years of age. The court in Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Finnell, 108 Ky. 135, 57 L.R.A. 266, 55 S. W. 902, and Thornton v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 854, 70 S. W. 53, decided as in the Clarke Case, these cases being suits by the infant to recover for his own injury. But in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Willis, 83 Ky. 57, 4 Am. St. Rep. 124, which was a suit by the father to recover for the wrongful interference with his infant son, a recovery was allowed. The court stating the basis of the ruling said: "The conductor knew from his appearance that he was under age, and he received and used him. This was an exercise of dominion and illegal control over him by the general agent of the appellant at war with the father's rights. The appellant cannot shelter under the claim that it did not know that the appellee objected to the son rendering the service, since it was its duty to know that the appellee was willing to it before it took control of him. The duty of the father to educate and maintain the son entitled the former to the son's services, and placed him in the attitude of a master to him, or created the relation of master and servant; and any interference with the master's right to control the servant by another renders the latter liable at least for any injury that was likely to result from such illegal conduct." It is true that in that case there was only one brakeman on the train, but the opinion was not rested on this fact in any way. It was rested on the broader ground that there had been a wrongful interference with the father's rights. The same rule was applied in Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Carroll, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 374, 31 S. W. 132. These decisions follow the common-law rule, which has long been recognized. See 29 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp.

parties was that they should be Braswell v. Garfield Cotton Oil Mill Co. supra.

Acquiescence of parent.

Although the parent may not at first know or consent to the employment of the child, if he thereafter, with knowledge of the fact, acquiesces in such employment, he will be barred from recovering for any injury to the child merely because of the employment.

Warrior Mfg. Co. v. Jones, 155 Ala. 379, 46 So. 456; Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. v. Crotwell, 156 Ala. 304, 47 So. 64; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davis, 32 Ky L. Rep. 308, 105 S. W. 455.

Thus, in Warrior Mfg. Co. v. Jones, supra, the court said: "Where the doing of a thing is continuous in its nature, as, for instance, under an employment of a minor for continuous work, it is immaterial that consent of the parent is wanting at the commencement, if such consent be subsequently given during the performance of the employment, and before any injury to the minor occurs."

Knowledge of the employer.

The action is not maintainable if the master is not aware that the servant is in fact a minor.

Illinois C. R. Co. v. Henon, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 298, 68 S. W. 456; Cutting v. Seabury, 1 Sprague, 522, Fed. Cas. No. 3,521.

Where the father sues for damages resulting to him from the employment of his son in a dangerous business without his consent, the rule seems to be clearly established that he must aver and prove that the defendant knew of the minority. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Co. v. Redeker, 67 Tex. 190, 60 Am. Rep. 20, 2 S. W. 527.

But, the defendant cannot shelter itself under the claim that it did not know that the parent objected to the son's rendering the service, since it was its duty to know that the parent was willing. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Willis, 83 Ky. 57, 4 Am. St. Rep. 124.

Consent of mother to employment.

After the father's death, it is unlawful to employ a minor without the consent of the mother. Union News Co. v. Morrow, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 302, 46 S. W. 6.

In the following cases, it was apparently assumed that after the death of the father, the mother's consent must be obtained, for the action was instituted by the mother, and no question was raised as to her right to maintain such an action: Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. v. Crotwell; Marbury Lumber Co. v. Westbrook; and Pecos & N. T. R. Co. v. Blasengame,—supra.

But if the plaintiff is a married woman, she cannot sue for injuries to her minor child employed without her consent, without joining her husband with her. Hillsboro Cotton Mills v. King, supra.

If the parents are living together, the mother's consent alone will not relieve the employer of the minor from liability to the father for employing the son in a dangerous employment. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Redeker, 75 Tex. 310, 16 Am. St. Rep. 887, 12 S. W. 855.

Of course, the general question under what circumstances a mother may bring an action for injuries to the child is not within the scope of this note. W. M. G.

1637, 1638, and cases cited. The conductor is the managing agent in charge of the train. While thus in charge of the train and having authority to control it, his act in taking and using the plaintiff's son upon the train, as between the plaintiff and the railway company, was the act of the railway company. The service of brakeman is peculiarly hazardous. The knowledge on the part of the conductor that the son was on the train and rendering service as brakeman was the knowledge of the defendant. The defendant could not, with knowledge of the father's rights, thus expose the son knowingly to the dangers of such a hazardous business without his consent. While the son took the risk of the work in which he voluntarily engaged, the father, who did not consent to it, was not affected by this. The conductor, knowing he was acting as brakeman and was an infant, knew there was an interference with the father's rights, for the business was intrinsically hazardous; and when, with this knowledge, he kept him in the dangerous business, the case is essentially the same as it would be if, seeing the boy setting a brake and knowing the danger of his undertaking the work, he had signaled the engine to back up for the coupling, as in the Carrol Case. When the managing agent of the defendant wrongfully takes charge of the servant of another, and, knowing his danger, permits him to be hurt, it cannot escape liability to the master, because under its rules its agent was without authority to hire more men when he had a full crew. The parent's rights do not depend on whether the conductor had a full crew or not. They rest on the ground that the conductor, who had charge of the train, knew of the wrong to the father's rights and the danger in which the son was placed, and that his knowledge was the knowledge of the defendant.

The plaintiff need not show that the conductor knew that he objected to his son rendering the service. It is sufficient if it was done without the plaintiff's consent. He must show that the conductor knew the son was under twenty-one years of age. But this he may show by circumstantial evidence or by direct evidence, as knowledge of a fact may ordinarily be shown by proof of facts sufficient to put a man of ordinary prudence on notice of it. Cutting v. Seabury, 1 Sprague, 522, Fed. Cas. No. 3,521; Butterfield v. Ashley, 6 Cush. 250; Butterfield v. Ashley, 2 Gray 254.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

BENEDETTO MORASCA, Appt.,
v.

ITEM COMPANY, Limited.

(126 La. 426, 52 So. 565.)

Libel — publication of police report — malice.

1. The publication by a newspaper of a report made by the police in the regular course of police administration, to the effect that persons had been poisoned by sugar purchased at the store of the plaintiff, will not of itself support an allegation of malice on the part of the defendant.

In order to support the allegation of malice, there must be evidence of an act showing a wanton inclination to mischief, an intention to injure or wrong, or a depraved inclination to disregard the rights of others.

Same — comment — actual damages.

2. Facts exciting public comment, regarding public health or safety, may be published by a newspaper; and comment, if made and published fairly and in good faith, is not a libel, and will not give rise to an action for punitive damages.

If deductions are made from the facts of a case, and published by a newspaper, it will be liable for damages only where actual damages are shown, when the publication was not inspired by malice.

Same — failure to show — effect.

3. Under the circumstances, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to show actual damages in order to recover, and he has failed to do so.

Note. — Reports of police officers as privileged communications.

The few reported cases upon this subject are not entirely harmonious.

Thus, in Billet v. Times-Democrat Pub. Co. 107 La. 751, 58 L.R.A. 62, 32 So. 17, it was held that reports made by police and detective officers to their superiors, and inscribed in books kept for that purpose, are not judicial proceedings, and no privilege protects their publication; nor does any privilege protect the publication of the opinions, suspicions, or deductions of such officers otherwise imparted, whether to their superiors or to other persons.

So, reports made by detectives are not privileged, under the law relating to the publication of judicial proceedings. Fullerton v. Berthiaume, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 6 C. S. 342.

A contrary view was taken in McClure v. Review Pub. Co. 38 Wash. 160, 80 Pac. 303, where it was held that articles in a newspaper containing no statement on the part of the newspaper as to whether or not

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. M. Miller and J. D. Miller, for appellant:

A report of a police officer to his superior officers furnishes no privilege for a newspaper in commenting and amplifying on the same, or printing anything beyond the fact that such a report had been filed. If such amplifications and comments are false and damaging, the publishers of the newspaper are responsible.

Cass v. New Orleans Times, 27 La. Ann. 214.

A newspaper is no more privileged to libel a citizen than is an individual.

Luzenberg v. O'Malley, 116 La. 699, 41 So. 41.

Slandorous words may be actionable, even though they do not consist of an unequivocal or positive assertion concerning another.

Covington v. Roberson, 111 La. 326, 35 So. 586.

One has no right to publish a libel of another, unless he knows it to be true; and if he acts on information or belief, he acts at his peril.

State v. Bienvenu, 36 La. Ann. 383.

Special proof of the pecuniary amount suffered was not necessary to support a recovery.

Tresca v. Maddox, 11 La. Ann. 206, 66 Am. Dec. 198.

Messrs. Saunders, Dufour, & Dufour and Henry Mooney, for appellee:

The police reports were privileged communications.

Breaux, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Benedetto Morasca was the owner of a grocery store in the city of New Orleans. He sued the defendant for $5,000 damages. Plaintiff charges the "New Orleans Item," a daily, with having published a false and libelous report which reflects upon him and his business, which has occasioned damages in the sum before stated.

The police authorities were investigating a case of reported poisoning of three persons. The newspaper stated at the time, in one of its columns, under the heading, in capital letters, that it was believed that the negroes had been poisoned from sugar contained in tea, for which they were under medical treatment. Their names were given in the printed report, which stated that the sugar was bought from a "grocery store at Sixth and Rampart." The negro child died.

The day following that publication just mentioned, the defendant published on the fourth page that the "Poison Was Being Investigated" (heading of the report), and the article stated that the coroner thought that the child died from tartar emetic poisoning; that the chemist had the examination of the stomach, kidneys, and liver in charge; and that he also had samples of the sugar and tea procured from the grocery store of Benedetto Morasca, where the occupants of the house who were poisoned made their purchase which was believed to have caused the child's death.

The article read: "It is the opinion of Coroner O'Hara that the child died from tartar emetic poisoning. He thinks that some of this substance, which is used in the composition of ant poison, may have accidentally gotten in the sugar at the grocery."

The first complaint of plaintiff is that his name was stated,—his grocery,—and that, in connection with the statement, the persons named were further referred to as "the poison patients," poisoned by sugar bought from his grocery; and the second complaint of plaintiff is that it was given as the opinion of the coroner that the sugar sold in plaintiff's store contained poison. The articles were pleaded in the words of the publication.

The defendant admitted the publication, denied malice, pleaded privilege, and althe plaintiff was guilty of the crime with which she was charged, but only purporting to be a statement of the acts and theories and representations of the officers of the law, were qualifiedly privileged, and in the absence of express malice are not actionable.

Of course, if the report of the police officer is published in the paper with the paper's own comments added thereto, in which the plaintiff is accused of the crime mentioned in the report, an entirely different question is presented, and cases of this kind are not included within this note.

As to privileged character of complaint by member of the public to public officers against subordinate, see note to Jozsa v. Moroney, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1041.

Upon the general subject of official report by executive or administrative officer as privileged communication, see note to De Arnaud v. Ainsworth, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 163.

leged the articles were printed as ordinary news taken from the public records, and were given no more prominence or space than is usually given to similar articles. The defendant offered the report of the police sergeant commanding the sixth precinct police,—a report made in accordance with the rule of the police department, and filed with the inspector.

In the report, the sergeant stated that he had instructed the patrolmen to investigate the suspicious cases of poison, and that he found a colored woman "named Sylvester Heims, aged seventy years, John B. Powell, Jr., aged two years and seven months, and Nathaniel Burns, aged sixteen, all colored, residing in the same house, apparently sick, and claiming that they were attended by Dr. Debofie and Dr. Dejole, who stated that the sickness was caused by the sugar put in the tea Saturday evening. The officer procured a sample of the sugar from the grocery of Benedetto Morasca, . . . where the sugar was bought by the sick family."

One of the doctors afterward informed the policemen that the patients had taken something that caused irritation of the stomach, causing them to throw up; that he had administered medicine; and that they were all doing well. The coroner the same day went to the house, made an investigation, and said that he could find no trace of poisoning; they were doing well; in his opinion they were ailing from a disease prevalent in the city at the time. At the autopsy held by the coroner and jury over the body of the dead child, they arrived at the conclusion that death was due to antimony et potassi tartaris.

The Item published three days after the casualty, that Benedetto Morasca denied that sugar purchased at his store can in any way be responsible for the death of the two-year old negro, and that paper stated that it was the opinion of Dr. O'Hara that the child died from tartar emetic poisoning, that proper examination by the city chemist was under way, and samples were taken from plaintiff's grocery to see whether any poison used for roaches, ants, or other vermin had by accident gotten into the grocery.

That plaintiff said: "The only sample taken from our store was some sugar. I have here the signed names of persons who bought sugar from the same barrel, and were not hurt by it. In fact, we never used any poisons about the store to kill vermin, and it is not possible that any of our groceries could contain injurious matters of any kind. To prevent ants from getting into the sugar barrel, we used nothing but a rag soaked in coal oil, tied on the outside at the bottom of the barrel." That the report did them an injustice and subjected them to loss.

Morasca, the plaintiff, is the owner of the grocery that is conducted by his daughter. He has very little to do with it, as he is a musician, and his time is taken up in teaching music. As a witness, he sought to prove the extent of his loss by the failure of those who had bought to continue in buying from him. Pressed to answer as to the extent of his loss, he was not at all exact in his answers, nor did he succeed in proving the extent of his loss.

Discussion and judgment: The result shows that the report that there was poison in plaintiff's barrel of sugar was entirely untrue. It originated among the negroes who had bought sugar from the grocery. They insisted—particularly the mother of the dead child—that the sugar she bought from the grocery was the cause of death. To such an extent this report spread that the police authorities very properly undertook to investigate and see for themselves if there was any truth in the report. It was during that time, and while proper report was forwarded to the central office, that the police reporter of the newspaper wrote the two articles—one on one day and the other on the next day—of which plaintiff earnestly complains.

As to malice, it is not charged eo nomine, although the charge may be inferred from the fact that plaintiff charged it was "false," "misleading," "libelous," and "defamatory in the highest degree, and calculated to injure plaintiff." All of which, to an extent, is true; but we have not found that there was express malice on the part of defendant as a fact. The publication does not appear in the light of a publication made with actual knowledge of the charge as false. We can only say that it is not sufficient to show actual malice.

"Legal malice" is defined as an act growing out of the "wicked or mischievous intention of the mind; an act showing a wanton inclination to mischief, an intention to injure or wrong, and a depraved inclination to disregard the rights of others." We are unable to say that such was the intention of the defendant, for in our opinion it was not. The most that can be said is that there was indifference. There was no negligence imputed to the plaintiff, nor the least wrong charged. There was no intimation that one person had attempted to poison others.

In the second publication, which followed the first in date, it was stated that the coroner thought that the child died from tartar emetic poisoning. "He (the paper stated) thinks that some of this substance, which is used in the composition of ant poison, may have accidentally gotten into the sugar at the grocery." Taking the whole statement, nothing was said that may not occur in nearly all groceries, without its being possible to attach the least blame to anyone.

The child died of poison; to that point the facts were correctly stated. It was not bought from plaintiff. He was not defamed, for his name was not connected with any wrongful act; besides, he was not in charge of the grocery. There was reason for inquiry and probable cause for some concern. It became proper for the police department to act as it did. The defendant, through its police reporter, took up the report and made it known, not by large and sensational headlines, as stated by plaintiff. It mentioned that there was an investigation on foot. It sought to set forth the facts. There does not appear to have been ill-will or malice on its part.

There was extravagant talk among the negroes, many of whom bought groceries at plaintiff's store. The mother of the dead child talked excessively, and altogether there were rumors that prompted an investigation. It does not seem that it went too far under the circumstances. Reference by the newspaper to the steps taken was not actionable. Whenever poison is mentioned as having been taken, it always attracts attention among all persons. It will be talked of and even published. If done, as in this case, to report the facts, there is no ground of action for punitive damages at any rate. In other words, the fact invites attention and excites comment, which, if fairly published or made in good faith, is not libel or slander. Furthermore, questions relating to life, health, and welfare may be commented upon, and, if erroneous deductions be made, it does not give cause for damages unless special damage can be shown; that is, when persons taking part in the inquiry are not prompted by malice. Newell, Defamation, 2d ed. p. 591.

As to an arrest, the following has the sanction of a well-considered opinion: While comments should not be made, the arrest of a person, and the charge against him, may be published. Tresca v. Maddox, 11 La. Ann. 208, 66 Am. Dec. 198. The defendant did not go further than sanctioned by the foregoing.

The case of Billet v. Times-Democrat Pub. Co. 107 La. 751, 58 L.R.A. 62, 32 So. 17, is not pertinent, as the publication in the case before us for decision—different from the cited case—did not assume that the plaintiff was guilty of the lesser offense 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or impropriety. Besides, the defendant in the cited case undertook to justify by proving the truth of the fact stated. In the present case there was no refusal to retract; on the contrary, without request, the defendant, within four or five days after the first publication, published an explanatory account relieving the plaintiff of blame.

The plaintiff, in support of his claim, confidently cites Cass v. New Orleans Times, 27 La. Ann. 215. The facts of the cited case are different; the charge constituting libel was untrue and defamatory. The affidavit made the basis of the report published by the Times was false and malicious. There was a direct attempt made to humiliate and degrade the plaintiff. Here, there is nothing of the kind.

The question of privilege vel non does not arise in the case at hand, as there was no libel committed at any time nor by anyone. In the other decisions cited, a libel had been published without the least necessity or the most remote justification. There is unquestionably no ground upon which to allow punitive damages. A claim for punitive damages finds no support in any of the authorities we have read. There is better ground, of course, upon which to claim actual damages. But as to these, the attempt of plaintiff to prove that he had suffered losses in his business has failed. The allegation in this respect is not sustained; the nature or the extent of the loss are not sufficiently evident to have a judgment thereon for damages. The testimony fixes no amount of loss.

For reasons stated, the judgment is affirmed.

BAUSCHER BROTHERS, Limited, Plff. in Err.

(190 Mich. 502, 125 N. W. 420.)

Statute of frauds — contract to decorate dishes.

A contract by a manufacturer of dishes to fill an order for a certain number, bearing the monogram of the purchaser, constitutes a contract for work and labor, not within the statute of frauds, where the value of the undecorated dish is a small part of the final cost, although compliance with the contract will result in a sale of the dishes.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment reversing an order of the commissioners, allowing a certain claim against the estate of Edward G. Gies, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Choate & Webster, for plaintiff in error:

Note.—Statute of frauds: distinction between sales of personality and agreements for work and labor.

This action is supplemental to the note appended to Flynn v. Dougherty, 14 L.R.A. 230, in which the earlier cases discussing this question will be found.

The variant rules on the subject are succinctly stated in Hientz v. Burkhard, 29 Or. 55, 31 L.R.A. 508, 54 Am. St. Rep. 777, 43 Pac. 860, as follows: "There appear to be substantially three distinct views upon the statute, which, for convenience, are generally designated as the English, the New York, and the Massachusetts rules, as represented by the decisions of their respective courts. In England, after a long series of cases in which various tests have been suggested, the rule seems to have been settled in Lee v. Griffin, 1 Best & S. 272, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 191, that 'if the contract be such that, when carried out, it would result in the sale of a chattel, the party cannot sue for work and labor; but if the result of the contract is that the party has done work and labor which ends in nothing that can become the subject of a sale, the party cannot sue for goods sold and delivered.' . . . In New York the rule prevails that a contract concerning personal property not existing in solido at the time of the contract, but which the vendor is to manufacture or put in condition for delivery, such as the woodwork for a wagon, or wheat not yet threshed, or nails to be made from iron belonging to the manufacturer, and the like, is not within the statute. . . . By the Massachusetts rule the test is not the existence or nonexistence of the commodity at the time of the contract, as in New York, or whether the contract will ultimately result in the transfer of title of a chattel from the vendor to the vendee, as in England, but whether the article is such as the manufacturer ordinarily produces in the course of business and for the trade, or as the result of a special order and for special purposes. If the former, it is regarded as a contract of sale, and within the statute; if the latter, it is 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A contract for the sale of articles which are to be manufactured specially for the purchaser, and upon his special order, and not for the general market, is not within the statute of frauds.

held to be essentially a contract for labor and material, and therefore not within the statute."

The court added that the Massachusetts rule is the one most widely adopted in the United States; that to the latter part of the rule, relating to goods made on special orders, there is little if any conflict in the American cases.

The majority of the St. Louis court of appeals in Burrell v. Highleyman, 33 Mo. App. 183 (Thompson, J., dissenting), after a thorough discussion of the subject, expressed their approval of the English rule as declared in Lee v. Griffin. The court, however, recognized that the contract actually before it could have been brought within the statute on much narrower grounds, as its subject-matter was certain articles of furniture already in existence, and requiring but an inconsiderable amount of finishing work.

The English rule was also, upon principle, at least, approved by the Missouri supreme court in Pratt v. Miller, 109 Mo. 78, 32 Am. St. Rep. 656, 18 S. W. 965, which commended the reasoning of the majority opinion in the Burrell Case. As in the latter case, however, the contract in the Pratt Case, even according to a much narrower criterion, fell within the statute; and the court said that within the general scope of the American authorities, the rule determinative of the case at hand might be formulated thus: "Where the contract is for articles coming under the general denomination of goods, wares, and merchandise, the vendor being at the same time a manufacturer and a dealer in them, as a merchant, or, so dealing, has them manufactured for his trade by others; and the vendee being also a merchant, dealing in and purchasing the same line of goods for his trade, of which fact the vendor is aware; the quantity required, the price being agreed upon, and the goods contracted for being of the same general line which the vendor manufactures or has manufactured for his general trade as a merchant, requiring the bestowal of no peculiar care or personal skill, or the use of material or a plan of construc-

Messrs. Graves, Hatch, & Wasey, for defendant in error:

The contract was within the statute of frauds, and an acceptance in writing by the claimant was necessary.

Lee v. Griffin, 1 Best & S. 272, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 191; Cooke v. Millard, 65 N. Y. 352, 22 Am. Rep. 619; 1 Mechem, Sales, § 326; Millar v. Fitzgibbons, 9 Daly, 505;

tion different from that obtaining in the ordinary production of such manufactured goods for the vendor's general stock in trade, the contract is one of sale, and within the statute of frauds, although the goods are not in solido at the time of the contract, but are to be thereafter made and delivered."

From the fact that the court took the pains to formulate this narrower rule, it might perhaps be inferred that it did not intend to commit itself finally to the English rule.

Upon the authority of that case, however, the court of appeals in Schmidt v. Rozier and Tower Grove Planing Mill Co. v. McCormack, infra, held that the English rule had been adopted in Missouri.

Special orders.

It is apparent that, either under the English rule or the Massachusetts rule, the case next cited was correctly decided, though a different result would be required by a strict adherence to the New York rule.

A contract whereby a manufacturer agrees to make and deliver, for the usual price, shoes habitually made by him in the ordinary course of his business, is one for the sale of goods. Yoe v. Newcomb, 33 Ind. App. 615, 71 N. E. 256. The court emphasized the point that there was nothing to indicate but that the goods, when manufactured, would be salable in the general market.

So, where a merchant orally orders shoes of a traveling salesman for future delivery, which are of a kind usually sold by the house, and the contract does not specifically provide for the manufacture thereof, it is a contract to sell, and not to manufacture. Williams-Hayward Shoe Co. v. Brooks, 9 Wyo. 424, 64 Pac. 342. The court refers with approval to the narrower rule stated in Pratt v. Miller, supra.

And a contract with manufacturers for a mechanical boiler-cleaning appliance, a patented article, designed to be attached to boilers for the purpose of cleaning them, is a sale within the statute of frauds. Me-30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

chanical Boiler Cleaner Co. v. Kellner, 62 N. J. L. 544, 43 Atl. 599. It is stated in the opinion that the attachment of the appliance to the boiler was comparatively inexpensive, and that it could readily be detached and set aside. The court said in effect that the thing contracted for was a patented article, in the manufacture of which the plaintiff was engaged, and that it must be inferred from the testimony that the appliances attached were either part of the stock of plaintiff, on hand at the time, or were to be manufactured by the plaintiff in the regular course of its business; and that the transaction was clearly a contract of sale within the English rule, and especially within the rule adopted in New Jersey, as deduced from Finney v. Appgar, 31 N. J. L. 266 and Pawelski v. Hargreaves, 47 N. J. L. 337, 54 Am. Rep. 162 (substantially the Massachusetts rule). The opinion contains an extended and valuable discussion of the conflicting rules.

In Smalley v. Hamblin, 170 Mass. 381, 49 N. E. 626, where the plaintiff, who was a dealer in, and not a manufacturer of, bottles, upon receiving an order from the defendant, ordered the bottles from a manufacturing company, according to models which had been made by that company two years before, under the direction of plaintiff, and submitted to defendant for approval, the transaction was held to amount to a sale within the statute of frauds, it not appearing that it was a part of the contract that the bottles should be manufactured by that particular company, although the kind of glass used was made only by it, and it did not appear that the company made bottles of that kind for anybody else, it not appearing but that it would have furnished the same to anyone who had ordered them.

In Schloss v. Josephs, 98 Minn. 442, 108 N. W. 474, the question whether an order for a specified number of suits of clothing to be made to order, according to material and style selected from samples and models exhibited by agents, sizes and prices being specified, was within the statute of frauds, was made to turn upon the question, which was held to have been properly submitted

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The claimant and plaintiff in error is a German corporation, engaged in the manufacture and importation of crockery and china ware. Edward G. Gies, whose estate it is sought to charge herein, in his lifetime conducted a saloon and restaurant in connection therewith in the city of Detroit. On June 8, 1907, one Albert Debicke, an agent for Bauscher Brothers, Limited, saw and obtained from Edward G. Gies, his written order for dishes bearing his signature. The order provided that the dishes were to be in Detroit on or before September 25, 1907. This written order was sent on to Bauscher Brothers, Limited, and the dishes were manufactured, and plaintiff in error claims according to the terms of the order. On July 18, 1907, Debicke addressed a registered letter to Edward G. Gies, asking for shipping instructions for the dishes in question. Mr. Gies died July 12, 1907.

to the jury, whether the order was for clothing such as is ordinarily made by manufacturers and wholesale houses, and purchased and dealt in by retail dealers, or whether it was for clothing of such peculiar pattern and material as would not, in the general course of trade, have been otherwise manufactured. The judgment in favor of plaintiff was upheld as against the objection based upon the statute of frauds, though reversed on a question of damages.

The decision in Helmert v. Nagel, 112 Mo. App. 202, 87 S. W. 61, that an order given to a manufacturer for certain kinds of shoes, to be manufactured according to samples exhibited by the salesmen, was a sale within the statute of frauds, might be accounted for by the narrower rule formulated in Pratt v. Miller, without invoking the broader English rule.

But the decisions in Schmidt v. Rozier, 121 Mo. App. 306, 98 S. W. 791, holding that an order to a merchant tailor for a coat and vest of a peculiar and unusual style was a contract of sale, and thus within the statute, was expressly referred to the English rule; and the same is true of Tower Grove Planing Mill Co. v. McCormack, 127 Mo. App. 349, 106 S. W. 113, holding that a contract for doors and windows to be manufactured according to certain plans and specifications was a contract of sale, and within the statute, notwithstanding that the doors and windows called for were peculiar in size and character, and could not be used in any other building.

The following contracts, which were held to be not contracts of sale, but contracts for work and labor, and therefore not within the statute, would clearly be outside the statute, according to any rule except the English rule:

—a contract to manufacture and furnish stationery for the special, exclusive, and peculiar use of another, the chief cost and value of which are derived from the labor and skill bestowed upon it, and not from the materials of which it is made. Beck & P. Lithographing Co. v. Colorado Mill & Elevator Co. 3 C. C. A. 248, 10 U. S. App. 465, 52 Fed. 700. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

—a contract for the manufacture of articles of special and peculiar design, not suitable for general trade. Brown & H. Co. v. Wunder, 64 Minn. 450, 32 L.R.A. 593, 67 N. W. 357.

—an agreement to manufacture dishes for one, with his monogram thereon, though the transaction is to result in a sale thereof to him. RE GIES.

—a contract for the manufacture of boxes on special order and for a special purpose. Courtney v. Bridal Veil Box Factory (Or.) 105 Pac. 896. The court, in adopting the Massachusetts rule, states that this rule affords a better and fairer test of the applicability of the statute, in the great majority of instances, than either the English rule or the New York rule.

—a contract for matting, which contemplates that the vendor shall first manufacture it by the use of labor and capital. Gross v. Heckert, 120 Wis. 314, 97 N. W. 952. There are general statements in the opinion that might seem to indicate that the court applied the strict New York rule; but it appears from the findings of fact that the matting was not salable to any other person at any price. Upon that assumption, the contract would be outside the statute, even according to the Massachusetts rule.

—a contract for lithographing letter heads designed exclusively for use in the business of the company giving the order, and which are not adaptable to any other purpose. Pelletreau v. United States Electric Light & P. Co. 13 Misc. 237, 34 N. Y. Supp. 125.

—an agreement to manufacture circulars to be used in the business of the person giving the order, designed exclusively for the latter's business, and not adapted to any other purpose. Hinds v. Kellogg, 37 N. Y. S. R. 356, 13 N. Y. Supp. 922 (affirmed in 133 N. Y. 536, 30 N. E. 1148).

—a contract to deliver and set up, at an agreed price, a monument of a certain size. Fox v. Utter, 6 Wash. 299, 33 Pac. 354.

—a contract to furnish a granite monument of a special design for a particular

The letter came into the hands of Sylvia M. Gies, widow and executrix of the will of Edward G. Gies, and was receipted for by her and taken to her attorney. Claimant was notified not to ship the dishes. It was admitted at the trial in the circuit court that the goods called for by the order were in existence, and were, on the terms of the contract, sought to be delivered to the executrix, who declined to accept delivery. It appears that about the middle of May, 1908, the dishes were shipped by claimant to New York, where they were stored and insured, and were and are there still, held subject to the order of the estate. The claim was proved before the commissioners on claims of the estate, and allowed. The estate appealed to the circuit court, and the matter came on for trial before a jury. The order in question was introduced in evidence. The circuit judge, after ruling against the appellee upon the questions of the measure of damages, and the acceptance of the order by the claimant, directed a verdict in favor of the estate, upon the ground that the contract was within the statute of frauds (3 Comp. Laws, § 9516).

The appellee assigned error upon the charge, and the case is here for review. It is claimed by plaintiff in error that there were upwards of 6,000 pieces of the dishes. One of the dishes was produced at the argument in this court. There was evidence showing that the dishes were made of china plate. The clay is found in Germany and France. A few of the dishes were in stock, purpose. Forsyth v. Mann Bros. 68 Vt. 116, 32 L.R.A. 788, 34 Atl. 481. The court expressed its preference for the Massachusetts rule, as distinguished, upon the one side, from the English rule, and upon the other, from the New York rule.

—a contract by one operating a marble yard to construct a tombstone according to pattern and design in a catalogue, the inscription being of the other party's selection. Moore v. Camden Marble & Granite Works, 80 Ark. 274, 117 Am. St. Rep. 87, 96 S. W. 1063, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 308. The court approves the Massachusetts rule.

—a contract for the manufacture of a pumping plant which is of special value to the person for whom it was manufactured, and is not a marketable commodity, although the manufacturer purchased most of the component parts. Puget Sound Mach. Depot v. Rigby, 13 Wash. 264, 43 Pac. 39. The court said: "It may, however, be fairly deduced from the authorities, that a contract for the manufacture and delivery of an article will not be within the statute of frauds as to sales of such property, if the completed article will not be one which would, under the circumstances of the case, be a marketable commodity. If the article when so completed is one of special value to the one for whom it was manufactured, and would be of comparatively little value as an article of merchandise to be held for sale, the contract will be construed to be one for manufacture, and not of sale."

—a contract for a cameragraph not in existence, but to be wholly or largely manufactured, so that the amount of work to be done on it is an important item. Wallace v. Dowling (S. C.) 68 S. E. 571. The court, in affirming the decision of the circuit court, states that the ruling of that court is sustained by Bird v. Muhlinbrink, 1 Rich. L. 199, 44 Am. Dec. 247, in which it was held that if the contract is for the sale of goods in future, which are not in existence at the time, and for work and labor to be bestowed upon them by the vendor, or procured at his expense, so as to make the work and labor the essential consideration of the contract, it is not within the statute of frauds.

—a contract to manufacture and furnish ironwork for a brick building, according to special designs and measurements, suitable only for use in that particular building. Hientz v. Burkhard, 29 Or. 55, 31 L.R.A. 508, 54 Am. St. Rep. 777, 43 Pac. 866, supra. The court said in effect that the contract would be excluded from the operation of the statute by either the New York rule or the Massachusetts rule; and that, in the absence of a statute substantially the same as Lord Tenterden's act, it was unwilling to go as far as Lee v. Griffin.

—an agreement to install and connect with machinery belonging to defendant, stokers to be furnished by plaintiff, and which, when connected, will become part of the fixtures already on defendant's premises. Underfeed Stoker Co. v. Detroit Salt Co. 135 Mich. 431, 97 N. W. 959.

—a contract to furnish and install a steam heating and drying apparatus in defendant's factory, at an agreed price. Putnam Foundry & Mach. Co. v. Canfield, 25 R. I. 548, 56 Atl. 1033, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 726.

Some of the following contracts, which, under the New York rule, were held to be for work and labor, and therefore not within the statute, would probably have been held to be contracts for sale under the Massachusetts rule, and therefore within the statute; and would certainly have been so held under the English rule.

—a contract for the sale and delivery of patented roofing materials to be thereafter manufactured and delivered. Warren Chemical & Mfg. Co. v. Holbrook, 118 N. Y. 586, 16 Am. St. Rep. 788, 23 N. E. 908.

—a contract to manufacture out of raw silk an article known as "tussah," the conversion of the raw silk into "tussah" requiring winding, doubling, and twisting. Gerli v. Louis Metzger & Co. 51 Misc. 46, 99 N. Y. Supp. 858.

—orders by a retailer from importers and manufacturers for an assortment of watch cases and cologne articles, to be thereafter manufactured in Europe, and specially designed for the special use of the former's trade. Roubicek v. Haddad, 67 N. J.

and the others were manufactured on the order. The order called for decoration, and black and luster lines with monogram "E. G. G." in black upon each dish. That part of the order called for work to be done to suit Mr. Gies's particular purpose and use. The plaintiff in error claims, and we think that the evidence fairly supports the claim: "(1) That the decoration with black and luster lines and the monogram is done by a good artist; (2) that this decoration and monogram are to be upon each and every dish; (3) that the design varies in size with the size and kind of the dish, and that there are as many designs as there are sizes and kinds of dishes; (4) that the design is worked out in an exact and artistic manner; (5) that after the design has been put on the dish, it is again burned with 1,200 degrees of heat to turn the design in and through the glazing; (6) that the cost of putting on the monogram alone is 40 per cent of the price of the dish. In other words, the cost of putting on the monogram and lines is more than 60 per cent of the price of the dish on the other side. An illustration will make this plain. If the price of the dish on the other side of the Atlantic was $1,—the duty is 60 per cent of the import price,—this would make the price of the dish in New York $1.60. The cost of putting on the monogram and lines is 40 per cent of the price of the dish here, which would be 40 per cent of $1.60, or 64 cents. The duty being 60 per cent of the import price, or $1, is 60 cents

L. 522, 51 Atl. 938. (It is to be observed that the contract in this case was a New York contract, governed by the law of New York; and the court merely assumed to follow the New York decisions on the point, though the result would perhaps have been the same under the Massachusetts rule, which obtains in New Jersey.)

So, in Rutty v. Consolidated Fruit Jar Co. 58 Hun, 611, 36 N. Y. S. R. 121, 13 N. Y. Supp. 331, acts of the parties showing that they intended that the glove clasps called for by the contract were to be manufactured by the vendor were regarded sufficient in themselves to take the contract out of the statute of frauds.

And the court in Meyer Bros. Drug Co. v. McKinney, 137 App. Div. 541, 121 N. Y. Supp. 845, declares generally that an agreement to manufacture and sell an article is not a contract of sale, but a contract to perform work. The question in this case was not as to the statute of frauds, but as to the measure of damages. Both cases cite and rely on Parsons v. Loucks, 48 N. Y. 17, 8 Am. Rep. 517.

But even in New York a contract whereby vendees agree to buy, and vendors, who are not manufacturers, agree to sell, a number of yards of sheeting, is held not a contract to manufacture but to sell cloth, notwithstanding the provision that if the production of the mill for whose account the above contract is sold be curtailed by strikes or by any unavoidable accident, the deliveries shall be proportioned to the production. Juilliard v. Trokie, 139 App. Div. 530, 124 N. Y. Supp. 121.

A contract for needles then in existence, to be delivered in envelopes which were in stock, and nothing remaining but to print the purchaser's business style thereon, is for a sale of goods. Shrimpton & Sons v. Dworsky, 2 Misc. 123, 21 N. Y. Supp. 461.

As to contracts like the last, to furnish articles already in existence, see cases cited at page 233 of the note in 14 L.R.A.

For crops or grain.

A contract by which one party is to raise a crop, and the other is to purchase it at a certain price, is not a contract, of sale. Talmadge v. Lane, 17 Misc. 731, 41 N. Y. Supp. 413.

A sale of growing grain, to be delivered in a marketable condition, harvested and threshed, is not taken out of the statute of frauds by an exception as to personal property on which "labor, skill, or money are necessarily to be expended in producing or procuring the same," if no special skill, labor, or workmanship is necessary, but only such as a good husbandman would be compelled to expend in fitting the grain for the market. Mighell v. Dougherty, 86 Iowa, 480, 17 L.R.A. 755, 41 Am. St. Rep. 511, 53 N. W. 402.

In Lewis v. Evans, 108 Iowa, 296, 79 N. W. 81, the court went a step farther and while conceding that a contract for the sale of a specified number of bushels of corn, to be shelled from a crib selected by the purchaser, corn unfit for shelling to be thrown out, was not within the doctrine of the last case, since unshelled corn is marketable, nevertheless held that the contract was within the statute, and not within the exception, upon the ground that the work to be done was not of a kind to change either the form or character of the thing sold, and therefore did not pertain to its production, but consisted of the rejection of that of poorer quality, and the removal of the corn from the cobs.

So, the fact that corn, the subject of the contract, is to be sorted and sewed in bags, does not take the contract out of the statute, nor bring it within the exception. Dierson v. Petersmeyer, 109 Iowa, 233, 80 N. W. 389.

And a contract for the sale of ear corn on the stalk, standing on a certain tract of land, was held in Johnson v. Holland, 124 Iowa, 157, 99 N. W. 708, to be within the statute of frauds, in the absence of proof that vendor was not the owner, and thus within the exception.

That work and labor have to be performed in preparing trees for delivery does not bring the case within the section of the Code providing that an agreement to manuadded to the 64 cents, makes $1.24. This subtracted from the total of $1.60, leaves 36 cents cost of the dish in plain white, 64 cents the cost of the work and labor to put on the monogram and lines, and 60 cents the duty. This bears out the statement of the court below, and the circuit judge understood this, for he says in his opinion: 'Of the purchase price involved in this case, a substantial amount is represented by the duty paid by the vendor upon bringing the goods in question into the United States. Even a larger amount is made up of the cost of the orange and black bands and the monogram; the value of the dishes themselves, before being decorated or imported, representing considerably less than half the total purchase price represented by the order.' It also appeared that the monogram could not be removed without showing a scorch underneath, and impairing the value of the dish.

It is the claim of the defendant in error that the judgment of the court below is correct, even if the statute of frauds does not control the case, and it is urged that upon the question of acceptance, the plaintiff in error had no standing in court. The circuit judge, in his opinion upon the motion for a new trial, disposed of that question as follows: "It is stated that there is no evidence of an acceptance of the order on behalf of the claimant. The fact that the order was filled, and nothing remained to be done except deliver the goods, and delivery was prevented through the executrix, completely disposes of that proposition. There can be no question but that there was an acceptance of this order, but there can also be no question, nor is it controverted, that this acceptance was never in writing." We think that the order signed by Mr. Geis may be held to have been a continuing order to the time of his death. It may be well said that the claimant acted on the faith of the order, and that the conduct of the claimant was such that it may be said to be evidence of an acceptance of the order. Goodspeed v. Wiard Plow Co. 45 Mich. 322, 7 N. W. 902. Ordinarily, the question of acceptance is one of fact for the jury. It at least would have been a proper question of fact for the jury, resting, as it did, upon the conduct of the parties. If this order by acceptance became a binding contract, it was binding on the estate of Mr. Geis.

The circuit judge disposed of the case upon the statute of frauds, and held that it was a sale of goods and chattels, and within the terms of the statute. The opinion of the circuit judge and the briefs of counsel for the respective parties abound with much learning and many authorities upon the subject. We cannot discuss all of the authorities cited. It is the claim of the plaintiff in error that the statute of frauds does not apply in this case. The interpretation of the facture a thing from materials furnished by the manufacturer or by another is not within the provisions of the section which embodies the statute of frauds in relation to sales of personal property, since the former section is intended to cover cases where the main thing contracted for is labor, and the material is the incident; not cases where labor is the mere incident to the property sold. Jones v. Pettigrew (S. D.) 127 N. W. 538.

For timber products.

A contract to furnish lumber, which, before delivery, has to be cut by the party who agrees to furnish the same, is not a sale. Bagby v. Walker, 78 Md. 239, 27 Atl. 1033.

A contract to transport logs, saw some into lumber, and sell same for the party, is not a contract for sale. Wisconsin Sulphite Fibre Co. v. D. K. Jeffris Lumber Co. 132 Wis. 1, 111 N. W. 237.

But an agreement to deliver so many ties, of fixed dimensions and of certain description, at a named price, is a sale. Ellis v. Denver, L. & G. R. Co. 7 Colo. App. 350, 43 Pac. 457. The court said that, assuming that it was within the contemplation of the parties that the ties should be prepared from standing timber, or from logs which had been cut, the work to be done was in no sense the personal labor of the contracting party, and so far as it was controlled by the terms of the contract, the agreement could as well have been fulfilled by the purchase and delivery of the ties specified as by their preparation from logs, or the reduction of standing trees to the form of ties.

Miscellaneous.

A contract for the improvement of realty is not within the statute of frauds, although it involves the furnishing by the contractor of materials in excess of the sum of $50. Campbell & Co. v. Mion Bros. 6 Ga. App. 134, 64 S. E. 571. (The question whether such a contract is within the provisions of the statute of frauds as to contracts in relation to realty is, of course, not within the scope of this note.)

A contract to take down a building standing upon one party's land, and re-erect the frame upon land of another, is not a sale. Scales v. Wiley, 68 Vt. 39, 33 Atl. 771.

A contract for the mere removal of earth for a certain money consideration is not within the statute of frauds. But such a contract is within the statute where the main consideration is to get the earth to be removed, to be resold or used in executing other contracts for filling lots, so that the substance of the contract is the earth itself. Welever v. I. H. Detwiler Co. 15 Ohio C. C. 680.

J. D. C.

statutory words "contract for the sale of goods," etc., has led to the adoption of various rules in different jurisdictions whereby to distinguish contracts for sale from contracts for manufacture. By what may be termed the Massachusetts rule, an agreement by one to construct an article, especially for or according to the plans of another, whether at an agreed price or not, although the transaction is to result in a sale of the article, is a contract for work and labor, and not within the statute. The prevailing view throughout the United States accords substantially with the Massachusetts rule. According to what may be termed the New York rule, where the substance of the contract is work and labor to be done in converting raw materials into a new and totally different article, although the transaction is to result in a sale, the contract is not within the statute; but if, at the time of the agreement, the article sold substantially exists in its ultimate form, or is to be procured in substantially its ultimate form from others, even though acts remain to be done in finishing it, the agreement is a contract for sale, and within the statute. Certain states have construed the statute by reference to the English cases, or by adopting portions of the Massachusetts or New York rules, without adhering exclusively to either. Among such states are Alabama, Minnesota, New Jersey, Oregon, and Wisconsin. Some jurisdictions adopt the rule that, where the contract primarily contemplates work and labor to be done upon the goods to be sold, so as to make work and labor the essential consideration, the contract is not within the statute. Of these states are Missouri, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Washington, and Wyoming. 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 241 et seq., and cases cited.

A leading case in Massachusetts is that of Goddard v. Binney, 115 Mass. 450, 15 Am. Rep. 112. In that case A agreed to build a buggy for B, and to deliver it at a certain time. B gave directions as to the style and finish of the buggy, and it was built in compliance with his directions, and marked with his monogram. Before the buggy was finished, B called to see it, and in response to an inquiry of A, asking if he might sell the buggy, replied that he would keep it; when the buggy was finished, A notified B, and sent him a bill for it. B returned the bill, and promised "to see" A "about it." The buggy was afterwards destroyed by fire while in A's possession. Held, in a suit by A for the price, that the agreement was not a contract of sale within the statute. We quote at length from that opinion: "Whether an agreement like that described in this report should be considered as a contract for the sale of goods within the meaning of the statute of frauds, or a contract for labor, services, and materials, and therefore not within that statute, is a question upon which there is a conflict of authority. According to a long course of decisions in New York, and in some other states of the Union, an agreement for the sale of any commodity not in existence at the time, but which the vendor is to manufacture or put in a condition to be delivered (such as flour from wheat not yet ground, or nails to be made from iron in the vendor's hands), is not a contract of sale within the meaning of the statute. Crookshank v. Burrell, 18 Johns. 58, 9 Am. Dec. 187; Sewall v. Fitch, 8 Cow. 215; Robertson v. Vaughn, 5 Sandf. 1; Downs v. Ross, 23 Wend. 270; Eichelberger v. M'Cauley, 5 Harr. & J. 213, 9 Am. Dec. 514. In England, on the other hand, the tendency of the recent decisions is to treat all contracts of such a kind, intended to result in a sale, as substantially contracts for the sale of chattels; and the decision in Lee v. Griffin, 1 Best. & S. 272, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 191, goes so far as to hold that a contract to make and fit a set of artificial teeth for a patient is essentially a contract for the sale of goods, and therefore is subject to the provisions of the statute. See Maberly v. Sheppard, 10 Bing. 99; Howe v. Palmer, 3 Barn. & Ald. 321; Baldey v. Parker, 2 Barn. & C. 37; Atkinson v. Bell, 8 Barn. & C. 277. In this commonwealth a rule avoiding both of these extremes was established in Mixer v. Howarth, 21 Pick. 205, 32 Am. Dec. 256, and has been recognized and affirmed in repeated decisions of more recent date. The effect of these decisions we understand to be this, namely: That a contract for the sale of articles then existing, or such as the vendor, in the ordinary course of his business, manufactures or procures for the general market, whether on hand at the time or not, is a contract for the sale of goods, to which the statute applies. But, on the other hand, if the goods are to be manufactured especially for the purchaser, and upon his special order, and not for the general market, the case is not within the statute. Spencer v. Cone, 1 Met. 283. 'The distinction,' says Chief Justice Shaw, in Lamb v. Crafts, 12 Met. 353, 'we believe is now well understood. When a person stipulates for the future sale of articles which he is habitually making, and which, at the time, are not made or finished, it is essentially a contract of sale, and not a contract for labor; otherwise, when the article is made pursuant to the agreement.' In Gardner v. Joy, 9 Met. 177, a contract to buy a certain number of boxes of candles at a fixed rate per pound, which the vendor said he would manufacture and deliver in about three months, was held to be a contract of sale and within the statute. To the same general effect are Waterman v. Meigs, 4 Cush. 497, and Clark v. Nichols, 107 Mass. 547. It is true that in 'the infinitely various shades of different contracts' there is some practical difficulty in disposing of the questions that arise under that section of the statute. Gen. Stat [1860] chap. 105, § 5. But we see no ground for holding that there is any uncertainty in the rule itself. On the contrary, its correctness and justice are clearly implied or expressly affirmed in all of our decisions upon the subject-matter. It is proper to say also that the present case is a much stronger one than Mixer v. Howarth. In this case the carriage was not built for the defendant, but in conformity in some respects with his directions, and at his request was marked with his initials. It was neither intended nor adapted for the general market. As we are by no means prepared to overrule the decision in that case, we must therefore hold that the statute of frauds does not apply to the contract which the plaintiff is seeking to enforce in this action."

An instructive case is Roubicek v. Hadad, 67 N. J. L. 522, 51 Atl. 938. The contract was a New York contract, and the rule in that state was applied. A defendant, who was doing a retail trade in Atlantic City, New Jersey, ordered from the plaintiffs, who were importers and manufacturers of Bohemian glass novelties, etc., in New York City, an assortment of watch cases and cologne articles, to be thereafter manufactured in Europe, with the words "Atlantic City" thereon, for the special use of defendant's trade; and it was held, following the decisions of the state of New York, that this was not a contract of sale, but for work, labor, and materials, and hence not a contract within the statute. After stating the New York rule, the court said: "It should be stated, however, that the courts of the state of New York have more recently shown a disposition to qualify the rule thus stated to some extent, and to make it conform more closely to the rule as adopted in the later English and American cases. Thus, in Passaic Mfg. Co. v. Hoffman, 3 Daly, 495, it is held that if the article to be manufactured to fill the order under the contract was one that was manufactured and supplied to the trade generally, it would be a sale within the statute; but, if it was one specially manufactured for the trade of the person ordering it, then the contract would be one for work and labor, and not within the statute." 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ute. So in Donnell v. Hearn, 12 Daly, 230, it was held that an agreement to manufacture lamps which are not usually kept in stock, nor usually manufactured for purposes of sale, is not within the statute."

Meincke v. Falk, 55 Wis. 427, 42 Am. Rep. 722, 13 N. W. 545, is an able case, and reviews the authorities, both English and American. It was an action to recover the cost of a certain carriage manufactured by the plaintiff, and alleged to have been ordered by the defendant. It was claimed that the skill, labor, and workmanship of the plaintiff was the special inducement for giving the order. The case holds that while an executory contract for the sale of an article for the price of $50 or more may be within the statute of frauds, notwithstanding such article does not at the time exist in solido, yet, where such contract is to furnish materials and manufacture the article according to specifications furnished, or a model selected, and where without the special contract the thing would never have been manufactured in the particular manner, shape, or condition it was, then the contract is essentially for special skill, labor, or workmanship, and is not within the statute. This case is cited with approval in the late case of Gross v. Heckert, 120 Wis. 314, 97 N. W. 952. A recent case in Arkansas is Moore v. Camden Marble & Granite Works, 80 Ark. 274, 117 Am. St. Rep. 87, 96 S. W. 1063, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 308. It was there held that a contract by the plaintiff, who operated a marble yard, to make a tombstone according to a design selected by the buyer from the seller's catalogue, and to place a suitable inscription on the tombstone, is not within the statute of frauds, as it is not a contract for the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, but is one for work and labor to be done, and material to be furnished, though the transaction is to result in a sale of the completed article. Mead v. Case, 33 Barb. 202. As we have already shown, the Massachusetts rule has been adopted by a majority of the American courts. We understand that rule, in substance, to be that an agreement by one to construct an article especially for, or according to the plans of, another, whether at an agreed price or not, although the transaction is to result in a sale of the article, is a contract for work and labor, and not within the statute; but, if the article to be made and delivered is of a kind which the producer usually has for sale in the course of his business, it is a contract for sale, and must be in writing.

It must be conceded, we think, that the articles in this case,—the dishes,—when made according to the order, would not be fit for the general market, but were intended to suit the special use of Mr. Gies in his particular trade. They were not, in their finished condition, suitable to be kept in stock by the claimant, and were plainly unsuitable for the general traffic. The goods would never have been manufactured in the particular manner, shape, style, or condition but for the order. These are some of the considerations which induce us to hold that, under any of the American rules, and especially under the Massachusetts rule, which we are inclined to follow, the learned circuit judge erred in directing a verdict and judgment against the claimant.

The only case decided in this court which is directly in point is that of Turner v. Mason, 65 Mich. 662, 32 N. W. 846. It involved a contract for the painting of a portrait, and is an extreme case. In Underfeef Stoker Co. v. Detroit Salt Co. 135 Mich. 431, 97 N. W. 959, it was held that an agreement to furnish and install stokers, and connect them with machinery belonging to defendant, and which, when connected, would become a part of the fixtures already on defendant's premises, is not a sale of goods within the statute of frauds, and Benjamin on Sales, 7th ed. 109, is quoted. The test as to whether the value of the work exceeds that of the materials used in the execution of the contract is no longer accepted either in English or American jurisdictions. Lee v. Griffin, 1 Best & S. 272, 23 Eng. Rul. Cas. 191; Mead v. Case, supra.

Plaintiff in error claims, and with some force, that the circuit judge should have left it to the jury to decide whether the contract was essentially a contract for work and labor, or a contract for the sale of chattels, and whether or not the goods existed in solido at the time the order was given; that these were clearly questions of fact, to be determined from the evidence by the jury, under proper instructions from the court,—citing 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 967; Pitkin v. Noyes, 48 N. H. 294, 97 Am. Dec. 615, 2 Am. Rep. 218; Puget Sound Machinery Depot v. Rigby, 13 Wash. 264, 43 Pac. 39; Schloss v. Josephs, 98 Minn. 442, 108 N. W. 474. It may be doubted whether the facts were enough in dispute to have required this course.

For the error pointed out, the judgment below is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

W. H. HILL COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
GRAY & WORCESTER.

(— Mich. —, 127 N. W. 803.)

Monopoly — controlling price — proprietary medicine.

A system of contracts by which a manufacturer of medicine under a secret formula, which he puts upon the market under a tradename and in a trade dress, undertakes to control the retail price by fixing the price at which it shall be sold, and the dealers who may secure it, is void as in restraint of trade.

(September 28, 1910.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wayne County in defendant's favor in a suit to restrain the selling by defendant of certain proprietary medicines at less than a stipulated price, to restrain it from mutilating the boxes in which such medicines are put up, and to enjoin it from fraudulently inducing wholesalers thereof to breach their contracts with plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Keena, Lightner, & Oxtoby, for appellant:

Complainant's contracts and system of conducting its business are not void as being in restraint of trade at common law.

Under common-law principles, the owner of property may, in connection with the sale thereof, attach reasonable conditions and limitations as to the use thereof by the vendee, and such limitations connected with the sale of the article do not render the contract void as being in restraint of trade.

Complainant's contracts, whereby it desires to secure uniformity in the sale of its preparation, were not adopted for the purpose of restraining trade, but as a means of protecting complainant's property, which consists of its secret formula and the good will which the remedy has acquired with the public. Complainant has only adopted a reasonable means of protecting its property rights.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainant corporation for some years past has been engaged in the manufacture and sale of proprietary medicines, including specially Hill's Cascara Bromide Quinine, a cold cure in tablet form. It is claimed that this preparation has acquired a reputation with the public as being an efficient remedy, and that the good will of complainant therein is a property right of great value. The tablets are, and since the year 1900 continuously have been, put up by complainant in a distinctive package and dress. These tablets are made under and in pursuance of a secret formula which is the sole property of complainant, and it has the exclusive right to the formula under which the tablets are made, and also to the name of the preparation, and to the peculiar or distinctive dress in which it has been marketed by complainant. It is also claimed that the demand for this article has been created with the consuming public by its merits, and by extensive advertising on the part of complainant. There are upon the market available to the public quantities of other preparations in tablet form, for similar purposes, and many druggists throughout the country put up and sell similar preparations on their own account. The price of complainant's said preparation to the consumer is 25 cents for a small box, and complainant has at all times sold its preparation at fixed prices. The policy of the complainant has been to refuse to sell its preparation to any dealer upon more favorable terms than to others, to discourage the giving of secret rebates upon its goods by the jobber to the retail druggist, and to require the sale of its preparation at the equal price aforesaid to the consuming public. The bill states that, since the spring of 1905, said preparation has been sold only upon what is known as the direct contract plan. Each carton or dozen boxes of said preparation is marked with a distinctive serial number, and each box contained in each carton is similarly identified, and in each carton there is placed a record card which, under said direct contract plan, is returned to complainant by the wholesale druggist upon a sale of said preparation, showing to whom said preparation has been sold. That, as a part of said direct contract plan, complainant enters into a direct retail agency contract with any and all retail druggists who are desirous of selling its preparations. That no discrimination is made by complainant, and that all druggists are given full opportunity of signing said contract, and of obtaining complainant's preparation at fixed and uniform prices. That, under a contract with the wholesale druggist, said preparation can be sold and delivered only to druggists who have entered into a contract with complainant. Said retail agency contract contains the following provisions: "In consideration whereof said retail dealer hereby agrees not to sell or furnish at any price the said proprietary medicines to wholesale or retail dealers not accredited agents of said company; nor to any other person, firm, or corporation at less than the retail price fixed by the said W. H. Hill Company and printed upon each package." The retail price of Hill's Cascara Bromide Quinine is fixed by said contract at 25 cents a box. The said wholesale agency contract contains the following clause: "In consideration whereof said wholesale dealer covenants and agrees not to furnish or sell any of the proprietary remedies manufactured by the said W. H. Hill Company to any persons, firms, or corporations, to whom said W. H. Hill Company may, at any time, notify said wholesale dealer not to sell any of its medicines."

The bill further states that contracts had been signed by complainant with more than 1,500 retail druggists in the state of Michigan, and that the purpose of said method of selling complainant's preparation was to prevent secret rebates in prices and discrimination on the part of wholesale druggists and others in favor of or against particular retail druggists, and to prevent cutting of prices and demoralization of trade, and the injury which would result therefrom to the reputation and good will of complainant's business, and especially to its said preparation. That the said plan of sale of said preparation has been generally adopted, and, with few exceptions, said wholesale druggists and retail druggists have observed the terms of said contract, and especially that said preparation has been sold at the uniform price of 25 cents a box. That on or about March 1, 1906, the defendant executed with complainant one of said retail agency contracts, and in pursuance thereof defendant secured in the usual course of business, through the wholesale dealer, such quantities of said preparation as it desired, and, as far as complainant was advised, defendant observed the terms of said contract until November, 1907, or thereabouts. That in the month of December, 1907, said defendant notified complainant that it desired to cancel said contract of March 1, 1906, and it was thereupon surrendered by defendant. That on or about January 10, 1908, defendant began advertising in the Detroit papers that it was selling Hill's Cascara Bromide Quinine at 20 cents a box. That defendant did sell complainant's preparation at this price, and in all such sales, before the filing of the bill of complaint, as far as appears, the serial number printed on the side of the small boxes was obliterated.

It is claimed that the defendant, after canceling its contract with complainant, knowing that it could not secure complainant's goods from wholesale dealers who were advised of the cancellation of the contract, did not buy its goods in Detroit, but obtained them in Boston and in New York from wholesale jobbers who undoubtedly sold to it under the impression that it was still under contract with complainant; that the defendant, well knowing the situation and desiring to cover up its fraud in thus securing the goods, obliterated the numbers, as above stated. The complainant asked the court to enjoin defendant from selling its said preparation at a price less than 25 cents a box; also from securing for sale complainant's preparation, by inducing a breach of contract on the part of the wholesale dealers or others under contract relations with complainant; and also from mutilating the boxes containing said preparation. In its answer the defendant denied that the purpose of the method of selling complainant's preparation was as set forth in the bill, but avers that the purpose was to keep the selling price of the article—then an article of common use in the state,—at a fixed and graduated figure in order to create a monopoly, and secure the profits of that monopoly; that the purpose and effect of said method of selling complainant's preparation, and the contracts incident to said method, formed, among the wholesale and retail dealers entering into said contract, a combination or trust to carry out a restriction in trade or commerce, and control the price of said commodity, and prevent free competition among and between said wholesale and retail dealers so combining, and free competition between such wholesale and retail dealers and other independent dealers who may be desirous of competing; and that complainant's method of selling its preparation had in fact resulted in practically a complete monopoly of the trade and commerce in said preparation, and that each of said contracts set forth in complainant's bill was, and the combination of said contracts forming complainant's so-called method was also, illegal and fraudulent as a restraint of trade and commerce, both at common law and under the laws of the state of Michigan, and especially in violation of the provisions of act No. 255, Pub.

Acts 1899, Michigan, and are absolutely void, and not enforceable either in law or equity. The defendant denied all fraudulent conduct, combination, and collusion as alleged by complainant, and averred that, after the cancelation of said contract, it purchased said preparation in the regular and ordinary course of business in the open market. The complainant offered evidence tending to support its bill. Defendant offered no evidence.

The secretary of the complainant testified, among other things, that it had altogether about 25,000 contracts with retail dealers throughout the United States. That was only an estimate.

On cross-examination he testified as follows:

The primary purpose of the contract plan evidenced by the exhibits is to fix the price of Hill's Cascara Bromide Quinine at 25 cents to the consumer, and to fix the price to the wholesaler at the figure fixed in the wholesale contract. If the contract is lived up to, there will be no competition in the sale of Hill's Cascara Bromide Quinine, as far as the price is concerned.

Q. What other competition could there be?

A. Well, the competition of two jobbers in one town getting the business.

Q. How could they get the business? It is the same commodity that they are trying to sell?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. They are not allowed to cut the price?

A. Not at all.

Q. Then how would they get the business without cutting the price?

A. By personal solicitation.

Q. For the same article?

A. For the same article.

Q. At the same price?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that is the only competition that you can think of?

A. Yes sir.

Q. As I understand it, the real purpose of this contract system is to keep up the price of Hill's Cascara Bromide Quinine to 25 cents to the consumer?

A. That is the main object.

Q. Under any and all circumstances?

A. Yes. We have about 1,800 of these contracts in the state of Michigan at the present time, and at the time the bill of complaint was filed, we had something over 1,800. This includes not only the druggists, but also, in the smaller communities, general stores, which handle a great many proprietary articles. There are about 1,700 druggists in the state of Michigan, and I would say of that number 1,500 are bound 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

by the terms of our contract. That insures the company as far as the price goes a practical monopoly on the article.

Q. And the W. H. Hill Company does, as a result of these contracts, have a monopoly in the state of Michigan?

A. If you care to term it so, yes.

Q. Well, what do you term it? Can you tell us any other term to use in connection with it, rather than monopoly?

A. Why, naturally, the Hill Company would have a monopoly of their own goods.

Q. Well, then, that term applies to the situation?

A. Oh, yes. The contract which Gray & Worcester had with our company was canceled by mutual consent on the 4th of December, and, from that time until the present, Gray & Worcester had no contract relations with the company.

Upon the hearing the learned circuit judge held that complainant's contracts were void as being in restraint of trade, and a final decree was entered dismissing the bill of complaint. The complainant has appealed.

In a lengthy brief, and in an able oral argument, complainant's counsel claim that its said contracts are valid and enforceable, and that they are not in restraint of trade at common law, and are not in violation of any statute. Our attention has been called to two recent cases decided by the United States circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit. The opinions were written by Mr. Justice Lurton, and were concurred in by the other members of the court. John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 90 C. C. A. 579, 164 Fed. 803. In the first case, Hartman was the manufacturer of the well-known proprietary medicine called "Peruna." This he put upon the market through a system of contracts intended to maintain prices. The system there adopted was so nearly like the one we are here considering that it need not be here described. In fact, complainant's counsel admit that, if said opinions of Mr. Justice Lurton are right, they expect this court to follow them as decisive of the case. An examination of the cases above referred to, and of the cases there cited and reviewed, has been made. The opinion in the Hartman Case deals with every phase of this case. It cites many authorities and covers more than twenty pages, and its length prevents a full quotation. There the bill of complaint was demurred to. The doctrine of the case may be briefly stated as follows:

The exemption from the common-law rule against monopoly and restraint of trade, and the provisions, of the Federal anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647, 26 Stat. at L. 209 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200), which has been extended to contracts affecting the sale and resale, the use, or the price of articles made under a patent, or productions covered by a copyright, does not extend also to articles made under a secret process or medicine compounded under a private formula. While the owner of the patent or copyright is protected in his exclusive right by the statute which gives him a monopoly, there is no statute which protects one who makes or vends an article which is made by a secret process or private formula, nor, so long as he keeps his process secret, can he bring himself within the principle of the statute which grants a temporary monopoly in consideration of the full publication of the invention or work. The owner of a secret process or formula is not protected by law in his secret, but he may protect himself by contract against its disclosure by one to whom it is communicated in confidence, or restrict its use by such person, and such contracts are not in restraint of trade, because of the character of the property right in the secret, which would be destroyed by its disclosure, and because it is not in itself an article of commerce; but such considerations do not apply to contracts for the sale of the manufactured product, which do not involve a disclosure of the secret, and such contracts are within the rules against restraint of trade. The trading stamp and railroad ticket cases, such as Sperry & H. Co. v. Mechanics' Clothing Co. (C. C.) 135 Fed. 833, and Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. McConnell (C. C.) 82 Fed. 65, rest upon the peculiar character of the property rights involved. Neither concerns the buying and selling of articles of general commerce, and both relate to things in the nature of contracts personal in character, and not to things which can ever become the subject of general trade and traffic.

It does not follow because a secret process or formula for a medicine will be protected against betrayal by employees, or those to whom it has been communicated in confidence, that a system of contracts for the control of all sales and subsales of the medicine when once made will be outside of the rules in restraint of trade, simply because it is the product of such secret formula or process. The preparation when ready for the market and the formula are two separate and distinct things. Freedom of traffic in that is consistent with its 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

value, and does not involve exposure of the formula. None of the reasons which apply to patented articles, copyrighted productions, or to restricted disclosure of the secret formula itself, apply to the product of the formula. The cases directly in point opposed to this view are nisi prius decisions, except one in the circuit court of appeals for the third circuit. The fact that an article of commerce is sold under a tradename or in trade dress affords it no exemption from the common-law or statutory rules against restraint of trade.

Where the sole manufacturer of a medicine made in accordance with a secret formula, but unpatented, sold the same only under a system of contracts between himself and wholesalers dealers to whom alone he sold at uniform prices, by which they bound themselves to sell at a certain price, and only to retail dealers designated by him, and between him and such retail dealers, by which, in consideration of being so designated, they bound themselves to sell to consumers only and at a certain price, and such contracts had been entered into, as the manufacturer alleged, by a large majority of the wholesale and retail druggists in the United States, it was held that such system of contracts was prima facie illegal, both at common law, as in unreasonable restraint of trade, and under the Federal anti-trust act, as aforesaid, where it affected interstate sales, its purpose and effect being to prevent competition between purchasers of the medicine, both wholesale and retail, and that, in the absence of allegation of facts showing it to be necessary for the protection of the manufacturer's business, a court of equity would not aid in the enforcement of the contracts by granting an injunction to prevent a defendant who was not a party thereto, from buying the medicine from purchasers who were, and reselling the same at any price it might see fit. A single contract, although it be such as, taken alone, may not be within the rule at common law against contracts in restraint of trade, which is one of a great number of identical contracts made between the producer of an unpatented article of commerce and dealers therein, forming a "system" of contracts, which, taken as a whole, materially affects the public interests by stifling competition and trade in said article, is an unreasonable restraint, and within the rule at common law against contracts in restraint of trade, if, from an examination of the workings of the whole system, it appears that the restraint is actually, though not ostensibly, the main result and object of the system of contracts, and not merely ancillary or incidental to another and legitimate object.

In view of the evidence in this case showing the number and scope of the contracts, and the establishment of a "system," the following excerpt from the opinion in the Hartman Case is pertinent: "Assuming that these contracts operate only as a partial, and not a general, restraint,—a question which we do not concede,—and that they are properly to be considered as covenants ancillary to a principal contract, are the restraints thereby imposed necessary to protect the complainant in his retained business, or to protect him from an unjust use of the articles by the purchaser? In the first place, we are to consider that we are not dealing with a single contract. The complainant has made a multitude of them in identical terms, and the opposite parties comprehend, according to his bill, a large majority of the wholesale and retail druggists in the United States. The reasons which might uphold covenants restricting the liberty of a single buyer might prove quite inadequate when there are a multitude of identical agreements. The single covenant might in no way affect the public interest, when a large number might. So, also, the question as to whether the restraint was necessary to the retained business, and therefore ancillary to the principal purpose of the agreement, or whether the restraining covenants were not the principal, rather than the ancillary, matter, would largely depend upon the general sweep and result of a multiplication of identical contracts. The general purpose of each separate contract is the regulation of the prices and sales of the line of preparations made by complainant. A common purpose unites each covenantee to every other, and the 'system' is to be construed as 'one piece,' in which the complainant and every assenting dealer, whether wholesaler or retailer, is a party, and the agreement of each such covenantee to sell only at the prices dictated by the manufacturer constitutes one general scheme. The question here is therefore, one of a totally different character from that which would arise if the question was the more simple one presented by a breach by a single covenantee. In Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Lewis Voight & Sons Co. 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 143, 78 C. C. A. 567, 148 Fed. 939, where was involved a combination in restraint of trade, and where each wholesaler and retailer in the business had executed separate, but identical, contracts with the corporation representing the combined manufacturers, we held that each such separate covenantee was a party to the general scheme for enhancing prices. This was 30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

rested upon the holding that the several agreements constituted one whole. See also observations of Judge Taft in United States v. Addyston Pipe Co. 46 L.R.A. 122, 29 C. C. A. 141, 85 Fed. 275, and of Justice Peckham in W. W. Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38, 45, 46, 48 L. ed. 608, 611, 612, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307. The plain effect of the 'system of contracts,' the purposed relation of each to every other being confessed by the very description of the method of carrying on business stated in the bill, is first, to destroy all competition between jobbers or wholesale dealers in selling complainant's preparations. Complainant restrains himself by agreeing to sell at only one price, and to only such persons as will sign one of his system of contracts. The contracting wholesalers and jobbers covenant that they will sell to no one who does not come with complainant's license to buy, and that they will not sell below a minimum price dictated by complainant. Next, all competition between retailers is destroyed, for each such retailer can obtain his supply only by signing one of the uniform contracts prepared for retailers, whereby he covenants not to sell to anyone who proposes to sell again, unless the buyer is authorized in writing by the complainant, and not to sell at less than a standard price named in the agreement. Thus, all room for competition between retailers, who supply the public, is made impossible. If these contracts leave any room at any point of the line for the usual play of competition between the dealers in the product marketed by complainant, it is not discoverable. Thus, a combination between the manufacturer, the wholesalers, and the retailers to maintain prices and stifle competition has been brought about."

Referring to the claim that defendant knew complainant's plan, and that, in selling to defendant, each dealer thereby breached his contract, the following extract from said opinion is appropriate here: "That Park & Sons Company knew complainant's plan of business, and that, in selling to them, every such vendor thereby breached his agreement, is also charged, and, for the purpose of the demurrer, admitted. What is the result? Did the defendants by so purchasing, with knowledge of the restrictions imposed upon sales, thereby enter into contractual relations with complainant? Manifestly not. Did they obtain the absolute title, notwithstanding their knowledge that the sale was in breach of restrictions imposed upon the seller? Undoubtedly. The restrictions imposed by complainant upon sales and resales, if valid at all, are only so because they constitute personal contracts, upon which an action will lie only against the contracting party. Garst v. Hall & L. Co. 179 Mass. 588, 55 L.R.A. 631, 61 N. E. 219. A prime objection to the enforceability of such a system of restraint upon sales and prices is that they offend against the ordinary and usual freedom of traffic in chattels or articles which pass by mere delivery. The right of alienation is one of the essential incidents of a right of general property in movables, and restraints upon alienation have been generally regarded as obnoxious to public policy, which is best subserved by great freedom of traffic in such things as pass from hand to hand. General restraint in the alienation of articles, things, chattels, except when a very special kind of property is involved, such as a slave or an heirloom, have been generally held void. 'If a man,' says Lord Coke, in Coke on Littleton, § 300, 'be possessed of a house or any other chattel, real or personal, and give his whole interest or property therein, upon condition that the donee or vendee shall not alien the same, the same is void, because his whole interest and property is out of him, so as he hath no possibility of reverter; and it is against trade and traffic and bargaining and contracting between man and man.' It is also a general rule of the common law that a contract restricting the use or controlling subsales cannot be annexed to a chattel, so as to follow the article, and obligate the subpurchaser by operation of notice."

The opinion in the Hartman Case was written in March, 1907. A writ of certiorari was issued by the Supreme Court of the United States to review the decision. But the writ was dismissed on December 21, 1908, upon motion of petitioner. After the decision of the Hartman Case, the drug company sought to evade that decision by means of a consignment contract so called, and that case was before the same court in September, 1908. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co. 90 C. C. A. 579, 164 Fed. 803. In this last case, after disposing of the consignment contract, Justice Lurton said: "This case must, after all, turn upon whether there is such identity of character between the statutory monopoly of articles made under valid patent or copyright and articles made according to some private formula, as to exempt them from the principles which apply to contracts which tend to create a monopoly or restrain trade, when the subject is an article not made under a patent or copyright or secret formula. . . . 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

There are decisions by most respectable courts which hold that articles, such as proprietary medicines, are outside of all rules and statutes which forbid contracts in restraint of trade, because they are made under a secret formula. Some, if not most, of these decisions have been made in cases in which the Dr. Miles Medical Company has been a party. They are cited and commented upon by this court in the case of John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 135, 82 C. C. A. 158, 153 Fed. 24. They go upon the conceded fact that a trade secret or medical formula is a monopoly until discovered by fair means, and will be protected against abuse, by one who learns it under a contract limiting its use, or in the confidence of an employment. They do not observe any distinction between the necessary monopoly of the secret itself and the unnecessary monopoly of the articles made according to the secret process, and offered for sale and resale to the consuming public. Neither do those decisions recognize any distinction between the statutory monopoly accorded to articles protected by a patent or copyright and those made under such private formula. . . . In the case referred to, we reached, with unanimity, the conclusion that no legal, economic, or moral reason existed for regarding contracts in respect to the vast and ever-increasing commerce in proprietary medicines, as either outside of the mischief intended to be remedied by the Federal statute against monopolies, or the rules of the common law, or within the statutory protection afforded by the patent and copyright statutes. Any other conclusion would be to sanction a monopoly in that class of goods vastly more far-reaching than the monopoly extended upon high grounds of public policy to the inventor. The statutory monopoly has a limitation of a few years. To obtain it, the inventor must put on record his invention. At the end of the term, the public will be free to employ the discovery without the burden theretofore imposed as a compensation to the inventor. Not so with the monopoly asked for by those who control the enormous proprietary trade of this country. Their monopoly will go on forever, and, if there be merit in their formula, they may not only preserve it through all time, but continue to restrain prices and prevent competition in the sale of the product. It is said that the proprietor of such a secret remedy need never communicate his formula. Concede this. To say that he need never compound his medicine, and that, if he does, he need not sell it unless he chooses, is undoubtedly true. But as much may be said about any article which the producer may choose to make or not to make, sell or not sell, as he wills. So much pertains inherently to the natural freedom of man in respect to his own actions. But if he elects to make and sell a product according to his formula, a public interest is affected if he be permitted to restrain freedom of trade in the article, when it has once passed under the dominion of a buyer. . . . The mere fact that one article or class of articles is made under an unknown and private formula, and another class is not, is an undeniable fact which may serve for some purposes to differentiate them. But that single fact does not afford an economic reason, and still less a legal reason, for saying that it operates to exempt such articles from rules against unlawful restraints of trade. We need not repeat the argument by which we reached the conclusion that the system of contracts which Hartman sought to enforce through the injunctive power of a court of equity was obnoxious not only to the statute of Congress against restraints and monopolies in respect of interstate trade, but inimical also to the reasonable restraints which at common law may be imposed as ancillary to a principal contract."

In our opinion the arguments and reasoning of the able court that decided these cases meet and answer every position advanced by complainant's counsel in this case. We are content with the reasoning, the citation, and review of authorities, and the conclusion reached by that court, and we think that they are decisive and controlling of every question here involved. We note in passing that there is no evidence in this record showing that the defendant purchased any goods from any person or firm that had been notified not to sell to it. Crittenden & Company, the Eastern Drug Company, and all other dealers in contract relation with complainant, had a right to sell to defendant, whose name was listed, unless notified not to do so, in any view of the case. But we place our decision upon the ground that complainant's system of contracts deals with the manufactured product of its secret process, and not with the process itself, and that the system of contracts, being a restraint upon free competition, falls within the common-law prohibition of restraints of trade, and is void.

Having reached this conclusion, it is unnecessary to decide whether or not such contracts are illegal and void under the statute of this state.

The decree below will be affirmed, with costs.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Resp.,
v.

D. W. CHAMBERLAIN, Appt.

(— Minn. —, 127 N. W. 444.)

Sunday law — "shows" — picture show.

Under the rule of ejusdem generis, the term "shows," in § 4981, Rev. Laws 1905, which prohibits certain sports on the Sabbath Day, refers to out-of-door amusements, and a moving picture exhibition, designed to illustrate moral subjects, for the entertainment of the public, when conducted in an orderly and proper manner within a building, is not within the provisions of the statute.

(Brown and O'Brien, JJ., dissent.)

(July 29, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Municipal Court of Mankato, convicting him of Sabbath breaking. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Headnote by LEWIS, J.

Note. — As to amusements prohibited by Sunday law, see note to Ex parte Hull, post, 465.

People v. Hemleb, 127 App. Div. 356, 111 N. Y. Supp. 690; Edwards v. McClellan, 118 N. Y. Supp. 181; Economopoulos v. Bingham, 109 N. Y. Supp. 728; Moore v. Owen, 58 Misc. 332, 109 N. Y. Supp. 585.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A criminal complaint was made against appellant in the municipal court in the city of Mankato, charging him with the crime of Sabbath breaking, committed as follows: "That at the city of Mankato, Blue Earth county, Minnesota, on the 20th day of February, 1910, the same being the first day of the week, Sunday, D. W. Chamberlain did run and operate a public show for hire, and did admit the public thereto generally for an admission fee of 10 cents each, against the peace and dignity of the state of Minnesota, and contrary to the statute in such case made and provided." It was shown by the uncontradicted evidence at the trial that appellant was the manager of the Unique Theater, located and facing on one of the streets of the city; that from 7 until 10 o'clock Sunday evening, February 20, 1910, appellant conducted a moving picture show in the theater by means of a canvas or screen erected upon the stage and visible to the audience. On the occasion in question there were from 150 to 200 people present. The exhibition was accompanied with piano music, and consisted of a series of pictures, representing different subjects. The pictures were entirely moral, and the people attending were thoroughly respectable and orderly. The theater entrance was on the street, but there were no signs visible except the name over the door, "Unique Theater." Tickets were sold in the theater vestibule, but there was no calling out or announcing the show or the sale of tickets.

The trial court charged the jury as follows: "If you find, from all the evidence in the case, fairly and carefully considered by you, that on the 20th day of February, 1910, the defendant conducted a public exhibition by operating a moving picture show within a building on the public street, in the city of Mankato, by means of pictures thrown and exhibited upon a canvas or curtain, and that the public generally were invited and admitted without discrimination to such exhibition, and that an admission fee was charged therefor, and if you so find as to each and all of these things beyond a reasonable doubt, as the court has charged you, you will then find the defendant guilty, as charged in the complaint. If you do not so find beyond a reasonable doubt, as the court has charged you, you will then find the defendant not guilty."

The single question here submitted is whether the moving picture show, as conducted by appellant, was prohibited by the provisions of §§ 4980 and 4981, Rev. Laws 1905. The present statute is a condensation of the several sections on the same subject found in Gen. Stat. 1894. Section 4980 reads: "The law prohibits the doing on the first day of the week of the certain acts in § 4981 specified, which are serious interruptions of the repose and religious liberty of the community, and the doing of any of said acts on that day shall constitute Sabbath breaking. . . ." That part of § 4981 necessary to set out here reads: "All hunting, shooting, fishing, playing, horse racing, gaming, and other public sports, exercises, and shows."

Does the word "shows," as used in § 4981, include a moving picture show, or similar entertainment, when conducted in a building where the only feature of publicity consists in the fact that the public is invited to attend and enter the building by means of an entrance opening on a public street? Hunting, shooting, fishing, playing, horse racing, and gaming undoubtedly refer to outdoor life. The words, "other public sports, exercises, and shows," by reason of their association with what precedes them, refer to the same character of sports or exercises; viz., those conducted out of doors. This is the proper application of the rule ejusdem generis: General words, following an enumeration of particulars, are limited by reference to the preceding particular enumeration, and are to be construed as including only all other like things. This part of the statute was taken from the New York Code, and the appellate division of the supreme court of that state has held that the term "shows" applies only to out-of-doors sports. People v. Hemleb, 127 App. Div. 356, 111 N. Y. Supp. 690. To the same effect: Edwards v. McClellan (Sup.) 118 N. Y. Supp. 181; William Fox Amusement Co. v. McClellan, 62 Misc. 100, 114 N. Y. Supp. 594; People v. Finn, 57 Misc. 659, 110 N. Y. Supp. 22; Keith & Proctor Amusement Co. v. Bingham (Sup.) 108 N. Y. Supp. 205; Eden Musee American Co. v. Bingham, 53 Misc. 644, 108 N. Y. Supp. 200.

It has never been the legislative policy in this state to strictly enforce the cessation of all kinds of works and amusements on the Sabbath Day. The leading principle all through the different enactments upon the subject is to prevent any serious interruption of the repose and religious liberty of the community. This means that it has not been the intention to interfere with the freedom of the public in the pursuit of amusement and relaxation on the Sabbath Day, when it does not seriously interfere with the rights of other members of the community, who desire a quiet and uninterrupted observance of the day. The policy of the legislature is referred to in the case of Ward v. Ward, 75 Minn. 269, 77 N. Y. 965, when that section of the statute was under consideration which prohibits all manner of public selling on Sunday, and it was held that it was the intention to prevent only public selling, and not a private or casual sale, such as did not tend to produce a violation of public order and the solemnity of the day. To the same effect, see Holden v. O'Brien, 86 Minn. 297, 90 N. W. 531, where, for the same reason, it was held that the statute did not prohibit the casual execution and delivery of promissory notes or contracts on the Sabbath Day. We have reached the conclusion that the exhibition, as conducted by appellant, is not within the provisions of the statute.

But it should be understood that our decision is based on the evidence of this particular case, and it should not be understood that moving picture shows and similar entertainments may not be abated under other provisions of the law, when unwholesome in character or when improperly conducted.

Reversed.

Brown, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The decision in this case opens the door to all Sunday theaters, on condition that their exhibitions and performances be of a moral nature and orderly conducted. The statutes do not so read. They contain no such reservation, but, on the contrary, expressly prohibit on the Sabbath Day, without qualification, all public shows and exhibitions, regardless of their character or the manner in which they are conducted. Authorities cited from New York are not in point. In that state there are two statutes upon the subject,—one applying to outdoor sports, shows, and exhibitions, and the other to indoor theatrical performances of a certain character, which are expressly enumerated in the statute. A moving picture show is not among the enumerated indoor shows, and the courts of that state have held, and properly so, that the statutes prohibiting outdoor shows do not apply to a show or exhibition of that kind. So that in New York there is no statute prohibiting a moving picture show. In this state we have but one statute on the subject, which, in my judgment, properly construed, applies both to indoor and outdoor shows. It is absurd to impute to the legislature a solemn purpose to prohibit Sunday outdoor exercises, and to protect and sanction the cheap indoor shows which are always, whatever their character or tone, demoralizing to the youth who attend them. The conclusion reached by the court in this case seems a severe strain upon the rules of statutory construction.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES B. SELDOMRIDGE

v.

FARMERS' & MERCHANTS' BANK et al., Appts.

(— Neb. —, 127 N. W. 871.)

Sale — title — renunciation by vendee.

1. If a vendor, after selling a quantity of corn so as to pass title thereto without actual delivery, resells it to another person, and executes to each vendee a bill of sale for one half of the grain, the first vendee, by accepting the bill of sale and waiving his right to one half of the grain first sold to him, does not renounce his title to the other half thereof.

Same — grain from mass — necessity for separation.

2. Where a specified quantity of grain, identical in kind and uniform in value, is sold from a mass, a separation is not necessary to vest title, where the intention of the parties that title shall pass is clearly manifested.

Same — without delivery — title — findings — conclusiveness.

3. Whether title to personal property sold, but not actually delivered, passes to the vendee, depends upon the intent of the parties to the transaction, and the question of intent is rather one of fact than of law, so that the finding of the trial court upon that issue in an action at law will not be set aside by this court, unless against the clear weight of the evidence.

Same — rescission — stopping payment on check for purchase price.

4. An order given by a vendee to his banker not to pay a check, drawn and delivered by the former in payment for chattels sold to him, will not in itself work a rescission of the contract of sale.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Kearney County in plaintiff's favor in an action of replevin to recover possession of certain corn. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. A. Chappell, with Mr. J. L. McPheely, for appellants:

The contract of sale between Merryman and the plaintiff was executory, and the title to the corn did not pass to the latter until the delivery of the same; more especially in view of the fact that, prior to the time of the levy, the plaintiff had refused to pay for same, and still refused at the time the levy was made, and therefore repudiated and rescinded the contract.

Where the contract is executory, that is, where the property in the goods has not been transferred to the buyer, the breach of the contract by the latter may consist of a refusal to accept or a refusal to pay.

Messrs. Adams & Adams for appellee.

Root, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in replevin to recover a quantity of corn held by the defendant sheriff by virtue of a levy of a writ of attachment. The plaintiff prevailed, and the defendants appeal.

The evidence is meager, but the record discloses that February 28, 1908, Clyde Merryman owned 2,000 bushels of shelled corn, contained in several bins in his granary. Upon that date Merryman sold to the plaintiff 2,000 bushels of corn, received a check for approximately one half of the purchase price, and agreed to deliver the grain at the plaintiff's elevator in Axtell. The same day Merryman sold in like manner 2,000 bushels of corn to the Hayes-Eames Elevator Company, and received a check for half of the purchase price. Merryman then prepared two bills of sale, purporting to convey to each of his vendees "one thousand and bushels of shelled corn now located in the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section number 28, township 7, range number 16, Kearney county, Nebraska." These documents were given by Merryman to his brother-in-law, a Mr. Wells, with directions to deliver the corn to the respective vendees. Merryman negotiated the checks, paid Wells for delivering the corn, and then absconded. In the forenoon of March 2d, Wells filed the bills of sale with the county clerk, informed the vendees of the transaction, and delivered 348 bushels of the corn to the plaintiff. The corn was accepted, but the plaintiff directed his banker not to pay said check. Subsequently, but before the check was presented, the order was rescinded, and the check thereafter paid upon presentation. At 7 o'clock P. M. on March 2d, the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Axtell caused an attachment to be levied on all of the undelivered corn. The parties waived a jury and tried the case to the district court. The litigants agree that, if title to the 652 bushels of corn vested in the plaintiff before the levy, the judgment of the district court should be affirmed. The litigants stipulated in open court during the trial of the case "that the corn attached is the same corn that had been purchased, except 348 bushels that had been delivered prior to the attachment." This stipulation removes from the case any question concerning the appropriation of the corn to the contract. If Merryman sold this corn to the plaintiff, and received his pay therefor, the sale was perfect, and title vested in the plaintiff. Manual delivery is not always a condition precedent to the transfer of title to personal property bargained and sold. Baker v. McDonald, 74 Neb. 595, 598, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 474, 104 N. W. 923. The chattels should be identified, and, if they form part of a larger mass, should generally be segregated therefrom. In the case at bar, the plaintiff purchased all of Merryman's corn, so that segregation was not necessary for the purposes of identification or appropriation. The fact that Merryman twice sold the identical corn is no concern of the attaching creditor. By acquiescing in Merryman's resale of one half of that corn, the plaintiff did not relinquish his title to the remaining fraction, but from thence forward the vendees became tenants in common of the mass of grain. If it is conceded that Merryman's conduct precludes a finding that he intended to transfer to either vendee title to the 2,000 bushels of grain, it becomes material to ascertain whether the parties intended that title to 1,000 bushels of corn should vest in each vendee. If the acts and declarations of a vendor and a vendee clearly evince an intention to make an immediate transfer of title to a quantity of grain sold from a larger mass of like quality and kind, the title will pass, although there may have been no separation of the quantity sold. Kimberly v. Patchin, 19 N. Y. 330, 75 Am. Dec. 334; Hurff v. Hires, 40 N. J. L. 581, 29 Am. Rep. 282; Horr v. Barker, 11 Cal. 393, 70 Am. Dec. 791; Winslow v. Leonard, 24 Pa. 14, 62 Am. Dec. 354.

Since the intent of the parties must control in determining whether a present vested title to the corn passed to the vendee, the trier of fact, in passing upon that issue, must examine the conduct of the parties in the light of the surrounding circumstances. In the instant case, the corn, so far as we are advised, was of uniform quality and value. It is plain that Merryman did not intend to retain title to the grain, because he twice sold it, then executed a bill of sale to the plaintiff for one half of the corn, applied the plaintiff's money to the payment of the thousand bushels, and finally absconded. Since Merryman did not intend to retain title to any of this corn, but did everything possible short of delivering actual possession thereof to the plaintiff to vest that title in his vendee, we are of opinion that the court was justified in finding the title did in fact pass to the plaintiff. That finding should not be ignored unless it is clearly against the weight of the evidence. Kneeland v. Renner, 2 Kan. App. 451, 43 Pac. 95; Graff v. Fitch, 58 Ill. 373, 11 Am. Rep. 85; Towne v. Davis, 66 N. H. 396, 22 Atl. 450. Upon the entire record we are of opinion that the evidence sustains the finding of the trial court.

The defendants argue, however, that the plaintiff, by stopping payment of his check, rescinded his contract; but we are of opinion that no such consequences followed his order. The check was accepted by Merryman in payment for the grain. If the check had not been honored, doubtless the vendor could have rescinded the contract, but it was paid, and Merryman makes no complaint that, intermediate its execution and payment, the plaintiff stopped payment thereof.

Upon the entire record, we find no error prejudicial to the defendants, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

TRIGGER BREWER, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF ARKANSAS.

(93 Ark. 479, 125 S. W. 127.)

Larceny — lost property — concealment by finder.

A finder is not guilty of larceny because he knows or ascertains who the owner of the property is, and either denies having it or fails voluntarily to return it.

(January 31, 1910.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Independence County convicting him of larceny. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. A. Moore for appellant.

Messrs. Hal L. Norwood, Attorney General, and William H. Rector for the State. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The grand jury of Jackson county returned an indictment against defendant, Trigger Brewer, upon two counts, one charging him with the crime of grand larceny in stealing $40 in money, the property of J. B. Pritchard, and the other charging him with the crime of receiving stolen property. On a change of venue to Independence county, he was tried and convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and appeals to this court.

The prosecuting witness testified, in substance, that he was a traveling salesman, and that one evening about 6:30 o'clock, at Newport, in Jackson county, he entered the coach of a waiting railroad train standing at the station, after having purchased a ticket which he placed in a pocketbook he calls his "credential book," and which also contained his money, and that the book was in the hip pocket of his trousers; that he sat down beside a woman and conversed with her awhile, when defendant came in and talked to the woman a few minutes, and then walked out of the train; that he saw a credential book in the defendant's

Note. — Larceny of property found.

This question was treated in the note to State v. Hayes, 37 L.R.A. 116, to which the present note is supplementary.

A narrow, but distinctive, phase of this question, is involved in People v. Hoban, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1132, and the note thereto appended, on the question of larceny by appropriation of articles of value concealed in goods purchased or in waste matter.

On the question of larceny of money or property delivered by mistake, see the note in 52 L.R.A. 136.

One who has taken, and is in possession of, a stray animal, has such a property interest in it that the taking of it from him may be larceny. So, ownership may be laid in him in an indictment against another for the theft thereof. Maxwell v. Territory, 10 Ariz. 1, 85 Pac. 116.

One with whose wife money is left by the finder, on her suggestion that it may be his, is guilty of larceny if he wrongfully retains it under the claim that he is the true owner. Williams v. State, 165 Ind. 472, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 248, 75 N. E. 875.

It was held in State v. Levine, 79 Conn. 714, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 286, 66 Atl. 529, that one to whom a lost check was handed for information as to the owner, and who, after learning the owner's name, by means of false representations, procured the instrument to be left with him, and subsequently appropriated it, was guilty of larceny. On another theory of the case, it was held that if the defendant accepted the custody of the check to deliver it to its true owner, and subsequently appropriated it to his own use with felonious intent, he was guilty of hand as the latter left the train, but thought nothing of it until he missed his own book a few minutes later; that, after discovering the loss of his book, he went out to look for defendant, but did not find him until he came back in the coach; that he then walked up to defendant and demanded the book; that the latter denied having it, and that he then put his hand in defendant's pocket and drew out the book, with the money still in it. The book contained $40 in money. There was other evidence corroborating the testimony of this witness in each material feature.

Appellant testified that he was to some extent intoxicated that day, and found the pocketbook on the ground near the train, and went into the coach with it in his hand, and so held it while he was talking to Pritchard and the woman, and that, after he left the train, he kept the book in his hand while he made a trip over to a restaurant. He testified that when he went back into the coach, he had the pocketbook in his vest pocket, and when Pritchard took it out of his pocket, said said, "This is mine," he replied, "If it is, you could have had it before now if you had said anything about it." Other witnesses testified that they saw defendant pick up the pocketbook off the ground as he started to get on the train, and that he spoke of it at the time. One witness said he remarked, "Someone has lost this book," and another that he said, "Look here, what I have found," and another that larceny. The court said that the taking of the check by the defendant in the first instance was a lawful and innocent act, but that the felonious intent came when, having been informed of the name of the payee, and thus having notice of a fact which might naturally lead to the discovery of the owner, he changed his attitude in such a way as to amount to a new taking, and appropriated it to his own use.

For another case of larceny of property taken from the finder, see, infra, State v. Dredgen, 6 Penn. (Del.) 446, 73 Atl. 1042. See also the following cases, infra, under "Estrays:" Baxter v. State, Landreth v. State, and Palmer v. State.

By finder.

—generally.

Mere possession of lost property is not prima evidence of guilt; but guilt may be inferred from the possession if no reasonable explanation is given, and it is for the jury to determine, under all the circumstances, whether such inference should be drawn. State v. Hoshaw, 89 Minn. 307, 94 N. W. 873; Palmer v. State, 70 Neb. 130, 97 N. W. 235.

But the finder of lost property does not commit larceny by the simple act of finding and taking it into his possession. State v. Stevens, 2 Penn. (Del.) 486, 49 Atl. 174, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 401.

The mere fact that a person converts to his own use goods found by him does not, as a matter of law, make him guilty of theft. The question of guilt must be determined by the jury from the attending circumstances, such as the description of goods found, the place of finding, the time elapsing between the finding and the conversion, the probability of the owner being discovered, the manner of dealing with the goods, and the effort or want of effort to discover the owner. R. v. Slavin, 35 N. B. 388.

The foregoing statements, it seems, are applicable where the alleged conversion is effected by the pledge of the found articles for a temporary loan. Ibid. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

To constitute the offense, the accused must have had a felonious intent at the time of the finding. State v. Stevens, supra; State v. Briscoe, 3 Penn. (Del.) 7, 50 Atl. 271.

A purse accidentally left in a carriage returned to a livery stable by the hirer is not lost, so as to require the application of the foregoing rule in a prosecution for theft against one who found the purse upon taking immediate charge of the carriage upon its return. Moxie v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 529, 114 S. W. 375.

In the opinion in State v. Hinton (Or.) 109 Pac. 24, involving a stolen check, there is an undercurrent leading to the nice distinction between the actual finding in the first instance, when the article is taken up, it may be through curiosity, and the taking of custody when the nature of the article has been ascertained. This is met by the nice declaration that the fraudulent intent must have been formed when the finder took possession.

But if the intent to steal does not exist at the time of taking possession, no subsequent formation of such an intent will render the original taking theft. Key v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 511, 40 S. W. 296; Warren v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 106 S. W. 382; Crouch v. State, 52 Tex. Crim. Rep. 460, 107 S. W. 859; Worthington v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 178, 109 S. W. 187; Rochell v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 152, 115 S. W. 583.

So, it is error to charge the jury that if the owner of a lost pocketbook gave a truthful description thereof to the finder, and the latter refused to give it to her, at that moment his previous rightful possession became larceny. People v. Hendrickson, 18 App. Div. 404, 46 N. Y. Supp. 402.

One renting a store and finding two barber bottles in a quantity of rubbish therein, which he washed and placed on a shelf and left there for several months, did not, by thereafter selling them, although he subsequently denied the sale, commit the misdemeanor of theft, to constitute which the statute required that the accused must have intended fraudulently to apply them he said, "I have found a book. Do you know who it belongs to?"

The court gave the following, among other, instructions, over defendant's objections: "(2) If you believe from the evidence that the defendant found the pocketbook, and either knew or found out to whom it belonged, and on demand of the owner denied having it, or did not voluntarily return it to him, he would be guilty of larceny, and you should so find." Defendant asked the following instruction, which the court, over his objection, modified by adding the words in italics: "(8) If you believe from the evidence that the defendant found the pocketbook and contents, and within reasonable time thereafter made inquiry as to the ownership thereof, you should find the defendant not guilty as charged, unless you further find that he knew or soon learned who the owner was, and denied having it." Mr. Bishop, in discussing the offense of larceny in the finding and misappropriation of lost property, says: "Unless, therefore, there is a larceny in the original taking, there can be none committed afterward. . . . The law gives to the finder a title in lost goods, but not full and unconditional; and so, if he takes them with the intent to steal them, he commits a larceny, unless this consequence is prevented by the operation of the principles now to be mentioned. A man, knowing the owner of goods, cannot lawfully pick them up without returning them to him; but a man, not knowing the owner, can. The doctrine, therefore, is that if, when one takes goods into his hands, he sees about them any marks, or otherwise learns any facts, by which he knows who the owner is, yet with felonious intent appropriates them to his own use, he is guilty of larceny; otherwise, not. Some of the cases say if he knows who the owner is, or has the means of ascertaining; but the better form of the doctrine is as just set down, because every man by advertising and inquiring can find the owner if he is to be found, while the guilt of a defendant to his own use at the time they came into his possession. Siemers v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 55 S. W. 334.

So, a conviction for the theft of a halter rein is not supported by proof that the finder thereof sold it to a third person, saying that he had found it, and would refund the money paid if anyone should claim it, which he subsequently did. Whitsel v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 42, 90 S. W. 505.

The Minnesota statute makes one guilty of larceny, who finds property under circumstances which give him knowledge or means of inquiry as to the true owner, if he appropriates it to his own use without having first made every reasonable effort to find the true owner. In disposing of a case in which this statute was invoked, the Minnesota court held that both the belief that the owner could be found and the intent to deprive him of his property at the time of the finding must exist to constitute the offense. State v. Hoshaw, supra.

If the finder, from any marks upon the article, knows who the owner is, or if, from the circumstances surrounding the transaction, the owner can be reasonably ascertained, then the fraudulent conversion to the finder's use is sufficient evidence to justify the jury in finding a felonious intent. State v. Stevens, and State v. Briscoe, supra.

And the same rule was invoked where the defendant caused his son, the actual finder of the money, to deliver it into his own custody. State v. Dredde, 6 Penn. (Del.) 446, 73 Atl. 1042.

That a check bears the name of the payee would seem to show that the finder thereof knew, or had reasonable means of knowing, the owner. State v. Hinton, supra.

Where the evidence was uncontradicted that the accused found the property, that 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) he knew it to be the property of the rightful owner, and that he retained it with the expressed purpose of converting it to his own use, the court refused to set aside his conviction on the charge of simple larceny. Flemister v. State, 121 Ga. 146, 48 S. E. 910.

The omission to use the ordinary and well-known means of discovering the owner of goods lost raises a presumption of fraudulent intention more or less strong, against the finder. State v. Briscoe, supra.

A conviction for the theft of a watch was upheld in Rochell v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 152, 115 S. W. 583, where it appeared that the accused found it, but made no effort to ascertain the owner; that he wore it concealed until he moved to another town, where he wore it in the ordinary way; that when its return was demanded by the sheriff, the accused refused to surrender it, but stated that he would hold it for the owner, although persons who were his relatives testified that he stated on the day he came into possession that he had found it.

—of estrays.

It seems that an unbranded animal over one year of age, running at large, was not, at one time at least, the subject of larceny in Indian territory. Dansby v. United States, 2 Ind. Terr. 456, 51 S. W. 1083.

But so far as the necessity for a contemporaneous felonious intent is concerned, the rule regarding the theft of estrays seems to be the same as that relative to the finding of other kinds of property.

It was held in Gosler v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 56 S. W. 51, that to constitute theft of an estray, the accused must have had the fraudulent intent at the time he took up the animal.

must attach at the moment, if ever, without depending on an if." 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 882. Prof. Wharton states the law on the subject thus: "When goods are lost,—i. e., when the owner has no trace of them, and they show no trace of the owner,—the finder has such a special property in them that, according to the now prevalent view, as will presently be more fully seen, even though he feloniously intends to appropriate them when he finds them, it is not larceny. In other words, the mere subjective side is insufficient without the objective. To constitute larceny, there must be not only the intent to steal, but the thing taken must give on its face grounds from which it may be reasonably believed that the owner can be found. If there be no indications of ownership, then the owner may be inferred to have abandoned the goods, and consequently to consent to the finder taking them. In this way we can reconcile the position now before us with the position that when felonious intent and trespass are united in taking a thing, there is larceny. There is not trespass in taking a thing abandoned." 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, 10th ed. § 901. In the note to § 909, the author states the rule to be, as in other larceny cases, that there must be a felonious intent at the time of finding, and cites many cases in support. The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in an opinion by Judge Gray, then chief justice, said: "The finder of lost goods may lawfully take them into his possession, and, if he does so without any felonious intent at that time, a subsequent conversion of them to his own use, by whatever intent that conversion is accompanied, will not constitute larceny. But if, at the time of first taking them into his possession, he has a felonious intent to appropriate them to his own use, and to deprive the owner of them, and then knows, or has the reasonable means of knowing or ascertaining, by marks on the goods or otherwise, who the owner is, he may be found guilty of larceny." Com. v. Titus, 116 Mass. 42, 17 Am. Rep. 138, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 416.

An interesting and instructive discussion on this subject may be found in the case of Griggs v. State, 58 Ala. 425, 29 Am. Rep. 762, where all the authorities are reviewed. Mr. Rapalje, in his work on Larceny and Kindred Offenses (§ 52), adopts the language of the Massachusetts court quoted above, with an addition which reaches to the precise point in the present case: "The finder of lost goods may lawfully take them into his possession, and if he does so without any felonious intent at that time, a subsequent conversion of them to his own use, by whatever intent that conversion is accompanied, will not constitute larceny. Larceny cannot be of lost goods by their finder if his original taking was without a felonious intent, though followed by a felonious asportation; and a charge to the jury that if the defendant, when he found the property, knew or had the means of knowing the owner, and did not restore it to him, but converted it to his own use, he was guilty of larceny, is error, for the reason that if defendant, when he found the property, meant to act honestly with regard to it, no subsequent felonious intention could make him guilty of larceny." So, the rule clearly deducible from the authorities is that if the finder of lost articles neither knows nor has any immediate means of ascertaining the owner, and appropriates them to his own use, he is not guilty of larceny, whatever may be

So, one who finds an estray running with his cattle is guilty of larceny if he takes it, knowing that it is not his own, with the present intent of wrongfully converting it to his own use; but if he finds it and cares for it without the present intent wrongfully to convert it to his own use, he is not guilty of larceny, although he afterwards converts it to his own use with intent to deprive the owner thereof. Crockford v. State, 73 Neb. 1, 119 Am. St. Rep. 876, 102 N. W. 70.

The contemporaneous intent necessary to support a charge of theft against one who took up an estray is not shown by proof that he claimed to have bought it; but that for a time after he took it up he used it openly, claiming it as an estray; and that he took it with him when he moved to another country, and subsequently returned with it. Gosler v. State, supra.

One who appropriates an estray after taking, in bad faith, a simulated bill of sale from one who, he knows, is not the owner, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

is guilty of theft. Baxter v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 43 S. W. 87.

The corpus delicti of theft has been held to be sufficiently established by proof that the accused took up an estray, stating that he did so upon the authority of one who asserted that it belonged to a relative of his who was abroad, that the accused subsequently stated that he had bought it, and that he thereafter took it to another country and traded it. Landreth v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 239, 70 S. W. 758.

An estray running with cattle belonging to the lessee of a range is in the lessee's possession, and not that of the lessor; and the latter is guilty of larceny if he takes the animal with intent to convert it. Palmer v. State, 70 Neb. 136, 97 N. W. 235.

As a defense to theft by the taking of an estray, it cannot be urged that the accused subsequently purchased the animal from someone. Landreth v. State, supra.

his intent at the time. If he does know, or has the immediate means of ascertaining, who the owner is, there must be a felonious intent to steal at the time of the taking in order to constitute larceny; and a subsequently formed intent is not sufficient. The instructions hereinbefore quoted, given by the court, do not square with this rule, for they undoubtedly conveyed to the minds of the jury the idea that if the defendant either knew or afterwards ascertained who the owner was, and denied having the pocketbook, or failed to voluntarily return it, this made him guilty of larceny.

The eighth instruction requested by defendant was incorrect in failing to embrace the idea of good faith in making inquiry for the owner, or of the absence of a felonious intent at the time of the original taking, and the court might well have refused the instruction altogether. But the modification was incorrect, and rendered the whole instruction prejudicial to defendant, by telling the jury in effect that, notwithstanding he had made inquiry for the owner, if he afterwards learned who the owner was, and denied having the pocketbook, he would be guilty of larceny.

There was evidence to warrant a submission to the jury of the questions covered by these instructions, and the error of the court was prejudicial. The court gave other correct instructions on this subject, but they were in conflict with those quoted above, and were therefore calculated to mislead the jury.

Reversed and remanded for new trial.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

JULIUS C. WILLIAMS, Appt.,

v.

J. W. BRICKER et al.

(— Kan. —, 109 Pac. 998.)

Vendor and purchaser — unmarketable title — what constitutes.

1. A title need not in fact be bad in order to make it unmarketable or nonmerchable. The question is whether a reasonably prudent man, familiar with the facts and apprised of the question of law involved, would accept the title in the ordinary course of business; nor is it enough, even, that the court on the whole consider it good. If there be doubt or uncertainty sufficient to form the basis of litigation, the title is unmarketable.

30 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same — facts — conclusion.

2. In an action to recover back purchase money for the failure of the vendor to comply with an agreement to furnish a marketable title, where the parties whose possible claims may affect the title are not before the court, the question of law upon which the title turns will not be determined, but the title will be deemed unmarketable if the question is one upon which it is apparent that other courts might entertain a different opinion.

(July 9, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Cowley County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover back the purchase price paid for certain lands, as to which it was alleged defendants had failed to furnish a marketable title. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. E. Torrance, for appellant:

A good title means not merely a title valid in fact, but a marketable title, which can again be sold to a reasonable purchaser, or mortgaged to a person of reasonable prudence.

Every title is doubtful which invites or exposes the party holding it to litigation. If there be color of outstanding title which may prove substantial, though there is not enough evidence to enable the court to say so, a purchaser will not be held to take it, and encounter the hazard of litigation.

A marketable title means a title which a reasonable purchaser, well informed as to the facts and their legal bearings, willing and anxious to perform his contract, would, in the exercise of that prudence which business men ordinarily bring to bear on such transactions, be willing to accept and ought to accept.

Messrs. Jackson & Noble for appellees.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff and defendant J. W. Bricker entered into a written agreement for the purchase and sale of a farm in Cowley county. The consideration was $35,200. The plaintiff deposited in the bank $1,000, which was to be paid to the defendant provided the defendant, within a specified time, should deliver to the plaintiff a warranty deed for the real estate, "with a good, merchantable abstract of title to the same," when plaintiff was to pay the balance of the purchase money. Alleging that defendant had failed to furnish such title, plaintiff brought this action against Bricker and the bank to recover the $1,000. Bricker answered with a general denial and a cross petition, alleging that he had fully complied with the terms of the contract, that the land thereafter depreciated in market value $10 an acre, and asked damages in the sum of $3,200 against the plaintiff for breach of the contract. There was a trial to the court and a finding that the title tendered was a good, merchantable one, that the averments in the cross petition were true, that the plaintiff had forfeited the $1,000 paid; and the court rendered a judgment against him for $3,200 damages and for costs. For obvious reasons the plaintiff was dissatisfied with the result of the litigation, and brings the case here for review. The only question we have to determine is whether the defendant tendered to the plaintiff a merchantable title.

The land originally belonged to Charles Louis Wiltberger. He died, leaving a will, which was duly probated, by the terms of which he devised to his wife, Emorette A. Wiltberger, a life estate in all his property, and provided that after her death the property should be equally divided among his four children, Walter, Ella, Frank L., and Dora A. Wiltberger. The will then directed as follows: "If any of my children shall die before my wife, Emorette A. Wiltberger, then it is my will that the share which would go to my deceased child or children, if living, shall be divided among his or her children in equal parts; and if any of said children shall die without issue, prior to the death of my said wife, then it is my will that his or her share shall be divided equally among my children then living, or if any of them be dead, then his or her share equally among her children." After the death of Charles Louis Wiltberger, his widow and the four children named in the will conveyed the lands in question by warranty deed to the defendant Bricker, and his title rests upon the will and this conveyance. The widow is still living. Subsequent to the execution of the deed, Frank L. Wiltberger died, leaving surviving him two minor children, and the doubt or menace to the title, if any exists, arises by reason of the possible claim that these children, at the death of their father before that of the widow, took the title which would have vested in him if he had survived the widow, and also the possibility of similar claims in the future by the children of Walter, Ella, and Dora Wiltberger, in the event the latter die before the widow, leaving children.

The appellee concedes that the only question is whether the title was merchantable, but insists that whether or not it is so is always a question of law, and not of fact, and that the only way by which this controversy can be rightly determined is by an examination of the will in question, and a determination by the court in this action whether or not, under the will, the fee to the lands in question vested in the four children of the testator at the time of his death. If it did, counsel say the title is merchantable and the judgment must stand. Such is not our understanding of the law which must control this case. Whether the title is merchantable depends upon whether it is free from reasonable doubt. In McNutt v. Nellans, 82 Kan. 424, 108 Pac. 834, it was said: "In determining whether a title is so doubtful that equity will refuse to compel a purchaser to accept it, the court is not required to pass upon the validity of the title itself; the parties whose possible claims may affect the title are not before the court, and no judgment which the court could render would bind them. . . . A marketable title in equity is one in which there is no doubt involved, either as to matter of law or fact. Maupin, Marketable Title to Real Estate, 2d ed. chap. 31; Herman v. Somers, 158 Pa. 424, 38 Am. St. Rep. 851, 27 Atl. 1050; Fleming 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Burnham, 100 N. Y. 1, 2 N. E. 905; Vought v. Williams, 120 N. Y. 253, 8 L.R.A. 591, 17 Am. St. Rep. 634, 24 N. E. 105." The same rule applies where the question of the sufficiency of the title is raised in an action for specific performance, for the reason that the distinction which formerly prevailed between courts of law and equity with respect to marketable titles no longer exists. The same grounds which would justify a court of equity in refusing to compel the vendee to accept the title will now support a judgment to recover back the purchase money paid. Ladd v. Weiskopf, 62 Minn. 29, 69 L.R.A. 785, 64 N. W. 99; Moore v. Williams, 115 N. Y. 586, 5 L.R.A. 654, 12 Am. St. Rep. 844, 22 N. E. 233; Howe v. Coates, 90 Minn. 508, 97 N. W. 129; Id., 97 Minn. 385, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1170, 114 Am. St. Rep. 723, 107 N. W. 397. "It is a great, though perhaps a common, mistake, to suppose that a doubtful title can be made marketable by an opinion of a court on a case stated between vendor and vendee." Pratt v. Eby, 67 Pa. 396, 404.

In Townshend v. Goodfellow, 40 Minn. 312, 3 L.R.A. 739, 12 Am. St. Rep. 736, 41 N. W. 1056, it is said: "It is not necessary that the title be shown to be bad, nor is it enough, even, that the court may, on the whole, consider it good, if there be doubt or uncertainty about it sufficient to form the basis of litigation; for if there be a doubt, it cannot be thrown upon the purchaser to contest that doubt. . . .

The devisees, including infant heirs, are not parties, and would not be bound by the judgment of the court in this case."

In his classification of cases in which the title will be held doubtful, Maupin on Marketable Title to Real Estate, § 284, enumerates those cases: "(1) Where the probability of litigation ensuing against the purchaser in respect of the matter in doubt is considerable; or, as it was put by Alderson, B., where there is a 'reasonable decent probability of litigation.' The court, to use a favorite expression, will not compel the purchaser to buy a lawsuit. If there be any reasonable chance that some third person may raise a question against the owner of the estate after the completion of the contract, the title will be deemed unmarketable." "(4) Where the title depends on the construction and legal operation of some ill-expressed and inartificial instrument, and the court holds the conclusion it arrives at to be open to reasonable doubt in some other court. Generally, it may be said that the opinion of the court upon any question of law on which the title depends will not render the title marketable if the court thinks that another judge or other competent person might entertain a different opinion upon the same question. The test as to whether a title is doubtful or not upon a question of law has been held to be the certain conviction, of the court, in deciding the point, that no other judge would take a different view."

Authorities might be multiplied to show that the rule is well established that the title tendered need not in fact be bad in order to make it unmarketable or nonmerchandise. The question is whether a reasonably prudent man, familiar with the facts and apprised of the question of law involved, would accept such a title in the ordinary course of business.

The will of Louis Wiltberger clearly expressed the purpose that his widow should take a life estate in the real property in question, that at her death it should pass to such of his four children as should then be living, and to the children of any of the four who had died, the grandchildren to take collectively the shares that would have gone to their respective parents. After the death of the testator, his widow and his four children united in a warranty deed to J. W. Bricker, and the question involved is whether this deed conveyed a perfect and merchantable title. When the deed was made the widow had a life estate, the four children a vested remainder (subject to be divested by their dying before the life estate ended), and the children of these children (there were at least two of them then in being) a contingent remainder. The defendant contends that the general doctrine of Bunting v. Speck, 41 Kan. 424, 3 L.R.A. 690, 21 Pac. 288, controls, although the language of the will there construed differs materially from that of the will in this case; that, under the terms of this will, upon the death of the testator the fee title to the lands vested in the four children of the testator, subject to the life estate of the widow, and subject to be divested by their death before the widow, leaving children surviving them; that the limitation over to the children of the children, depending, as it does, upon an event which may or may not happen, cannot have the effect to retard the vesting of the fee in the children of the testator. It is claimed, therefore, that with the execution of the deed, the life estate and the vested remainder united in the same person and therefore merged together, and that the contingent remainder then expired, because there was no longer a life estate to which it could attach. This result would doubtless follow where the unmodified common law prevails. 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 656, 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 413. It might, however, be seriously questioned whether it follows in Kansas, for this reason, among others: Here the union of two estates in one person does not necessarily result in a merger. Ft. Scott Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Palatine Ins. Co. 74 Kan. 272, 86 Pac. 142; Shattuck v. Belknap Sav. Bank, 63 Kan. 443, 65 Pac. 643. The merging of two estates by their union in a single individual is purely a matter of theory. The two estates are conceived as remaining separate whenever that view is to the advantage of their holder. There is the more reason that they should be kept apart when their merger would operate to the prejudice of one who is not a party to the transaction.

"At law, the rule that whenever a greater estate and a less coincide in the same person without any intermediate estate, the lesser is merged, is invariable and inflexible. In equity, the rules of law as to merger are not followed, and the doctrine of merger is not favored. Equity will prevent or permit a merger, as will best subserve the purposes of justice and the actual and just intent of the parties. Wherever a merger would operate inequitably, it will be prevented. . . . In equity, the merger will be prevented whenever necessary to protect the rights of an innocent third party, or of the person in whom the estates meet." 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 665, 668.

"In equity the legal rule of merger is not regarded as inflexible, and the question whether the doctrine of merger will be applied or not is determined by the intention of the party in whom the estates unite, provided that his intention shall not be enforced to perpetrate fraud or wrong. . . . The equitable doctrine has superseded the legal doctrine almost entirely at this day; for in England the equitable doctrine controls in courts of law by statute, while in many of the United States equitable remedies can be had in courts of law." 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 590, 591.

Merger takes place when a greater and a less estate come together in the same person, and when there is no reason for their longer existence as separate estates. The doctrine has its foundation in the convenience of the parties interested, and therefore, whenever the rights of strangers, not parties to the act that would otherwise work an extinguishment of the particular estate, require it, the two estates will still have a separate continuance in contemplation of law." Moore v. Luce, 29 Pa. 260, 263, 72 Am. Dec. 629.

It might well be argued that a merger ought not to be allowed in this case because it would defeat the purposes of the testator, and deprive his grandchildren of their rights under the will. Since, however, no decision we could render would bind those whose possible claims may affect the title, and any opinion we might express would be merely obiter, it is unnecessary to pass upon the question of law upon which the sufficiency of the title depends. Enough has been said to demonstrate that the question is one upon which other courts might entertain a different opinion, and that, of itself, is a sufficient reason for holding the title tendered unmarketable.

The judgment will be reversed, with directions to proceed in accordance with these views.

v.

FOREST PRODUCTS COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(— N. J. —, 76 Atl. 1024.)

Corporation — agent — implied authority — estoppel — notice.

1. In order that a corporation may be bound by the acts of one as its agent, either upon the ground of an implied authority or of estoppel, it must appear that the corporation is chargeable with notice of the acts or omissions relied upon to establish such implied authority or estoppel.

Same — implied notice.

2. Notice to the person who is alleged to have acted as agent for a corporation is not such notice to the corporation as will suffice to bind it to third persons, upon the ground of implied authority to him to act as such agent, or upon the ground of estoppel.

Principal — act of agent — ratification.

3. The doctrine of ratification is not applicable to a case where the person who makes the contract was not at the time, and did not profess or assume to be, acting on behalf of a principal.

Contract — goods to be manufactured — assignability.

4. Where a contract for the purchase of goods to be manufactured involved personal confidence, it is not assignable by the vendor.

Swayze, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover commissions upon a sale of the staves, said to have been made by the defendant company to one Gaffinel, a resident of France. A careful statement of the facts is required to make the case clear. Victor E. Freeman in 1905 engaged in the business to which the present defendant afterwards succeeded. He proposed to organize a corporation to take over his business, and on November 4, 1905, the defendant was incorporated in New York state. The certificate named Freeman, Evans, and Griffin, the incorporators, as the directors for the first year; but there was no formal meeting of the corporation or of the directors until April 6, 1906. Meantime there had been negotiations by correspondence between the plaintiff and Freeman. The plaintiff's letters were addressed to the defendant. Freeman's replies were in his own name, on stationery bearing the defendant's name as a heading. These negotiations resulted in a contract on January 10, 1906, embodied in a letter of which the following is a copy:

Gentlemen:—

With reference to previous letters touching the question of commissions upon orders for staves for export, which letters have been found to be incorrect, I hereby cancel all those previous letters and conditions of same, as relating to this subject, and in lieu thereof I beg to affirm that I am to pay you commission upon the order contracted with Mr. Christian Gaffinel, of Cete, France, of even date, for 1,000,000 staves, at the rate of one and one-half dollars ($1.50) upon each 1,000 staves, to be paid at the times of, and in proportion to, the periodical part shipments, upon each payment by the consignee.

Very truly yours,
Victor E. Freeman.

Upon the same day a contract was made between Freeman and Gaffinel for the sale of staves to be manufactured. This was in form a written proposal by Freeman for himself, his heirs and assigns, to sell through Schlesinger, and deliver to Gaffinel, 1,000,000 staves. This proposal was signed by Freeman individually and accepted by Gaffinel. On January 11th, Schlesinger wrote the Forest Products Company, calling their attention to the fact that the letter of January 10th referred only to the contract for 1,000,000 staves, and that it was understood that, if any further sale to the same party should be made, Schlesinger should be entitled to his commissions on that sale. There was evidence justifying a finding that this was assented to. A subsequent sale was made in June, 1906, which took the form of a written contract between Freeman individually and Gaffinel. Gaffinel afterwards refused to recognize anyone but Freeman in the transaction. Only a portion of the staves was ever delivered, and the commissions on the purchase price were paid by Freeman. There was evidence from which it might be found that Freeman was repaid this sum by the defendant.

On April 6, 1906, at a meeting of the company, it was resolved to proceed to carry on the business for which it was incorporated. Freeman offered to transfer his business, including contracts for the delivery of staves, and the directors adopted a resolution, which recited that it was the intention of the incorporators to purchase and take over the business now being carried on by Freeman, and proceeded to accept his offer, and to authorize the issue of stock for the property to be transferred.

The learned trial judge charged the jury that the questions were: (1) Whether the contracts for the staves were made between Gaffinel and the company, or between Gaffinel and Freeman; (2) whether the contract for commissions was between Schlesinger and Freeman or between Schlesinger and the defendant company. On this point he added: "The question resolves itself into one of facts as to the intentions of the parties who were involved in this transaction. The question is whether it was the intention of Schlesinger and of Freeman, when these transactions took place, that the company should make the contract, or whether it was the intention of Freeman and Schlesinger that Freeman individually should make the contract. If you shall determine that the intention was that Freeman should be bound, then, of course, the company cannot be liable, and the verdict would have to be for the defendant. It is only when you shall have concluded that the intention of Freeman was to act for the company, in performance of the power given to him to act for the company, that the plaintiff can recover."

He also charged that, if Freeman was acting for himself, the contract would be considered Freeman's contract, and not the contract of the defendant, unless the company at some later time adopted or assumed the contract; and that it was for the jury to determine whether the contract was that of the defendant, through Freeman, an agent, or whether it was adopted by the defendant subsequently by some unequivocal action.

In short, the plaintiff was allowed to recover either upon the theory of an original agency of Freeman, or a subsequent adoption of Freeman's contracts by the company.

First, as to Freeman's original agency: The fair interpretation of the charge, under the facts of this case, is that the defendant was liable if such was the intention of Schlesinger and Freeman. It is obvious that this leaves out the essential element of authority from the defendant to Freeman, either express, or implied from the defendant's conduct, or arising out of estoppel. There is no evidence of express authority. The only evidence from which an implied authority could be inferred is the use of the name of the defendant on stationery and on the office door, and the only evidence to justify a finding that the defendant was estopped to deny Freeman's agency is the failure to call Schlesinger's attention to his error in addressing his communications to the defendant.

In order that the defendant may be bound by these acts and omissions, which were acts and omissions of Freeman alone, it should appear that it was chargeable with notice thereof, and failed to object. Clement v. Young-McShea Amusement Co. 70 N. J. Eq. 677, 118 Am. St. Rep. 747, 67 Atl. 82. Notice to Freeman was not notice to the company, although he was the active manager, since his interests in this respect were adverse to the company, for they would amount to an appointment of himself as agent, without the knowledge of his associates. First Nat. Bank v. Christopher, 40 N. J. L. 435, 29 Am. Rep. 262; Graham v. Orange County Nat. Bank, 59 N. J. L. 225, 35 Atl. 1053; Sudbury v. Merchantville Bldg. & L. Asso. 57 N. J. Eq. 342, 38 Atl. 420, 45 Atl. 1092. The company was not, at the time these letters were written, organized or prepared to do business. It had as yet done no business, and necessarily, therefore, had done nothing to hold Freeman out as authorized to contract on its behalf. Freeman did not even hold himself out as agent, but wrote and signed all the letters as an individual, and in the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) letter of January 10, 1906, canceled in so many words all previous letters, which he writes had been found to be incorrect, and in lieu thereof he distinctly says, "I am to pay you commission;" and thereupon on the same day entered into the Gaffnel contract in his individual name. It would be difficult to show more clearly an intent to become individually responsible. Clearly that was his actual intent, for subsequently, on April 6, 1906, he and the company agreed upon a transfer of his contracts for staves to the company, in consideration of and payment for the stock issued to him, and the company by formal resolution recognized that the business was, up to that time, Freeman's business. The evidence fails to prove facts from which an agency can be implied, or an estoppel to deny agency can arise.

The question of the adoption of the contract is a different one. No doubt the company did adopt, as far as it could, the contract with Gaffnel, and it is urged that it could not receive the benefit of the sale without at the same time incurring the burden of the contract for commissions. This does not follow. The two contracts were distinct, with different parties, and with different objects. If the company adopted the contract between Freeman and Schlesinger, it took the decidedly unusual course of adopting a contract which could only impose a burden upon it,—the obligation to pay the commissions,—and could be of no benefit, since it was already executed on Schlesinger's part, and the customer had already been secured. It is not likely that a precedent of that kind can be found. The contract between Freeman and Gaffnel is different, and the company might well seek the advantage to be derived therefrom. The difficulty is that the doctrine of ratification is not applicable to a case where the person who makes the contract was not at the time, and did not profess or assume to be, acting on behalf of a principal. This subject has been recently discussed with thoroughness in the English courts, and the unanimous conclusion of the House of Lords establishes the rule above stated with most forcible arguments to which we have nothing to add. Durant v. Roberts [1900] 1 Q. B. 629; Keighley v. Durant [1901] A. C. 240. The necessary result is that, even if there had been a contract for commissions between Schlesinger and the defendant, those commissions were never earned, since no contract of sale enforceable by the defendant was ever procured by the plaintiff.

The contract he procured was a contract with Freeman. Whether it could be assigned by Freeman to the defendant, so as to enable the defendant to enforce it as against Gaffinel, depends on whether the contract involved personal confidence between the vendor and vendee. Our supreme court has held that a contract for the sale of trees to be grown is assignable, and the assignee may perform as the representative of the assignor. Parsons v. Woodward, 22 N. J. L. 196. The Queen's bench in England has applied the same rule to an executory contract to repair wagons. British Waggon Co. v. Lea (1880) L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 149, 49 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 321. The decision in the latter case is expressly put upon the ground that the repairs were of such a character that anyone might make them, and probably the court in the former case had in mind the fact that trees to be grown depended more upon the operation of natural forces than the skill of man. The courts have reached a different result where a personal element is involved. Robson v. Drummond, 2 Barn. & Ad. 303; Humble v. Hunter, 12 Q. B. 310; Boston Ice Co. v. Potter, 123 Mass. 28, 25 Am. Rep. 9; Arkansas Valley Smelting Co. v. Belden Min. Co. 127 U. S. 379, 32 L. ed. 246, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1308; Delaware County v. Diebold Safe & Lock Co. 133 U. S. 473, 33 L. ed. 674, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 399. The rule has recently been applied in our own court of chancery to a contract to publish school books. Wooster v. Crane & Co. 73 N. J. Eq. 22, 66 Atl. 1093. The case is an especially strong one, since the assignee was an Arizona corporation, succeeding to the rights of the assignor, a New Jersey corporation, with the same stockholders. The learned vice chancellor relied upon the fact that the complainant had the right to rely upon the safeguards provided by our corporation act, and could not be compelled to accept, in lieu of her contract rights, a claim against a corporation under the laws of another jurisdiction, which might not provide the same safeguards.

The same rule has been applied by our supreme court to a case which manifestly involved personal confidence. People's Bank & T. Co. v. Weidinger, 73 N. J. L. 433, 64 Atl. 179. In Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Mfrs. [1903] A. C. 414, a contract for the supply of chalk for the manufacturers of cement was held to be assignable by one corporation to another, but Lord Halsbury doubted, and only yielded his assent because of the length of duration of the contract, the persons engaged in it, and the nature of the contract itself, while Lord Robertson dissented. The decision was afterwards explained upon the ground that the contract for the supply of chalk for fifty years was to be treated as a contract for the supply to a given cement-making place, and not a personal contract. Kemp v. Baerselman [1906] 2 K. B. 604, 608. In the last case, the defendant had agreed to sell eggs to Kemp, a cake manufacturer. Kemp turned over his business to a corporation of whose 20,000 shares he owned all but 7. The court of appeal held that the defendant was thereby discharged from his obligation. In New York Bank Note Co. v. Hamilton Bank Note Engraving & Printing Co. 180 N. Y. 280, 73 N. E. 48, a contract for the sale of printing presses with a New Jersey corporation was held not assignable to a West Virginia corporation, organized to take over the business and contracts of the former.

Recently the question has been reviewed by the supreme court of North Carolina in an able opinion by Mr. Justice Hoke, in which the general rule was accepted, but held not to be applicable to a contract between a railroad company and an individual, for the cutting from the company's timber lands and the delivery on its right of way of a definite quantity of cordwood, which contract was not to be performed by the contractor personally, and did not require or import any special reliance on his skill or business qualifications. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. v. Atlantic & N. C. Co. 147 N. C. 368, 61 S. E. 185, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 223, 125 Am. St. Rep. 550, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 363. The notes to this case and to Simmons v. Zimmerman, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 850, collect the authorities. The injustice of permitting an assignment of a contract for personal services, for the painting of a picture, for a partnership, is obvious. A contract for the sale of goods to be manufactured stands on similar grounds where the vendee relies upon the skill and experience of the manufacturer, as well as upon the implied warranty of quality. No man who has employed a tailor to make a suit of clothes ought to be compelled to accept a suit made by the tailor's assignee. As Lord Denman said (12 Q. B. 317): "You have a right to the benefit you contemplate from the character, credit, and substance of the party with whom you contract."

"In principle," says Pollock, "however, the intention of a contracting party is to create an obligation between himself and another certain person, and, if that intention fails to take its proper effect, it cannot be allowed to take the different effect of involving him, without his consent, in a contract with someone else." Pollock, Contracts, 7th Eng. ed. 467, 468. He adds (page 471) that rights arising out of a contract cannot be transferred if they are coupled with liabilities, or if they involve a relation of personal confidence, such that the party whose agreement conferred those rights must have intended them to be exercised only by him in whom he actually confided. In the present case, Gaffinel relied in fact upon Freeman's personal performance of the contract, and was careful to stipulate that the staves should be hand-finished by European workmen. We think he was not compelled to accept performance from a corporation to whom it had been assigned. The fact that Freeman agreed for himself, his heirs and assigns, does not make the contract assignable so as to bind Gaffinel. Its object was to bind Freeman's heirs to liability in case of breach, and, so far as concerns assigns, is applicable only to the extent to which the contract might legally be assignable by Freeman; for example, an assignment by him of the money due for staves that might be actually sold and delivered. To hold that these words made the contract assignable in the wider sense would necessitate the conclusion that it might be performed by his heirs at law. A somewhat similar case arose in Wooster v. Crane & Co., cited above.

It cannot be inferred that the corporation, by taking an assignment of the Gaffinel contract, thereby assumed the liability of Freeman on the Schlesinger contract. The Gaffinel contract was treated by the defendant and Freeman as a valuable asset of Freeman, for which stock might properly be issued. The cost of procuring that contract was properly an expense for Freeman to pay; he had his reward in the stock issued to him.

There should have been a nonsuit, and the judgment is reversed in order that a venire de novo may issue.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

JULIA TRUSSELL, Admr., etc., of Richard F. Trussell, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,
v.

MORRIS COUNTY TRACTION COMPANY.

(— N. J. —, 77 Atl. 535.)

Carrier — street railway — duty to passenger.

1. A company operating an electric street railway car is bound to exercise a high degree of care to carry its passengers safely in and upon whatever part of the car they ride with the express or implied consent of the company.

Headnotes by TRENCHARD, J.

Same — riding on step — negligence.

2. It is not negligence per se for a passenger to ride upon the step of the platform of an electric street railway car.

Same — injury — questions for jury.

3. Where the evidence tends to show that the plaintiff's intestate, with the defendant's consent, rode as a passenger upon the step of the platform of the defendant's electric street railway car because there was no room on the platform or in the car, and that while he was so riding, with his back to the road, holding on to the station with his right hand, the servants of the defendant, without any warning to decedent, drove the car at a speed of 20 miles an hour around a "sharp curve," whereby the decedent was thrown to the ground, 10 feet distant from the track and killed, both the questions of the negligence of the defendant and the contributory negligence of the decedent are for the jury.

(September 16, 1910.)

ERROR to the Morris county circuit of the Supreme Court to review a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charlton A. Reed, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff's intestate was not guilty of contributory negligence in riding on the step of the platform.

City R. Co. v. Lee, 50 N. J. L. 435, 7 Am. St. Rep. 798, 14 Atl. 883; Meesel v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 8 Allen, 234; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Ball, 53 N. J. L. 283, 21 Atl. 1052; Brackney v. Public Service Corp. 77 N. J. L. 1, 71 Atl. 149.

As to the question of negligence sufficient to bar the plaintiff from recovery, see—

North Hudson County R. Co. v. May, 48 N. J. L. 401, 5 Atl. 276; City R. Co. v. Lee, supra; Whalen v. Consolidated Traction Co. 61 N. J. L. 606, 41 L.R.A. 836, 68 Am. St. Rep. 723, 40 Atl. 645.

The question of the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate was a question that should have been submitted to the jury.

Consolidated Traction Co. v. Thalheimer, 59 N. J. L. 474, 37 Atl. 142; Bahr v. Lombard, 53 N. J. L. 233, 21 Atl. 190, 23 Atl. 167.

Mr. Willard W. Cutler, for defendant in error:

Note. — Riding on platform of street car as negligence, see notes to Capital Traction Co. v. Brown, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 831, and Lobner v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 972.

Riding on platform of railroad car as negligence, see note to Norvell v. Kanawha & M. R. Co. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 325.

In taking his stand and riding on the step of the platform of the car, the deceased assumed the risk of such damages as were obviously incident to that position.

Whalen v. Consolidated Traction Co. 61 N. J. L. 606, 41 L.R.A. 836, 68 Am. St. Rep. 723, 40 Atl. 645; New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Ball, 53 N. J. L. 283, 21 Atl. 1052; Watson v. Camden & A. R. Co. 55 N. J. L. 125, 19 L.R.A. 487, 39 Am. St. Rep. 624, 26 Atl. 136; Flynn v. Consolidated Traction Co. 64 N. J. L. 375, 45 Atl. 799; Brackney v. Public Service Corp. 77 N. J. L. 1, 71 Atl. 149; Nirk v. Jersey City, H. & P. Street R. Co. 75 N. J. L. 642, 68 Atl. 158.

In actions for the recovery of damages charged to the negligence of a common carrier, it must appear that there has been a breach of duty on its part, or on the part of those towards whom it stands in the position of master, which has produced the injury.

Feil v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. 77 N. J. L. 502, 72 Atl. 302.

Trenchard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the administratrix of Richard F. Trussell to recover damages for his death. At the trial at the Morris circuit the evidence tended to show the facts following: The decedent was a passenger on one of the defendant's electric street railway cars running from Dover to the "ball ground," located between Dover and Rockaway. The car, both inside and on its platforms, was crowded with passengers. Because of the crowded condition of the car, he necessarily took a place on the step of the rear platform, with his back to the road, holding on to the stanchion with his right hand, and while standing in that position paid his fare to the conductor, who made no objection to his riding on the step. The car proceeded with the decedent in that position towards the ball grounds, at a speed of 20 miles an hour, and without slackening speed, and without any warning to decedent, went around a "sharp curve," thereby throwing the decedent to the ground, 10 feet distant from the track, and killing him. When the plaintiff rested, the learned trial judge granted a motion to nonsuit based upon the grounds (1) that the evidence disclosed no negligence upon the part of the defendant company, and (2) that it conclusively appeared that the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence. Upon the judgment entered in pursuance of the nonsuit, the writ in this case was brought, and the nonsuit is assigned for error.

30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

We are of the opinion that the nonsuit cannot be supported upon either ground. A company operating an electric street railway car is bound to exercise a high degree of care to carry its passengers safely in and upon whatever part of the car they ride with the express or implied consent of the company. Scott v. Bergen County Traction Co. 63 N. J. L. 407, 43 Atl. 1060; Hansen v. North Jersey Street R. Co. 64 N. J. L. 686, 46 Atl. 718; City R. Co. v. Lee, 50 N. J. L. 435, 7 Am. St. Rep. 798, 14 Atl. 883; Consolidated Traction Co. v. Thalheimer, 59 N. J. L. 474, 37 Atl. 132; Whalen v. Consolidated Traction Co. 61 N. J. L. 606, 41 L.R.A. 836, 68 Am. St. Rep. 723, 40 Atl. 645. As we have pointed out, the evidence warranted the inference that the decedent was riding upon the step of the platform with the consent of the defendant company. The evidence also tended to show that, under these circumstances, the servants of the defendant company, without any warning to decedent, drove the car around a "sharp curve" at a speed of 20 miles an hour. Clearly the jury might well have found that reasonable foresight upon the part of the defendant's servants operating the car should have anticipated the possibility that the decedent would be thrown from the car, and that reasonable care required that they should guard against it, either by checking the speed of the car, or warning the decedent of the danger. This they did not do. It may be inferred that the managers of the car knew, and the decedent did not know, that the car was about to take the "sharp curve" which was dangerous to the decedent in his situation. The question of negligence of the defendant company was therefore for the jury.

We are of the opinion, too, that the alleged contributory negligence of the decedent was not, under the evidence, a court question. It is not negligence per se for a passenger to ride upon the step of the platform of an electric street railway car. Scott v. Bergen County Traction Co. 63 N. J. L. 407, 43 Atl. 1060; Nirk v. Jersey City, H. & P. Street R. Co. 75 N. J. L. 642, 68 Atl. 158. In City R. Co. v. Lee, supra, Mr. Justice Knapp, speaking for this court, quoted with approval the language of the Massachusetts supreme judicial court in Meesel v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 8 Allen, 234, as follows: "The seats inside the car are not the only places where the managers expect passengers to remain, but it is notorious that they stop habitually to receive passengers to stand inside the car until the car is full, then to stand upon the platforms until they are full, and continue to stop and receive them even after there is no place to stand except on the steps of the platforms. Neither the officers of this corporation, nor the managers of the cars, nor the traveling public, seem to regard this practice as hazardous, nor does experience thus far seem to require that it should be restrained upon the ground of its danger. There is therefore no basis upon which the court can decide on the evidence that the plaintiff did not use ordinary care." It is true that a passenger who voluntarily rides upon the platform step when there is room for him inside the car takes upon himself the duty of looking out for, and of protecting himself against, the usual and obvious perils attendant upon his position, such as the danger of being thrown from the step by the ordinary jolting and swinging of the car. Nirk v. Jersey City, H. & P. Street R. Co. supra, and cases there cited. But, as we have pointed out, the evidence justified the inference that the decedent rode upon the platform step from necessity, because there was no room on the platform, or in the car, and that he occupied that position with the consent of the defendant. Moreover, it was clearly open to the jury to find that the peril which the decedent encountered was not one of those usual and obvious perils attendant upon his position, but rather was the result of the negligent driving of the car. The alleged contributory negligence of the decedent was therefore for the determination of the jury.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and a venire do novo awarded.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

MARY J. MCCOY, Appt.,

v.

SAMUEL C. NIBLICK et al.

(— Pa. —, 77 Atl. 551.)

Husband and wife — deed by woman — repudiation.

A married woman whose husband does not refuse to join in a deed of her real estate cannot avoid her contract to make the sale, on the theory that he has not joined, where the statute gives her the same right to sell her real estate as though she were sole, except that her husband must join in the deed.

(May 24, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Bucks County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate which plaintiff had conveyed by deed which was alleged to be void. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Stuckert, William R. Stuckert, and Francis M. Gumbes, for appellant:

As plaintiff's contract to convey was not made in the manner prescribed by law, it is, as to her covenant to convey, void, and conveyance by her cannot be specially enforced. In respect to the covenant to convey, it was void at its inception.

Bingler v. Bowman, 194 Pa. 210, 45 Atl. 80; Rumfelt v. Clemens, 46 Pa. 455; McCaskey v. Graff, 23 Pa. 321; Jackson v. Summerville, 13 Pa. 359; Rathfon v. Locher, 215 Pa. 571, 64 Atl. 576.

Messrs. Yerkes, Ross, & Ross for appellees.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the first trial of this case a verdict was directed for the plaintiff on the ground that her contract for the sale of her farm, under which defendant took possession, was void because she was a married woman when she signed it, and her husband had not joined in it. The judgment on the verdict was reversed, as her contract was not void under the act of June 8, 1893 (P. L. 344), and, though not specifically enforceable by reason of the failure of the husband to join in it, it was held that a conditional verdict ought to have been directed, securing to McCormick, the vendee, reimbursement for what he had expended on the faith of the contract before notification that the vendor would not convey.

Note. — Effect of nonjoinder of husband in wife's executory contract to convey, where his joinder is essential to a conveyance.

The specific question here raised is as to the rights of the parties to a valid contract by a feme covert to convey real estate, in which her husband did not join, where by statute she cannot convey real estate without her husband joining therein. A rather anomalous situation is presented of a wife having power to make a contract which she is powerless to carry out without the consent of her husband, and his joining therein. But few cases have considered the question. From the few that have, the general principle may be deduced that statutory provisions are not inconsistent because they authorize a feme covert to make contracts of all descriptions, including contracts to convey real estate, to the same extent as if she were a feme sole, but deny to her the right to convey or encumber her real estate unless her husband joins therein. Under such statutes a contract by a wife to convey her real estate is valid although not subject to specific enforcement to him. McCoy v. Niblick, 221 Pa. 123, post, 355, 70 Atl. 577.

The only question raised on that appeal was the correctness of the ruling of the court below that the contract was void. We reversed, and held that the plaintiff could not regain possession of the property until she had reimbursed the vendee; but we so decided upon the theory—seemingly concurred in by both sides—that she against her, where her husband refuses to join with her in a conveyance thereof.

This is the doctrine of McCoy v. Niblick, and also of Wolff v. Meyer, 76 N. J. L. 574, 70 Atl. 1103, affirming without opinion 75 N. J. L. 181, 66 Atl. 959; Brown v. Dressler, 125 Mo. 589, 29 S. W. 13; and Davis v. Watson, 89 Mo. App. 15.

As said by the court in Wolff v. Meyer, supra: "The impossibility of performance of a contract to convey made by a married woman alone is, however, not, strictly speaking, an impossibility in law such as would make the contract void. It is an impossibility which may or may not arise, and is dependent on the will of her husband. One authorized to contract may make a valid contract although the possibility of its performance depends on the will of another."

Corby v. Drew, 55 N. J. Eq. 387, 36 Atl. 827, goes to the extent of holding that equity will not specifically enforce a contract by a married woman to convey her real estate, without reference to whether or not her husband would join therein. This decision was in part, however, based upon the provision of the statute requiring a special form of acknowledgment by a married woman to a conveyance, by which she acknowledged the same to be her voluntary act, the court reasoning that under this provision the contract of a married woman could not be specifically enforced at all, since a court of equity had no power to compel her to sign an instrument declaring the same to be her voluntary act and deed, when, as a matter of fact, the execution of the instrument was not voluntary on her part, but under the coercion of the court. Although the case is not in point as to the facts, this reasoning of the court is disapproved of in Goldstein v. Curtis, 65 N. J. Eq. 382, 59 Atl. 639, which holds that it is not essential to the validity of a deed by a married woman in pursuance of a decree of the court that she should make the statutory acknowledgment; neither is it necessary that she should make any conveyance at all, for the decree of conveyance is self-executing.

Wolff v. Meyer, supra, while denying the right of a person contracting with a feme covert specifically to enforce her contract to convey real estate, where not joined with her husband, nevertheless sustained the validity of such a contract to the extent of holding her liable for damages for a breach thereof by not conveying the real estate in accordance with the terms of the contract.

was not able to perform because her husband had refused to join in the deed. This most clearly appears in the opinion, written by the writer hereof, for we said: "Under the act of 1893, a married woman may 'sell' her real estate, and make any contract 'necessary, appropriate, convenient, or advantageous' to the exercise of her right to sell; but she may not perform her contract to sell without the join-

The same conclusion was also reached in Davis v. Watson, supra, which also sustained the right of a party to a contract with a married woman for the conveyance of her real estate, to recover damages from her for a breach thereof by a failure to convey.

But this case is overruled by Clay v. Mayer, 183 Mo. 150, 81 S. W. 1066, which holds that equity will specifically enforce a contract by a married woman to convey her real estate, where such contract was entered into by her after the passage of the married woman's act authorizing her to make contracts with reference to her real estate. Brown v. Dressler is cited as authority for this proposition.

In the latter case the conclusion apparently reached is that contracts by a feme covert, at least as to self-enforcing mortgages and deeds of trust, may be enforced in equity, but under the protection of the court. In that case the court reasoned that, under the provisions of a statute which gave to a married woman the same right to contract as though a feme sole, she is authorized to make contracts in respect of her property, whether real or personal, and such contracts are alike binding on her and on those with whom she contracts. Construing these provisions in connection with another provision of the statute denying to married women the power to encumber or convey their real estate unless their husbands join in such conveyance, the court said that this section did not authorize a feme covert to convey her real estate as a feme sole, but, on the contrary, required such a conveyance to be by a joint deed with her husband. Construing the two provisions together, the court reached the conclusion that, while the lawmaking power was willing to confer on married women the power to make contracts binding on their real estate, it was unwilling to confer upon them the power of alienating the same absolutely by deed, without the knowledge or acquiescence of their husbands, or to expose them entirely unprotected to the keen edge of self-enforcing mortgages and deeds of trust, but left their contracts of this character to be enforced by and under the protection of the courts. Language is, however, also used which indicates that a court of equity might in a proper case specifically enforce a contract by a married woman to convey her real estate, and it is this language that is quoted and followed with approval in Clay v. Mayer.

A. G. S.

der of her husband in the conveyance. She therefore knows when she enters into a contract to sell that she takes the chances, as well as her vendee, that her husband may not join in the deed, and that neither can compel specific performance if he refuses to join. But she knows that her contract or agreement to sell is a valid one, even if neither she nor her vendee may be able to have it specifically enforced, and therefore, whatever the vendee may pay on it, or expend in pursuance of it, must be returned to him by her, when she finds that she cannot specifically perform.

. . . The refusal of the husband to join in the wife's deed cannot operate to relieve her from liability under her contract, any more than her refusal to join in the husband's would relieve him from liability under his." On the last trial it affirmatively appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff herself, and from the deposition of her husband, that he had not refused to join in the deed, and the only conclusion to be drawn by the jury was that she had refused to convey simply because she rued the bargain. This was no more her privilege than if she had been a single woman. She admitted that she had never asked her husband to join in the deed, and he testified that he had never refused to join in the agreement for the sale of the farm.

The plaintiff entered into a valid contract with McCormick. She handed over her title papers that a proper deed might be prepared for him, and she vacated the premises, and permitted him to take possession of them, but, notwithstanding all this, her right was to retake them, provided she could not make him a deed and would be just to him in the matter of his expenditures. But she had no right to retake possession merely because she would not make a deed. When a married woman cannot perform her contract for the sale of her real estate, the law will not make her; but when she simply will not, it will not help her to escape her covenant. When she cannot carry out an honest contract to sell, she is not morally blamable, and the law will exact nothing more from her than compensation to her vendee for any loss he may have sustained in reliance upon the contract; but when she capriciously will not perform, she becomes not only persona non grata in foro conscientia, but a plaintiff without a cause of action in a suit at law in repudiation of her contract. As to this, the correct instructions of the trial judge to the jury were that the only excuse that would avail the plaintiff in her refusal to make title was her husband's refusal to join in the conveyance, and that if he had not refused to join, and she resorted to a plea of his refusal as a scheme to avoid the conveyance, she could not recover. And the burden was upon her to show her husband's refusal. This is a reasonable rule. An honest woman will try to perform her contract to sell her real estate by asking her husband to join in the deed. This is a very simple matter, and, if the husband refuse, it is an end of specific performance. He may refuse for any reason or for none at all. It is sufficient that he refuse, to release the wife from her agreement to convey, but to release her when he does not refuse to join in the conveyance would be in contravention of the plain spirit of the act of 1893, and would turn it into a piece of legislation in aid of every dishonest feme covert disposed to repudiate her contract for the sale of her real estate, from whim, caprice, or because she imagines or discovers that she ought to have received more money for her property.

At the time of the second trial the husband of the plaintiff was dead, and she was in a position to make a deed to McCormick. As she failed to show that she could not have made it during the lifetime of her husband, and before she brought this suit, she was rightfully denied a recovery by the verdict of the jury, and must now be content with the purchase money to be paid her by her vendee.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

SAMUEL C. NIBLICK et al., Appts.

Note. — This is a companion case to McCoy v. Niblick, ante, 353, and involves the same question as to the effect of the non-joinder of the husband in an executory contract by the wife to convey her real estate, where the wife is authorized by statute to contract for the sale of her real estate, but is denied the right to convey it unless her husband join in the conveyance.

The question is discussed in a note attached to the case as reported, ante, 353, wherein are gathered the few cases involving the question.

Trial — ejectment — conditional verdict.

2. In an action by a married woman to recover possession of her real estate conveyed by a deed in which her husband did not join, under a statute permitting her to sell her real estate in the same manner as if sole, except that her husband must join in the deed, a conditional verdict should be rendered designating the amount to which the vendee is entitled for advancements, improvements, and other charges for which he should be reimbursed.

(May 4, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Bucks County entered upon a directed verdict for plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate which plaintiff had conveyed by deed which was alleged to be void. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Yerkes, Ross, & Ross, for appellants:

The contract was not void on the ground of coverture, and there was evidence to submit to the jury which would entitle the defendant McCormick to set off the payments made by him, and to a conditional verdict.

Sinclair v. Evans, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 384; Reed's Estate, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 503; Jenkins v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. 210 Pa. 134, 59 Atl. 823; Cable v. Cable, 146 Pa. 451, 23 Atl. 223; Hertzog v. Hertzog, 34 Pa. 418.

Messrs. William Stuckert and William R. Stuckert, for appellee:

The alleged agreement between the plaintiff, a married woman, and defendant Wm. M. McCormick for the sale of plaintiff's land, signed by an alleged agent of plaintiff, who was not authorized in writing to sell the same, the husband not having joined therein, is not binding upon such married woman and her husband or upon either of them.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was sufficient shown by the appellants to take appellee's sale of her farm out of the statute of frauds. Wishing to sell it, she sent for Charles F. Vandegrift, a real-estate agent, and asked him to expose it to public sale on March 19, 1906. He did so on that day, after reading the conditions of sale signed by himself as her agent. She was present at the sale, and, after a conference with Vandegrift, authorized him to sell the property to McCormick, one of the appellants, at his bid of $10 per acre, subject to an annuity charge. The property was thereupon knocked down to him, and he signed the agreement to purchase it in the presence of the appellee. On the same day he paid her agent $120,—10 per cent of the purchase money,—in accordance with the conditions of sale, and the agent procured from her and handed over to him the title papers to the property. Shortly before April 1, 1906, when possession of the farm was to be given to the purchaser, the appellee vacated it, and McCormick took possession. He paid the annuity of $100 due April 1, 1906, as well as that due the following year. On April 2, 1906, he tendered the balance of the purchase money and demanded his deed, which the appellee refused to give him. Subsequently he paid fire-insurance tax on the barn and contents, and expended $400 in improving the farm. This ejectment was brought on August 28, 1906, and a verdict directed for the plaintiff, on the ground that her contract for the sale of her farm was void, because she was a married woman when she signed it, and her husband had not joined in it. The case was tried upon that theory alone, and it is the only one advanced on this appeal in asking that the judgment on the verdict be sustained. The effect of sustaining it would be to drive the appellants from the farm and restore it to the appellee without payment by her to McCormick of the percentage of the purchase money which he paid her

Pennsylvania court on this question it would seem that while a wife will be given affirmative relief against the purchaser of her property on an executory contract, where her husband refuses to join in a conveyance thereof, to the extent that she will be permitted to recover the possession of the property which the purchaser obtained under his executory contract, yet as a condition of such recovery she will be required to repay to the purchaser his expenditures under the contract by way of advancements, improvements, etc.

On the other hand a married woman will not be permitted to take advantage of the fact that her husband is required by statute to join in her conveyance of real estate, where he does not bona fide refuse to join therein, and in such a case the court at least will refuse to grant her any affirmative relief.

agent, or reimbursement for what has been paid for annuity dues, fire-insurance tax, and improvements.

There was a time when there would have been no relief for McCormick as the vendee of the appellee, from what he has shown to be her unconscionable conduct; for, until recent years, a married woman, under her plea of coverture, could retake land from her vendee in possession of it without refunding a dollar of the purchase money, though all of it had been paid to her, and without reimbursement for any improvements made, if the land had not been sold or conveyed in the precise mode pointed out by the statute; but this was when her incapacity to contract at all in relation to her real or personal estate was the rule, and her capacity the rare exception. Now her capacity to contract in all respects as if she were unmarried is the rule, and her incapacity the exception. As to her real estate the words of act June 8, 1893 (P. L. 344), are: "A married woman shall have the same right and power as an unmarried person to acquire, own, possess, control, use, lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of any property of any kind, real, personal, or mixed, and either in possession or expectancy, and may exercise the said right and power in in the same manner and to the same extent as an unmarried person, but she may not mortgage or convey her real property, unless her husband join in such mortgage or conveyance." A married woman may therefore no longer repudiate her contract for the sale of her real estate, in which her husband has not joined, on the ground that it is void, and keep what has been paid to her on account of it or expended by her vendee in pursuance of it. Glidden v. Strupler, 52 Pa. 400; Grim's Appeal, 105 Pa. 375, and other cases cited by counsel for appellee, are not now authority for permitting a married woman to profit by her moral dishonesty, except when she undertakes to do what the act of 1893 says she still may not do. For the consequences of not doing that which she undertakes to do by virtue of the powers conferred upon her by that act, she is as answerable for damages as if unmarried.

Under the act of 1893 a married woman may "sell" her real estate and make any contract "necessary, appropriate, convenient, or advantageous" to the exercise of her right to sell; but she may not perform her contract to sell without the joinder of her husband in the conveyance. She therefore knows when she enters into a contract to sell that she takes the chances, as well as her vendee, that her husband may not join in the deed, and that neither can compel specific performance if he refuses to join; but she knows that her contract or agreement to sell is a valid one, even if neither she nor her vendee may be able to have it specifically enforced, and therefore whatever the vendee may pay on it or expend in pursuance of it must be returned to him by her, when she finds that she cannot specifically perform. The words of the act would be meaningless if any other effect should be given to them. The appellee contracted to sell under the power conferred upon her by the statute to make the contract; but, if not able to perform it, she must place her vendee in the same position he was in before he contracted with her. This is the rule as to all persons sui juris; and married women, who now are of this class in the acquisition, ownership, possession, control, use, lease, and sale of their real estate, except when they actually convey, are subject to it. "The act of 1893 gives a married woman the same power that a feme sole has to sell her real estate, except that she may not make a valid conveyance unless her husband joins in the deed." Jenkins v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co. 210 Pa. 134, 59 Atl. 823. Our Brother Stewart, when on the common pleas, properly said of the act of 1893, in Reed's Estate, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 503: "The act makes a clear distinction between the executory contract of sale and the actual conveyance of the wife's land, so far as regards the manner of their execution. It gives her the right to contract for its sale in the same manner, and to the same extent, as an unmarried person; but, when she comes to convey, she may do so only by her husband joining in the deed. If her right to contract for its sale be qualified in like manner with her right to convey, she is no better off with respect to her real estate than she was under the act of 1848. It is this right to contract, and her personal liability in connection therewith, that marks the advance made. The refusal of the husband to join in the wife's deed cannot operate to relieve her from liability under her contract, any more than her refusal to join in the husband's would relieve him from liability under his. Can there be any doubt that the damages in both cases would be measured by the same standard? The only possible difference between the two as to result is that the husband could be required to perform specifically, so far as his own estate in the land is concerned, while performance could not be decreed against the wife on her contract, since her individual deed would be ineffectual for any purpose. This difference emphasizes the distinction found in the act. The wife's contract, unlike that of the husband, conveys no interest in the land, legal or equitable, but creates a personal liability only."

The appellee is entitled to regain possession of her land only after paying McCormick what a jury may find is due him for the purchase money, the annuity, and the fire-insurance tax paid by him, and for whatever expenditures he made for improvements before he was notified that the contract would not be specifically performed because the husband of the appellee would not join in the deed. This equitable result would have been reached by a conditional verdict which the jury ought to have been directed to render, if they believed the facts testified to by the appellants and their witnesses.

As to the first assignment of error, which complains of the court's permission to the appellee to reopen her case after she had closed, and there was an intimation that a nonsuit would be directed, nothing more need be said than that it was not an improper exercise of judicial discretion.

The first, second, and third assignments of error are overruled. The fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth are sustained, and the judgment is reversed, with a venire facias de novo.

Lansden, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before us upon a certiorari to a decree of the court of civil appeals, reversing the decree of the chancellor, dismissing the complainants' bill.

The facts necessary to be stated are that Mrs. Wester is the owner of a small tract of land in Roane county, and she joined her husband in a deed of trust for the purpose of securing a debt which her son owed to the defendant Hurt, and after signing the deed it was taken to the notary public, who called Mrs. Wester over the Note. — Validity of acknowledgment or oath taken over telephone.

There appear to be but two cases, in addition to WESTER v. HURT, passing upon the validity of an acknowledgment or oath taken over the telephone.

In Banning v. Banning, 80 Cal. 271, 13 Am. St. Rep. 156, 22 Pac. 210, it appeared that the validity of an acknowledgment to a deed was questioned upon the ground that at the time the deed was acknowledged by the defendant, who was a married woman, she was "not visibly, and therefore not personally, present before the notary at the time he took her acknowledgment through a telephone, she then being 3 miles distant from him." To this objection the court said: "It is admitted that the certificate of the notary is in due form; and it is not alleged or pretended by the defendant that she did not voluntarily sign and deliver the deeds; nor that she did not voluntarily, and without the hearing of her husband, acknowledge the execution of them through the telephone, after having been informed by the notary of their contents; nor that any deception or fraud was practised to induce her to execute the deeds; nor even that the plaintiffs had notice of the manner in which it is alleged that she acknowledged the execution through the telephone. These particulars are not stated for the purpose of maintaining that, under any circumstances, an acknowledgment of a deed may be taken through a telephone, but for the sole purpose of showing that there is no pretense of fraud, duress, or mistake." Then the court, after reviewing a number of decisions holding that a notary's certificate of acknowledgment is telephone and attempted to take her privy examination by a conversation in this way. The court of civil appeals held that his acknowledgment was invalid, and granted to Mrs. Wester the relief she prayed by canceling the deed of trust.

The deed of a married woman living with her husband, conveying her general estate, is void without her privy examination. The form of this examination is prescribed by statute (Shannon's Code, § 3753), and every material part of this form is necessary to make the probate of the deed valid upon its face. The action of the officer taking the acknowledgment is a judicial one, and establishes by judicial force: (1) That there was a personal interview between him and the bargainer; (2) that this interview was private and apart from the husband; and (3) that the execution of the deed was confessed to have been made freely, voluntarily, and understandingly, and without compulsion or constraint from her husband, for the purposes therein contained.

When a deed has a certificate attached to it containing all of the material parts prescribed by the statute, and signed by the proper officer, it establishes the probate of the deed as a matter of judicial determination, and this probate cannot be attacked by extrinsic evidence showing any mere irregularity. It can only be overthrown by proof of fraud or duress, and by a causal connection of the grantee with the fraud.

These conclusions are abundantly established by all of our authorities. It is clear that if the officer taking the privy examination of the married woman does not have a personal interview with her, and does not propound the required questions to her while in her presence, he cannot determine judicially whether the deed has been executed in the manner and under the conditions that the law requires in order to make a valid conveyance of a married woman's estate. This is manifest from the language of the statute itself. The officer is to determine as a matter of judicial judgment that she did execute the instrument freely, voluntarily, and understandingly, and with-conclusive as to the facts stated therein except where fraud is shown, held that the acknowledgment, in the case at bar, was valid. The inevitable conclusion of such a holding seems to be that where an acknowledgment to a deed is taken over the telephone, and the certificate of acknowledgment is in regular form, it is valid, and cannot be impeached except where fraud is established.

In Sullivan v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 228, 83 S. W. 421, it was held that an oath to an affidavit which was required by statute to be administered in the mode most binding upon the conscience of the individual taking the same, and made by the affiant in the personal presence of the officer, could not be administered over the telephone, although the officer recognized the voice of the affiant. Gill, J., said: "The law requires the affiant to be in the personal presence of the officer administering the oath; not to the end that the officer may know him to be the person he represents himself to be, for it is not required that the affiant be identified, or introduced, or be personally known to the officer, but to the end that he be certainly identified as the person who actually took the oath." And then in considering the question with relation to a possible prosecution for perjury he continued: "It may be true that the officer, when he takes the affidavit of one well known to him, might recognize his voice over the telephone, and therefrom be able to testify that he took the oath and made the affidavit in issue. But it must be borne in mind that the law does not require the clerk or notary to be acquainted with one who becomes an affiant before them. A stranger may appear, sign an affidavit, and demand that the officer swear him and affix his jurat. In that case the officer certifies and can swear to no more than that the man who affixed the name to the affidavit swore to its truth. The name he signed may have been fictitious, but the individual swore to it as the clerk or notary certified, and he would be subject under that name or his true one to a prosecution for perjury. Now, if the contention of appellant is sound [that personal presence of affiant was not required], the rule must be laid down broadly, and whoever might demand the official jurat by his personal presence might also demand it over the telephone. Had it not so happened in this case that the clerk was acquainted with Sullivan, and identified him by his voice, he could have done no more than certify that a man whom he did not know, but who represented himself to be Sullivan, authorized the name of Sullivan to be signed to the affidavit and swore its contents were true. The clerk could not possibly identify him as the one making the affidavit if the question should afterwards arise. In a prosecution for perjury, such testimony on the part of the clerk would not even raise an issue against the unknown affiant. So, we hold that not only is the personal presence of the affiant required, to the end that by appropriate form and ceremony his conscience may be bound, but that it is required . . . that the officer may see and know that the man who signs also swears. No modern business necessity requires the broadening of these rules. To allow the contention of appellant would be to open a broad door for fraud and imposition, and hold out to the perpetrators a tempting chance for immunity from discovery and identification." E. M. S.

out compulsion or constraint from her husband; and this he cannot do out of her presence, because her appearance, manner, and demeanor may become more potent factors in ascertaining the truth of this than mere formal answers to questions.

The language employed by the legislature in prescribing the form of the certificate made by the officer taking the examination precludes a construction which would uphold an acknowledgment taken in this way, and therefore it was clearly not within the legislative intent that this should be done.

We are of opinion, therefore, that this attempted privy examination of Mrs. Wester was a mere empty form, unauthorized by the statute, and the certificate made by the officer, although it contained the proper words, does not establish the facts certified to. The decree of the Court of Civil Appeals, reversing the decree of the chancellor, is therefore affirmed.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Yell County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for loss of a team and wagon, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

A greater degree of care and precaution is imposed upon a bridge company with a franchise to take toll, than upon a mere municipality, charged only with keeping the public highway in repair for the use of the public, without toll.

Frauenthal, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to recover the value of a team of mules and a wagon which fell from defendant's bridge, and were lost. It was alleged in the complaint that the loss was due to the defendant's negligence in failing "to have a safe and sufficient guard

Note. — Rights and duties of toll-bridge proprietors.

The earlier cases upon this subject are collected and discussed in a note to Clarks-ville & R. Turnp. Co. v. Montgomery County, 58 L.R.A. 155, and this note is supplementary thereto.

The more recent cases are not very numerous, for it is apparently the policy of counties and municipalities to abolish toll bridges and toll roads, and, by purchasing the bridges from the proprietors, convert them into free bridges.

This note is confined to toll bridges, and does not include cases involving free public bridges, or private bridges, or bridges built and maintained solely for the purpose of carrying the trains of certain railroads.

Rights and duties in general.

Equity has jurisdiction to restrain a street railway company's unlawful use of a rail properly braced and strong enough to insure safe passage over said bridge, and to prevent frightened teams from breaking through into said river." The defendant owned and operated a bridge across the Arkansas river, near the town of Dardanelle, and charged and collected fare for the crossing of persons and property over it. The plaintiff had driven his mules and loaded wagon upon the bridge, and was crossing over same, when the mules, either from fright or other cause, backed the wagon against the railing of the bridge, which broke and gave way, and the mules and wagon were precipitated into the river. The mules were drowned and the wagon lost. The testimony on the part of the plaintiff tended to prove that the bridge was built of boats, and was what is known as a "pontoon" bridge. Along its sides the defendant had built a railing or barrier. This railing was composed of upright posts, upon which was fastened a plank or streamer. The posts were made of pine, and were fastened to the bottom of the boats with bolts. The testimony on behalf of the plaintiff tended to prove that the posts were not built of strong wood; that the timbers in the railing were light and frail, and that the posts and railing were not braced; that, because the posts were not braced, the railing was not substantial and not strong enough to withstand the weight of a wagon that might ordinarily be expected to be pressed against it. And the testimony tended further to prove that, if the

An electric railway company has the right to cross a public toll bridge on payment of adequate toll, where the statute gives it the right to use "any street or highway." Ibid.

A railroad corporation having no authority under its own charter to acquire and exercise the rights, powers, and franchises of a toll-bridge corporation, or to carry on the business of such other corporation, does not succeed to such rights, powers, and franchises of the toll-bridge corporation by purchasing the whole property employed by the bridge company in maintaining its bridge. Southern R. Co. v. Mitchell, 139 Ala. 629, 37 So. 85.

Power to construct railroad toll bridges is not destroyed by the amendment of a statute providing for the formation of corporations to construct bridges, by striking out a provision requiring the articles of incorporation to state whether the bridge is to be for railroad or other purposes, and remitting incorporators to the general provisions of the statute in forming their articles of incorporation, without mentioning railroad purposes as one for which a bridge may be constructed. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. v. Stone, 174 Mo. 1, 63 L.R.A. 301, 73 S. W. 453.

A writ of peremptory mandamus, commanding that a toll bridge should be reconstructed and altered so as to accommodate ordinary road travel, will be denied where it appears that the bridge, for nearly thirty years, had been used exclusively as a railroad bridge, and in fact had never been used for ordinary travel, and had, within a few years, been reconstructed, and the bonds issued to pay for such reconstruction had been guaranteed by the railroad company. State ex rel. Crow v. Boonville Bridge Co. 206 Mo. 74, 103 S. W. 1052.

In State Road Bridge Co. v. Saginaw Circuit Judge, 143 Mich. 337, 106 N. W. 394, the court refused to issue a writ of mandamus to the circuit judge, directing him to vacate an order granting a preliminary injunction restraining a toll-bridge company from collecting tolls over its bridge, upon the ground that the plaintiff had mistaken its remedy; but the court said that the injunction was improperly issued, as the result was to deprive the company of its property on a mere preliminary hearing.

The mere interest of a plaintiff as a citizen and resident of a town and parish is insufficient in law to maintain an action to compel the authorities to invest the surplus revenues arising from the operation of a toll bridge, and use the interest accruing therefrom for the maintenance and operation of the structure as a free bridge; it not being even alleged that plaintiff had ever used the bridge or expected to use it, or had been or would be injured by the collection of tolls. Laforest v. Thibodaux, 117 La. 266, 41 So. 568.

A toll bridge substituted for a ferry will be charged with the license or privilege of free passage resting on the ferry, where its owner continued to use for the bridge the easement for a highway over adjoining lands, in consideration of which the free passage had been granted. Dupont v. Charleston Bridge Co. 65 S. C. 524, 44 S. E. 86.

And one entitled to the right of free passage over a toll ferry in consideration of an easement given to the company for a highway over a portion of his land does not lose such right by the payment of tolls on the bridge, made under protest, and with the assertion of a right of free passage. Ibid.

A toll bridge, like a toll road, is a public highway, burdened with the legislative grant of a right to the proprietor to charge tolls for passage thereon. Montgomery County v. Clarksville & R. Turnp. Co. 120 Tenn. 76, 109 S. W. 1152.

—exercise of power of eminent domain.

The power of eminent domain may be exercised to secure property needed for the construction and maintenance of a toll bridge. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. v. Stone, supra.

Changing the words "to the uses of said railing had been built of heavier and sounder timber and the posts properly braced, it would have withstood such pressure. And we are of opinion that there was some evidence adduced in the case which was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the railings were not constructed and maintained in such a proper and substantial manner as was necessary to secure the safety of teams that ordinarily crossed the bridge, and which might press against the railings with such force as might be, in the exercise of due care and caution, expected and foreseen; that the loss was due to the insecure and unsubstantial manner in which the railing was constructed and maintained; and that the plaintiff was at the time in the exercise of due care.

At the request of the plaintiff, the court gave the following instruction: "(1) If you find that the defendant owned and operated a bridge across the Arkansas river for the transportation of freight and passengers for toll, it was bound to use reasonable skill and diligence in providing against the ordinary dangers of travel, and to provide and maintain a reasonably safe bridge; and if guard rails and banisters be reasonably necessary for that purpose and practicable, it was bound to construct and maintain them in the places needed and of sufficient strength to be reasonably safe; and, if you find that the defendant failed to so construct and maintain or keep in repair the said bridge, by reason of which the injury corporation," in the section of a statute providing for the creation of bridge companies, which specifies for what purposes property may be acquired under the power of eminent domain, so as to read "for approaches, road, foot, or wagon ways," does not indicate an intention to deprive a company organized to construct a railroad bridge of the power to condemn property for terminal accommodations for the use of such railroads as may desire to use the bridge, since the word "road" may be held to include railroad. Ibid.

The use of a public toll bridge for an electric railway, on payment of adequate tolls, is not a taking of or injury to the property in the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Pittsburg & W. E. Pass. R. Co. v. Point Bridge Co. supra.

Approaches.

The fact that a corporation organized to build a bridge is not expressly authorized by its charter to obtain approaches by an exercise of the power of eminent domain does not bring an attempt to secure such approaches in a foreign state within the operation of a constitutional provision of such state, forbidding any company to engage in business other than that expressly authorized by its charter. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. v. Stone, supra.

The approaches to a toll bridge and its abutments, as well as the bridge proper, must be kept in repair by the owner, the whole having been erected by him, and, so far as appears, no duty resting upon the public to maintain the approaches or abutments as a part of the highway. The defect complained of having existed for a considerable period of time, no question could properly arise as to the duty of the owner to take notice of it. Augusta v. Hudson, 94 Ga. 135, 21 S. E. 289.

The legislature may lawfully grant franchises to erect a toll bridge, which will include the right to provide proper and suitable approaches, and to lay rails thereon for the accommodation of railroad traffic, for the benefit of which the bridge is to be erected. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. v. Stone, supra.

Erection of competing bridges.

The police jury of a parish has the right to restrain by injunction the operation of a free bridge or ferry within the distance from a public toll bridge prescribed by statute or ordinance. Lafourche v. Robichaux, 116 La. 286, 40 So. 705.

In determining the limits prescribed in a statute authorizing the erection of a toll bridge, and providing that no other bridge should be erected within half a league "above the said bridge and below the same bridge," the distance is to be measured along the course of the river. Rouleau v. Pouliot, 36 Can. S. C. 224.

Duty as to maintenance of bridge.

Toll-bridge proprietors are not insurers of the safety of persons paying tolls thereon. Washington, C. & A. Turnp. Co. v. Case, 80 Md. 36, 30 Atl. 571.

Nor is the proprietor of a toll bridge a common carrier. Gibler v. Terminal R. Asso. 203 Mo. 208, 101 S. W. 37, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1194.

The authorities substantially agree that ordinary care is all the law requires of the owners of toll bridges, but to constitute ordinary care, the care must be proportionate to the danger to be apprehended. Ibid.

It is not error to refuse an instruction that a bridge company is liable for defects in the bridge, however such defects were caused, and notwithstanding that the company had no knowledge thereof. Hellyer v. Trenton City Bridge Co. 133 Fed. 843.

In an action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of a toll-bridge company, it is error to refuse to charge the jury that if the injury complained of was caused by the accidental displacement of a single plank on the bridge, of which the company had no notice, and could not, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have known, then the verdict must be for the defendant. Washington, C. & A. Turnp. Co. v. Case, supra.

complained of occurred, you will find for the plaintiff."

At the request of the defendant, the court gave, among other instructions, the following:

"(3) Defendant is not an insurer of the safety of property carried over its bridge; nor is it required to keep guard rails of such strength that they will not give way or break under any circumstances, or resist extraordinary pressure. It is only required to use ordinary care to keep its guard rails in a reasonably safe condition, which means a condition of safety under ordinary circumstances."

"(5) Before you would be justified in finding for the plaintiff, you would have to find from the evidence that, at the time of the accident, the bridge, by reason of the defective guard rail, was insufficient to furnish protection to teams under such conditions and circumstances as were likely to occur on said bridge; and you would have to find further that such defective condition existed and was caused by defendant's failure to use ordinary care.

"(6) Before you would be justified in finding for the plaintiff on account of the defective guard rail, as alleged in the complaint, the proof would have to show that, in order to furnish protection to wagons and teams crossing said bridge under the usual and ordinary circumstances, it was necessary to have guard rails of greater strength and sufficiency than the ones shown to have given away; and, further, that the failure to

But in St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Miller, 138 Ill. 465, 28 N. E. 1091, it was held that a bridge company authorized to construct and maintain a toll bridge, and to collect and receive tolls of such persons as make use of it, is to be held to a higher degree of diligence in caring for the safety of passengers crossing the bridge than a corporation performing that service for the public gratuitously would be.

Of course, a toll-bridge proprietor is liable for injuries proximately caused by its failure to use ordinary care to keep the bridge reasonably safe for traffic.

Thus, a toll-bridge company which maintains a covered toll bridge is liable for injuries proximately caused by its failure to light the bridge at night. Conowingo Bridge Co. v. Hedrick, 95 Md. 669, 53 Atl. 430.

So, a bridge company is liable for injuries to a foot passenger, caused by a drove of mules stampeding on the bridge, and getting from the carriage way to the footpath, which were not separated by any railing or barrier, and squeezing and crushing the plaintiff against the outer bridge railing. St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Miller, supra.

And in Fox v. Union Turnp. Co. 59 App. Div. 363, 69 N. Y. Supp. 551, the court said: "A turnpike road is a public highway, and the same duty rests upon a turnpike company to keep its roads and bridges reasonably safe for ordinary travel that rests upon municipalities with reference to roads and bridges owned and maintained by them. The absence of a guard or railing where one is needed to make a highway reasonably safe is a defect."

An instruction that, by the term "ordinary care," as applied to a toll-bridge proprietor, is meant such care as a prudent operator of a toll bridge would exercise under the same or similar circumstances, although unhappily worded, is not misleading or confusing. Gibler v. Terminal R. Asso. supra.

Where a mule which was being driven to a wagon over a toll bridge owned and kept by a city became frightened by a train on 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) a railroad near by, ran away, and, because of the absence of a guard rail from the approach to or abutment of the bridge, was precipitated from the structure down a high embankment, the absence of the guard rail was a sufficiently proximate cause of the catastrophe to render the city liable for injuries to person and property thereby occasioned, if such absence was due to the city's negligence. Augusta v. Hudson, supra.

It is the legal duty of the proprietor of a toll bridge to construct and maintain a railing between the carriage road and the footpath, for the protection of foot passengers, if such railing is the most obvious and appropriate expedient for preventing injuries likely to happen to foot passengers, even if such a railing is not commanded or indicated, either by the law or by the defendant's charter. St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Miller, supra.

Tolls.

The right to exact tolls on a public bridge does not carry with it the power to prohibit such use of it by the public as is reasonably consistent with its public purposes. Pittsburg & W. E. Pass. R. Co. v. Point Bridge Co. 165 Pa. 37, 26 L.R.A. 323, 30 Atl. 511.

A statute authorizing a corporation to construct a bridge and "take reasonable tolls" for the use of such bridge, and authorizing it to establish rules and regulations governing the use of such bridge, does not, by implication, give the corporation the right to prescribe the rate of tolls, so that a statute giving the board of county commissioners power to prescribe tolls is not unconstitutional, as taking away the vested rights of the bridge company. Tallassee Falls Mfg. Co. v. Commissioner's Ct. 158 Ala. 263, 48 So. 354.

—vehicles subject to tolls.

The right of a toll-bridge company maintaining a bridge over which passes a highway, to exact tolls, is confined to the vehicles and animals specified in its franchise, and will not be construed by implihave rails of greater strength was caused by the negligent failure of defendant to use ordinary care."

The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed to this court.

It is contended by counsel for defendant that the evidence adduced in the trial of this case was not sufficient to impose a liability upon it, and was not sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury. The determination of that question depends upon the duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiff as one of the traveling public over its bridge, and the manner in which defendant has performed that duty. The defendant was the proprietor of a bridge, and made a charge against the public for crossing same. It thereby became its duty to exercise reasonable and ordinary care and prudence in the construction and maintenance of its bridge for the safety and protection of those using it, and to make reasonable provisions to prevent injuries from causes which were likely to arise in the ordinary use of the bridge. A toll bridge should be so constructed that it shall be safe for travel; and the degree of the strength of the structure must be determined by the use which is fairly to be expected to be made of it. It should be constructed in a manner strong enough to sustain those weights and to protect from injury that character of property which may fairly be expected to cross over it. While not an insurer of the person or property of its customer, the proprietor of a toll bridge is bound to exercise care to see that it is reasonably safe and secure for the purpose for which it was erected and is used. The liability of the proprietor of the bridge is founded upon negligence; and his negligence arises from the failure to exercise the necessary care in seeing that the bridge is safely constructed and maintained. If guard rails are reasonably necessary for the safety of travelers and their property in crossing the bridge, then the owner would be liable for an injury which was caused by a failure to construct and maintain such railing or barrier. In 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 1005, it is said: "Where a rail or barrier is reasonably necessary for the security of travelers on the road, which, from its nature, would be otherwise unsafe, and the erection of which would have prevented the injury, it is actionable negligence not to construct and maintain such a guard or barrier." Little Rock Traction & Electric Co. v. Dunlap, 68 Ark. 291, 57

Bicycles and tricycles were held in Cannan v. Abingdon, 69 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 517, to be carriages, within the terms of a statute prescribing the rates of tolls to be charged on certain designated carriages "or other carriage whatsoever."

But this decision was questioned in Simpson v. Teignmouth & S. Bridge Co. 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 204, where it was held that bicycles did not fall within the terms of a statute providing that tolls might be exacted for every "coach, chariot, hearse, chaise, berlin, landau, and phaeton, gig, whisky, car, chair, or cabriolet, and every other carriage hung on springs, . . . and for each horse or other beast of draught drawing the same. . . ." The court said that while a bicycle would come within the general terms of a carriage hung on springs, yet it was clear that the statute was intended to embrace only carriages drawn by animals.

And in Smith v. Kynnersley, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 357, it was held that bicycles were not included within the statute prescribing tolls for "every sledge, drag, or such like carriage."

Taxation.

A toll bridge is subject to the maximum tax imposed by a statute which provides for a tax upon toll bridges, graduated in accordance with the size of cities within a certain distance thereof, where a city of the 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

maximum size is within the prescribed distance, although a city of the smaller class may also be within such distance of the other end of the bridge. Southern R. Co. v. Mitchell, 139 Ala. 629, 37 So. 85.

A toll bridge is subject to taxation as such, notwithstanding it has a second deck or story, carrying a railroad track. Ibid.

A toll bridge is subject to state taxation where it is wholly within the state, and used for state traffic, notwithstanding the structure also carries trains engaged in interstate traffic; and the fact that the bridge is on the railroad's right of way is immaterial. Ibid.

The correct method of fixing the value in one state of the franchise of a toll-bridge company whose bridge lies partly in one state and partly in another is to take such proportion of the total value of the bridge as the length of the bridge within the state bears to the whole length of the bridge, and deduct therefrom the valuation of the tangible property within the state. Com. v. Covington & C. Bridge Co. 114 Ky. 343, 70 S. W. 849.

Termination of franchise.

When the right to take tolls expires, there immediately arises the right of the public to use the bridge as a free one, without any right on the part of the builders or their successors to remove the structure and destroy the highway. Montgomery County v. Clarksville & R. Turnp. Co. 120 Tenn. 76, 109 S. W. 1152.

A corporation whose corporate life was

S. W. 938; 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1101; Eads v. Marshall (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 170. The guard rail should be effective for the purpose for which it is erected, and should therefore be constructed and maintained in such a reasonably strong and substantial manner as to withstand the ordinary weights and forces that may be likely expected to be pressed against it. This is necessary in order to put the railing in a safe condition for the travel in the ordinary manner over such bridge. Whether or not the railing is in such condition is a question to be determined by the jury, under the peculiar circumstances of each case. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1019; Wharton, Neg. 2d ed. § 103.

In the case of Walrod v. Webster County, 110 Iowa, 349, 47 L.R.A. 480, 81 N. W. 598, it appears that the horses became frightened and pressed up against the rail of the bridge, which gave way, and the horses fell from the bridge. In that case it was held that there was a liability to the owner of the horses in event the accident would not have happened if the railing had been reasonably substantial, and that this was a question for the jury to determine. In 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 942, it is said: "It is the duty of a bridge proprietor to provide and keep in repair proper railings, so far as they are necessary to secure the safety of travelers, and a failure of this duty affords a ground of action to one sustaining injury in consequence." See also St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Aven, 61 Ark. 149, 32 S. W. 500; Tift v. Towns, 53 Ga. 47; Rosedale v. Golding, 55 Kan. 167, 40 Pac. 284; Townsend v. Susquehanna Turnp. Road Co. 6 Johns. 90; Palmer v. Andover, 2 Cush. 600; Gage v. Pontiac, O. & N. R. Co. 105 Mich. 335, 63 N. W. 318.

In the case at bar we think that the jury were warranted in finding that railings upon the bridge were reasonably necessary for the safety of travelers and their property, and that there was some evidence tending to prove that the railings that were provided were not reasonably substantial enough and suitable for the safety of the persons and their property that ordinarily might be expected to cross the bridge, and to sustain the weights that ordinarily might be expected to press against them. We are of opinion, therefore, that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, and that the court did not err in giving instruction No. 1 at the request of the plaintiff.

The defendant requested the court to in-limited both by its articles of association and by the Constitution of the state to thirty years, which, upon its incorporation, secured from the board of supervisors a franchise to bridge a navigable stream and take tolls, cannot, merely by renewing its corporate life for a further period of thirty years, under act No. 328, Public Acts 1905, extend its franchise for taking tolls beyond the original thirty-year period. Rockwith v. State Road Bridge Co. 145 Mich. 455, 108 N. W. 785.

But the legislature may extend the time for taking tolls by a bridge company. State ex rel. Seiders v. Bangor, 98 Me. 114, 56 Atl. 589.

A county may maintain an action to restrain a bridge company from collecting tolls for passage over its bridge after its right to collect such tolls had ceased by reason of the expiration of the time fixed in its charter. Montgomery County v. Clarksville & R. Turnp. Co. supra.

The failure of bridge proprietors for six years after a bridge has been destroyed by fire to make any use of the remnants of the bridge, or to take any steps to rebuild it, amounts to an abandonment; and the county commissioners may take possession of the piers and abutments remaining, without making compensation to the bridge proprietors therefor. Sears v. Tuolumne County, 132 Cal. 167, 64 Pac. 270.

The right of a turnpike company to collect tolls upon a bridge built to replace another bridge, destroyed during the War, under a special act which fixed no limit for the enjoyment of the right, is limited to 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the time prescribed by the original act incorporating the turnpike company, where the bridge forms a link in the turnpike, and the original act provided that the turnpike company should use a bridge being built by third parties. Montgomery County v. Clarksville & R. Turnp. Co. supra.

A bridge company organized to construct and maintain a toll bridge does not lose its corporate functions, so as to render its charter subject to forfeiture, merely by reason of the sale by its shareholders of all of the stock to a municipal corporation. The provision of the act of May 8, 1876, relative to the acquisition of toll bridges by counties, and the abolition of tolls thereon, which requires a hearing in regard to the propriety of approving and confirming any reports, has reference to timely requests only; and if a request be not made until after the inquiry has been completed and the report regularly approved, then the granting of the request for a hearing is purely a discretionary matter, and the action regarding it will not be reversed except for abuse of discretion. Re Moxham & F. Bridge, 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 298.

The supplement act of 1878, designed to amend the act of 1876, relative to the acquiring of toll bridges by counties, is not unconstitutional because it deprives the commissioners of the right of approval of the report of the viewers. Bridgewater v. Big Beaver Bridge Co. 210 Pa. 105, 59 Atl. 697.

W. M. G.

struct the jury in effect that if the guard rail was not of sufficient strength to meet ordinary requirements at the time of the accident, but that such weakness arose after the rail was placed on the bridge, then, before the plaintiff could recover, it was necessary to prove that defendant knew of the defect, or could have known by the use of ordinary care. The court refused to give the instruction; and in this ruling we do not think that the court committed a prejudicial error. By instruction No. 2, given at the request of the defendant, the court instructed the jury that, before the plaintiff could recover, he must prove that the defendant had been negligent in the manner alleged in the complaint, and that the act of negligence therein set out caused the injury. The act of negligence set out in the complaint was that the defendant "failed to have a safe and sufficient guard rail, properly braced and strong enough to insure safe passage over said bridge;" that is to say, that the rail was not constructed of strong enough timbers, and was not properly braced. This was the act of negligence that the plaintiff was required to prove before he could recover. The act of negligence therefore consisted in a failure to properly construct the guard rail in the beginning; and the liability of the defendant was not made dependent upon the weakness of the rail which was caused by some act or agency that occurred after its construction. The instruction requested was therefore without the issue presented by the complaint and pleadings, and was abstract. The other instructions given by the court confined the right of the plaintiff to recover to his establishing by proof the act of negligence set forth in the complaint; and in effect covered this instruction requested by defendant. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Freeman, 89 Ark. 327, 116 S. W. 678.

It is urged that the court erred in permitting the witness Edgar Shinn to testify that the guard rail was constructed in an improper manner, and that it was not substantial and safe. This contention is made upon the ground that this was but the opinion of the witness. But we think that this witness possessed an experience and knowledge relative to the subject-matter to qualify him as a skilled witness. The conclusion and judgment of the witness related to a subject-matter not universally understood. The witness was giving evidence in regard to a matter that required the aid of an experience outside of that possessed by the jury to fully understand it. His testimony was therefore admissible. "A witness's opinion is admissible as evidence, not only where scientific knowledge is required to comprehend the matter testified about, but 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

also where experience and observation in the special calling of the witness give him knowledge of the subject in question beyond that of persons of common intelligence." Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Shoecraft, 56 Ark. 465, 20 S. W. 272; T. & C. Ins. Co. v. Fouke (Ark.) 127 S. W. 461; Lawson, Expert Ev. 73; 17 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 36; Moore v. Kenockee Twp. 75 Mich. 332, 4 L.R.A. 555, 42 N. W. 944; Porter v. Pequonnoc Mfg. Co. 17 Conn. 249.

Complaint is also made of certain remarks by counsel for the plaintiff in his argument to the jury. Some of these remarks were mere expression of opinion, and some were instigated by and in retort to remarks made by opposing counsel. In some of the remarks criticism was made of an opposing witness. The counsel said that the career of this witness was wrapped up in this bridge, and he had to sustain it by his testimony. We think that counsel have the right to refer to the interest which opposing witnesses have in the result of the trial, and to comment upon such interest if the testimony of such witnesses is in conflict with other testimony or established facts in the case. We have carefully examined all the remarks complained of, and we are of the opinion that, while some of them were improper, none of them was of such a prejudicial nature as to call for a reversal. Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Murphy, 74 Ark. 256, 85 S. W. 428; Reese v. State, 76 Ark. 39, 88 S. W. 841; Byrd v. State, 76 Ark. 286, 88 S. W. 974; Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Doughty, 77 Ark. 1, 91 S. W. 768; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Raines, 90 Ark. 398, 119 S. W. 665.

We have examined into the other errors which counsel for defendant urge were committed in the trial of this case. We do not deem it useful to set them out. We do not think that any of these alleged errors was so prejudicial as to deprive the defendant of a fair and impartial trial upon the issues involved in the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

RILEY LAKE

v.

A. J. HARGIS, Appt.

(82 Kan. 711, 109 Pac. 670.)

Replevin — bond — damages — expenses of suit.

In a replevin action before a justice of the peace, the plaintiff gave the ordinary bond at the commencement of the action. The defendant gave a redelivery bond, and retained possession of the property replevined. Upon the trial, the defendant was adjudged to be the owner and entitled to the possession of the property. No appeal was taken. The judgment became final and the plaintiff paid the costs. Afterward the defendant commenced an action for damages upon the bond given by the plaintiff, in which he claimed damages for loss of time, attorneys' fees, and expenses incurred in making his defense. Held that in the absence of malice, want of probable cause, or bad faith on the part of the plaintiff, damages of this nature cannot be recovered upon the replevin bond.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Barber County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a certain replevin bond. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. M. Martin for appellant.

Mr. Seward I. Field, for appellee:

Attorney fees, expenses, and loss of time

Note. — Elements of damages recoverable in an action on replevin bond.

In this note it is intended to discuss only what are the elements of damages recoverable in an action on the replevin bond, as distinct from the measure or amount of damages. For example, the value of the property replevied is usually one of the items recoverable, but how that value may be ascertained and as of what time will not be treated. So, also, the conclusiveness of the judgment in the replevin action as to the value of the property replevied is not treated. As to duty to preserve and return property seized on writ of replevin, see note to Three States Lumber Co. v. Blanks, 69 L.R.A. 283.

Value of property.

As a general rule the obligee in a replevin bond, in case of a failure to return, is entitled to recover, as one of his items of loss, the value of the property. Sweeney v. Lomme, 22 Wall. 208, 22 L. ed. 727; Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 125 U. S. 426, 31 L. ed. 799, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 947; Ward v. Hood, 124 Ala. 571, 82 Am. St. Rep. 205, 27 So. 245; *Ginaca v. tained possession of the animal. The trial was had before a jury, and the verdict was in favor of Lake, who was adjudged to be the owner and entitled to the possession of the hog. No appeal was taken and the judgment became final. Hargis paid the costs.

Afterward Lake commenced this action upon the bond given by Hargis at the commencement of the replevin action to recover damages for loss of time, attorneys' fees, and expenses incurred in and about that action. The petition recited the facts concerning the commencement of the replevin action, including the bond given by Hargis. The bond reads:

Replevin Bond.

State of Kansas } ss.:
Barber County }

Whereas A. J. Hargis has this 8th day of June, 1908, commenced an action against Riley Lake before the undersigned justice of the peace of Lake City township in said

Rose (Tex. Civ. App.) 64 S. W. 1000; McLeod Artesian Well Co. v. Craig (Tex. Civ. App.) 43 S. W. 934; Miltimore v. Bottom, 66 Vt. 168, 28 Atl. 872; Ruttan v. Short, 12 U. C. Q. B. 485.

This is true though the value of the property is not fixed in the replevin action. Ginaca v. Atwood, supra (because of compulsory nonsuit); Whitney v. Lehmer, 26 Ind. 503; Yelton v. Slinkard, 85 Ind. 190; Lindsey v. Hewitt and Manning v. Manning, supra (because of voluntary dismissal by plaintiff); McKey v. Lauffin, 48 Kan. 581, 30 Pac. 16 (because of voluntary dismissal of replevin action by plaintiff in replevin action); Kentucky Land & Immigration Co. v. Crabtree, 118 Ky. 395, 80 S. W. 1161, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1133 (because of voluntary dismissal of replevin action by plaintiff, where condition was that he would prosecute the action); Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 68 Me. 449.

When a return is awarded in the replevin suit, the surety, in case the property is not returned, is liable for its value on his covenant to return, even without execution or other demand for its return, as the judgment establishes the liability. Sweeney v. Lomme, 22 Wall. 208, 22 L. ed. 727.

But the value of the property is not recoverable in an action on the bond, under a condition to perform the judgment by returning the property if a return be adjudged, and by paying such sums of money as may be adjudged against the plaintiff, where the plaintiff dismissed the action, and the court did not adjudge either a return of the property or the payment of any sum. Kentucky Land & Immigration Co. v. Crabtree, supra.

A surety on a replevin bond conditioned that plaintiff will pay all costs and damages which may be awarded against him, and will deliver the property to the de-county, for the recovery of divers goods and chattels, all of the aggregate value of $12. Now, we, the undersigned residents of said county bind ourselves to the defendant in the sum of $24 that said plaintiff shall duly prosecute the above-entitled action, and pay all costs and damages that may be awarded against him, and if a return of the property therein delivered to him be adjudged, that he will deliver the same to said defendant.

H. S. Miller.

Dave Freemyer.

Approved by me this 8th day of June, 1908. S. G. Stewart, J. P.

Upon these facts the plaintiff's statement of damages in the petition is as follows: "This plaintiff states that he has been damaged by said defendant by reason of said action, in the loss of time in attending upon said case, and in expenses of himself and attorney and attorneys' fees, in the sum of $75. Wherefore he prays judgment if a return be awarded, cannot be held for the value of the property when, after a regular trial, judgment for costs alone is rendered in favor of the defendant, which judgment is duly paid. Citizens' State Bank v. Morse, 60 Kan. 526, 57 Pac. 115.

And where an undertaking in an action of replevin commenced in the justice court bound the sureties "for the prosecution of the action, for the return of the said property to the said defendant, if return thereof be adjudged by the said court, and for the payment to the said defendant of such sum as may for any cause be recovered against the said plaintiffs," and the jury found generally for the defendant, but through ignorance of the law failed to find the value of the property, so that the justice rendered a judgment for costs only, the sureties were held not liable on their undertaking for the value of the property, even though, on appeal to the county court, a judgment was there rendered for the value of the property. Mitchum v. Stanton, 49 Cal. 302.

The value of the replevined property is not recoverable in an action on the bond, when there is no allegation of failure to return the property. Wall v. Humphreys, 4 Dana, 209.

A redelivery bond conditioned merely for the return of the goods is satisfied by their return or tender, even though in a depreciated condition, and their value cannot be recovered. Douglass v. Douglass, 21 Wall. 98, 22 L. ed. 470.

A seizure of goods by the marshal under a writ de retorno habendo, and a tender thereof to the obligee in a redelivery bond, is a satisfaction of a covenant in such bond to return the goods, and will prevent the obligee recovering for their value in an action on the bond, even though he refused ment against the defendant in the sum of $125, and for costs of this action."

To this petition a demurrer was filed by the defendant upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled. The defendant then filed an answer consisting of (1) a general denial; (2) an admission that he commenced the action of replevin before the justice of the peace, and gave the bond as alleged in the petition. He further alleged in substance that the action was commenced in good faith, and after a full and fair consultation with an attorney who advised the action; that he conscientiously believed he was the owner of the hog and entitled to its immediate possession; and that, after his defeat in court, he fully paid the judgment entered upon the verdict.

To this answer the plaintiff filed a demurrer on the ground that it did not state any defense to the petition. The demurrer was sustained except as to the general denial. The case proceeded to trial to the court without a jury. It was agreed that the amount of damages claimed by the plaintiff was reasonable, if he was entitled to recover anything. Thereafter the court filed conclusions of fact and law. After reciting the facts as above stated, the court announced the following conclusions of law:

"The court finds as a matter of law, that a bond in replevin, such as the one sued on in this action, contemplates a liability of principal and surety thereon, for the attorneys' fees in defending a replevin action, such as the case prosecuted before the justice of the peace, as herein found, together with the expenses and loss of time in such defense, and that in this case, the plaintiff, Riley Lake, is entitled to recover the sum of $125 as his attorneys' fees, expenses, and loss of time in defending said replevin suit before said justice of the peace.

"To all of which findings of fact and conclusions of law the defendant, A. J. Hargis, excepted and excepts.

"It is therefore considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court that the plaintiff to accept them because damaged or deteriorated. Ibid.

If no writ of de retorno habendo is issued in a replevin action, it is the duty of a defeated defendant who has retained possession by giving a redelivery bond containing a covenant to return, to seek the plaintiff, and deliver the property to him if he will receive it, and if he fails to do so, it is a breach of the bond which will make him liable for its value. Ibid.

In case a portion only of the property is returned, the obligee in a replevin bond containing a covenant to return is entitled to recover the value of that portion of the goods not returned. Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 125 U. S. 426, 31 L. ed. 799, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 947; Ginaca v. Atwood, 8 Cal. 446; Franks v. Matson, 211 Ill. 338, 71 N. E. 1011.

If the plaintiff in the replevin suit suffers a nonsuit or dismissal, or withdraws his suit, the condition to prosecute with effect is breached, and an action lies against the sureties for the value of the goods or other damages, even though the value of the property and damages for the detention were not found in such replevin action. Mills v. Gleason, 21 Cal. 274; Cox v. Sargent, 10 Colo. App. 1, 50 Pac. 201 (dismissal); Persse v. Watrous, 30 Conn. 139; Truitt v. Collins, 2 Pennw. (Del.) 36, 45 Atl. 541; Keenan v. Washington Liquor Co. 8 Idaho. 383, 69 Pac. 112. Contra: Vinyard v. Barnes, 124 Ill. 350, 16 N. E. 254 (dismissal).

The same thing is true when the condition of the bond is "to answer such judgment, execution, or decree as may be rendered or issued" in the case. Glover v. Gore, 74 Ga. 680 (voluntary dismissal).

The successful defendant in a replevin action, who has merely a special interest or lien, in case of a nonreturn of the property, is entitled to recover on the covenant to return in the replevin bond, merely the value of his interest or lien, if the plaintiff in the replevin action is the general owner. Ernst Bros. v. Hogue, 86 Ala. 502, 5 So. 738; Perrigo Gold Min. & Tunneling Co. v. Grimes, 2 Colo. 651 (action between mortgagor and mortgagee); Gould v. Hayes, 71 Conn. 86, 40 Atl. 930; Hannon v. O'Dell, 71 Conn. 698, 43 Atl. 147; King v. Ramsay, 13 Ill. 619; David v. Bradley, 79 Ill. 316; Magerstadt v. Harder, 199 Ill. 271, 65 N. E. 225; Treman v. Morris, 9 Ill. App. 237; Nichols & S. Co. v. Bishop, 12 Okla. 250, 70 Pac. 188.

But if the unsuccessful claimant in such replevin action is a stranger having no interest therein, the recovery is not limited to such special interest or lien, but the full value is recoverable. Sweeney v. Lomme and Perrigo Gold Min. & Tunneling Co. v. Grimes, supra (semble); Atkins v. Moore, 82 Ill. 240.

Where the general owner of chattels is entitled to their possession, and it was so adjudged in an action of replevin brought against him by one having a special lien thereon, the latter, when sued on his replevin bond, may set up in mitigation of damages his special lien, when absolute title was not adjudged in the replevin action to be in the defendant in such action. McFadden v. Ross, 108 Ind. 512, 8 N. E. 161; Ringgenberg v. Hartman, 124 Ind. 186, 24 N. E. 987; Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Bronson, 2 Ind. App. 1, 28 N. E. 155.

In Huggeford v. Ford, 11 Pick. 223, the obligors in a replevin bond were allowed to show in reduction of damages, that there were customhouse duties on the goods with which they were chargeable, and to have that sum deducted in estimating the value have and recover of and from the defendant, A. J. Hargis, the sum of $125, and that said judgment bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from this date, and that the plaintiff also recover the costs of this action taxed at $31.60. In accordance herewith let execution issue."

This was erroneous. A replevin bond given at the commencement of the action states the conditions under which it is given and the measure of the indemnity which the defendant will receive thereunder. One of the stipulations in the bond, and the one upon which the plaintiff in this action relies, reads: "And pay all costs and damages that may be awarded against him." No liability could accrue upon this clause of the bond until a breach thereof occurred. None is alleged. It is not claimed that any judgment for costs or damages was awarded against Hargis which he failed to pay. On the contrary it is conceded that he paid the judgment in full. The word "damages" as used in this bond refers to damages which may be occasioned to the defendant by the detention of the property replevied, and its loss if not returned when a return is adjudged. It does not embrace damages of a general nature, such as may be recovered in an action brought upon a bond given to obtain a writ of attachment or injunction, under §§ 192 and 242 of the Civil Code (Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 4626, 4689; Code 1909, §§ 102, 254). In such cases the bond provides for and secures "all damages which of the goods, as the payment of the duties by the plaintiff in replevin is equivalent to a return to that amount.

When property levied upon by a sheriff by virtue of several executions is replevied by a stranger to the writ, and judgment of return is rendered in the replevin action, but return is not made, the sheriff in an action on the replevin bond is entitled to recover sufficient to satisfy the writs of execution. Tanton v. Slyder, 93 Ill. App. 455.

In Bartlett v. Kidder, 14 Gray, 449, personal property owned in common was attached on mesne process against one of the co-owners, and an action of replevin was brought in the name of all, but without the consent of the attachment debtor, against the attaching officer, and dismissed. In an action on the replevin bond, it was held that only the value of the interest of the attachment debtor was recoverable.

Although the failure to return to court a writ of replevin after service, either through the negligence of the plaintiff or of the officer employed by him, is a failure to prosecute to effect, within the meaning of that term in a condition of the bond, so as to render such plaintiff liable in damages for the value of the property in an action on such bond, yet he can show in mitigation of damages that the property replevied belonged to him. Allen v. Woodford, 36 Conn. 143.

Interest.

When the plaintiff in an action on a replevin bond is entitled to recover the value of the property, interest is generally allowed to compensate for the detention. Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 125 U. S. 426, 31 L. ed. 790, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 947; Ward v. Hood, 124 Ala. 570, 82 Am. St. Rep. 205, 27 So. 245; Gould v. Hayes, 71 Conn. 86, 40 Atl. 930; Hopkins v. Ladd, 35 Ill. 178; Franks v. Matson, 211 Ill. 338, 71 N. E. 1011; Treman v. Morris, 9 Ill. App. 237; Pace v. Neal, 92 Ill. App. 416; Walls v. Johnson, 16 Ind. 374; Story v. O'Dea, 23 Ind. 326; Arnold v. Bailey, 8 Mass. 145; 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Huggefords v. Ford, supra; Leighton v. Brown, 98 Mass. 515; Parker v. Simonds, 8 Met. 205; Caldwell v. West, 21 N. J. L. 411; Peacock v. Haney, 37 N. J. L. 179; Muhling v. Ganeman, 4 Baxt. 88.

Damages for detention.

When the undertaking is for the payment of such sum as shall be recovered against the plaintiff in the replevin suit, no recovery can be had on such bond for damages caused by the wrongful taking, unless awarded in the replevin suit. Ginaca v. Atwood, 8 Cal. 446.

Upon a condition in a replevin bond that the principal will prosecute his suit to effect and without delay, damages for the detention of the property pending the replevin suit, and prior to the award of return, are not recoverable unless adjudged against the principal in the replevin suit. Sopris v. Lilley, 2 Colo. 496 (disapproving intimation to contrary in earlier appeal, 1 Colo. 286).

Where the undertaking of the bond is to pay all damages that may accrue by reason of the unlawful detention of the property, no damages for the detention accruing prior to the judgment in the replevin action are recoverable in an action on the bond, when, though litigated in the action of the replevin, they were not awarded, as the matter is res judicata. Colorado Springs Co. v. Hopkins, 5 Colo. 206.

But damages for detention of replevied property have been held recoverable in an action on the bond, though not assessed in the replevin action. Shepard v. Butterfield, 41 Ill. 76 (condition of bond does not appear).

In the absence of an order in the replevin suit for a return of the property, no damages for detention accruing after the judgment in the replevin action are recoverable in an action on the bond, because if the obligee is not entitled to have the property returned, he is not entitled to damages for its detention. Colorado Springs Co. v. Hopkins, supra.

In a suit on a replevin bond conditioned

he may sustain by reason of the attachment, if the order be wrongfully obtained." Civ. Code, § 192. A replevin bond is not intended to give such indemnity, but replevin in this respect is like any other civil action, and where it is commenced in good faith and without malice or want of probable cause, payment of the judgment will extinguish further liability. John Deere Plow Co. v. Spatz, 78 Kan. 786, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 492, 99 Pac. 221; Myers v. Shertzer, 82 Kan. 278, 108 Pac. 105; Cobbey, Replevin, §§ 925, 975, 976; Citizens' State Bank v. Morse, 60 Kan. 526, 57 Pac. 115; Winstead v. Hulme, 32 Kan. 568, 4 Pac. 994. In an action on a bond, no recovery can be had for a sum greater than the bond was given to secure,—in this case, $24. 34 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1582; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 534.

The case was tried upon a wrong theory. It seems to have been assumed that an action on a bond in replevin is controlled by the same rule as that which obtains in actions upon bonds in attachment and for injunction, where the writ has been wrongfully obtained. We do not concur in this view. This theory of the case, which we think erroneous, naturally led the court to a wrong view of the action generally, and an erroneous judgment naturally followed.

The judgment is reversed.

All the Justices concur.

that plaintiffs in the replevin action should prosecute the replevin to final judgment, and pay such damages and costs as the defendants in that suit should recover against them, and also return and restore the same goods and chattels in like good order and condition as when taken, in case such should be the final judgment, if, in a judgment for return in the replevin action, there was no assessment of damages, and if, upon issuance of a writ of restitution, the goods were not returned, damages for detention may be assessed and allowed in the action on the bond. Smith v. Dillingham, 33 Me. 384, followed in Thomas v. Spofford, 46 Me. 408.

The sureties on a defendant's replevy bond cannot be held liable for the value of the use of the replevied property which accrued prior to the time the property was replevied, for their obligation is created by the bond, and dates from its date. Bateman v. Hipp, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 405, 111 S. W. 971.

The obligor in a replevin bond conditioned "to prosecute the suit with effect, . . . and to return the property in case it shall be so awarded, and to pay all such damages as may be assessed against the plaintiff, and the costs of the suit," etc., is not liable in an action on the bond, in damages for the hire of the replevied chattel, when judgment in the replevin action was rendered for the return of the property and costs only, but no inquiry was had or damages assessed for the injury sustained by reason of the action; since the obligation was to pay damages assessed, and none were assessed. Kenley v. Com. 6 B. Mon. 583.

In an action on a replevin bond conditioned to pay such damages and costs as the defendant should recover and for the return of the goods replevied in like good order and condition as when taken, if the defendant succeeds, and the goods are returned in a depreciated condition, damages for the depreciation are recoverable. Washington 30 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ice Co. v. Webster, supra; Bradley v. Reynolds, 61 Conn. 271, 23 Atl. 928; Franks v. Matson, supra; Yelton v. Slinkard, 85 Ind. 190; Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Oldham, 136 Mass. 515.

In Dalby v. Campbell, 26 Ill. App. 502, in which the condition of the bond was not given, it was also held that damages for depreciation of property during its wrongful detention are recoverable in an action on the replevin bond.

When the plaintiff in an action on a replevin bond has recovered, as damages for the detention of the replevied article, the value of its use, he cannot also recover the amount of its natural depreciation, as this would be giving double damages. Odell v. Hole, 25 Ill. 204 (horse).

But it is otherwise when there has been abuse or want of reasonable care of the replevied article. Ibid.

It was held in Fair v. Citizens' State Bank, 69 Kan. 353, 105 Am. St. Rep. 168, 76 Pac. 847, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 960, in which the condition of the bond was not given, that where, as a compliance with the alternative judgment in an action of replevin providing for a return of the specific property or the value thereof, the property was returned, though depreciated in value, an action may be maintained to recover such depreciation; that the statute contemplates that the property be returned in substantially the same condition, and of the same value, as when taken. Hence, the defendant in the replevin action was allowed to recover for depreciation of a replevied note caused by the running of the statute of limitations.

—injury to business.

Damages for injury to business owing to the replevying of trade fixtures are recoverable under a condition of a replevy bond to pay all damages sustained by the replevying of the goods, even though not assessed in the replevin action. Gould v. Hayes, supra.

Damages to the good will of the business of the defendant in replevin cannot be recovered in an action on the bond. Dalby v. Campbell, supra (conditions of bond not stated).

Loss of profits on sale of replevied articles may be recovered. Seldner v. Smith, 40 Md. 602.

Attorney fees.

Usual and customary attorneys' fees necessarily expended in defeating the replevin action are recoverable in an action on the bond containing a condition "for the payment of all costs and damages occasioned by the wrongful suing out of said writ of replevin." Harts v. Wendell, 26 Ill. App. 274; Siegel v. Hanchett, 33 Ill. App. 634; Washburne v. Burke, 84 Ill. App. 587; Richardson v. Gilbert, 135 Ill. App. 363.

And even though they have not yet been paid, they are recoverable if a liability to pay exists. Siegel v. Hanchett, supra.

But attorney fees expended in prosecuting the action on the bond are not recoverable, though the bond is conditioned "for the payment of all costs and damages occasioned by the wrongful suing out of said writ of replevin." Washburne v. Burke, supra.

Under a statute declaring the unsuccessful plaintiff in replevin liable for "all legal costs, as well of the action of replevin as the action on said bond, and all such other costs and damage as the defendant in replevin may show himself entitled to," the plaintiff in the replevin action is liable on his replevin bond, to the defendant for the reasonable amount of fees, above the taxed fee, which he has to pay his attorney for services required in consequence of the replevin. Yantis v. Burditt, 2 Dana, 254.

Attorney fees have also been held recoverable in some cases in which the nature of the conditions of the bond was not indicated. Scott v. Rogers, 56 Ill. App. 571; Pace v. Neal, 92 Ill. App. 416; Dalby v. Campbell, 26 Ill. App. 502; Gilbert v. Sprague, 196 Ill. 444, 63 N. E. 993.

They have also been held not recoverable. Edwards v. Bricker, 60 Kan. 241, 71 Pac. 587.

In an action on a replevin bond conditioned for the prosecution of the action of replevin with effect without delay, the plaintiff cannot recover his attorney fees expended in defending the replevin action, though the plaintiff in the replevin action suffered a nonsuit or was unsuccessful, and a statute provided that when the replevin bond is forfeited, the defendant, in action upon it, "shall recover such sum as shall be just and equitable." Davis v. Crow, 7 Blackf. 129 (plaintiff in replevin nonsuited); Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Bronson, 2 Ind. App. 1, 28 N. E. 155 (plaintiff in replevin unsuccessful).

Nor can he recover his attorney fees expended in the action on the bond. Davis v. Crow, supra.

In a suit on a replevin bond plaintiff is not entitled to prove the value of stenographer's fees and costs, including attorneys' fees necessary and incidental to conducting the replevin suit, when the condition of the bond was to prosecute the suit to effect and without delay, and make return of the property replevied, if return shall be awarded, and save and keep harmless the sheriff for having replevied the property, and pay all costs and damages occasioned by wrongfully suing out said writ of replevin. Gilbert v. American Surety Co. 61 L.R.A. 253, 57 C. C. A. 619, 121 Fed. 499, writ of certiorari denied in 190 U. S. 560, 47 L. ed. 1184, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 855.

The obligor in a replevin bond conditioned "to prosecute the suit with effect, . . . and to return the property in case it shall be so awarded, and to pay all such damages as may be assessed against the plaintiff, and the costs of the suit," etc., is not liable in an action on the bond for the attorney fees of the successful defendant in the replevin action, in whose favor judgment was there rendered for the return of the property and costs only, but no inquiry was had or damages assessed for the injury sustained by reason of the action; since the obligation was to pay damages assessed, and none were assessed. Kenley v. Com. 6 B. Mon. 583.

Attorney fees incurred in defending the replevin suit are not recoverable in a suit on the replevin bond conditioned that the plaintiff will duly prosecute the action and perform the judgment of the court by returning the property, if return be adjudged, and pay to the defendant such sums of money as may be adjudged against the plaintiff, where plaintiff voluntarily dismissed his action, and nothing but legal and taxable costs were adjudged against the plaintiff. Kentucky Land & Immigration Co. v. Crabtree, 118 Ky. 395, 80 S. W. 1161, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1133.

The same is true of hotel bills, horse hire, and loss of time and labor, in procuring attendance of witnesses. Ibid.

Expenses which the defendant in the replevin suit was obliged to incur in the defense of the replevin suit, including attorney fees, and also in the action on the replevin bond, are not recoverable in the action on the bond, conditioned simply that the principal obligor in the bond should pay whatever damages and costs should be recovered against him, and return the property if such should be the final judgment, first, because the bond does not require it, and, second, because taxable costs are in contemplation of lawful indemnity. Maguire v. Pan-American Amusement Co. 205 Mass. 64, 91 N. E. 135.

Where a writ of replevin was against two persons, and, the property not being found, the action, by statutory authority, was continued as one in trover, in which a judgment for damages was rendered against one defendant, and in favor of another, the latter, in an action on the replevin bond, cannot recover his attorney fees incurred in defending the trover action; as the replevin bond was not intended to cover costs and attorney fees incurred in the trover action. Reno v. Woodyatt, 81 Ill. App. 553.

The successful defendant in a replevin action is not entitled to recover as part of his damages, in an action on the plaintiff's bond, the excess of solicitor-and-client-costs of his defense over and above his taxed party-and-party costs in the replevin action, though the bond is conditioned for the payment to the defendant of such damages as he should sustain by the issuing of the writ of replevin, since in contemplation of law taxable costs are a full indemnity. Williams v. Crow, 10 Ont. App. Rep. 301.

Since attorney fees, though embraced in a promissory note given for rent, are not collectable by distress warrant, the surety on a replevy bond growing out of a levy under the distress warrant is not liable for such fees. Jones v. Findley, 84 Ga. 52, 10 S. E. 541.

Attorney fees are not recoverable in an action on a replevin bond if not pleaded. Edwin v. Cox, 61 Ill. App. 567.

Costs.

—condition to pay or perform judgment.

The obligor in a delivery bond conditioned "to perform the judgment of the court" is liable for the costs of the replevin action adjudged against the replevin defendant, and not paid. Morrill v. Daniel, 47 Ark. 316, 1 S. W. 702; Galloway v. Bethume, 6 Bush, 113.

This is true though the property itself was returned in accordance with the judgment of the court. Morrill v. Daniel, supra.

Costs in the replevin suit are recoverable by the successful defendant suing on the replevin bond, when the condition is that the obligors will pay to the obligee any judgment he might recover in the replevin action, etc. Gould v. Hayes, 71 Conn. 86, 40 Atl. 930; Brabon v. Pierce, 34 Mich. 39; John Church Co. v. Dorsey, 38 Misc. 542, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1065 (action on redelivery bond).

In an action on a replevin bond given in the justice court, containing such a condition, costs awarded the defendant in the circuit court, to which the plaintiff in the replevin action had appealed it from the justice court, are recoverable, although on such appeal the costs in the justice court were paid, and an appeal bond was given. Brabon v. Pierce, supra.
